The little union at Boulder Creek, located in a crevice of the Santa Cruz mountains, formerly only a lumber camp, has just had its own jubilee. Ten years ago, the women secured a lot and built a public reading room, incurring quite a debt. Long before it could be paid, the building was destroyed by fire. With heroic courage the women rebuilt, better than at first, and now at the end of ten years have every obligation met, and their property clear of debt. The house is on the main street, and their reading room is always open. The sunny windows are full of growing plants, and the bright room, with its comfortable tables and chairs and plenty of good reading matter is very attractive. A white ribboner occupies the rear rooms and looks after the place. The rent of the second story defrays current expenses.

By way of celebrating the occasion the union held an all-day institute, in the reading room, closing with evening exercises at the Methodist church, at which Mrs. Dool gave a history of all their work and its difficulties, followed by the burning of their mortgage, a really dramatic scene. It was something fine to see that flower and white ribbon bedecked tray, surrounded by the faithful women who had served as directors of the corporation, while the eldest of their number held the lighted match to the once burdensome document upon it. As the mortgage turned to smoke the whole audience rose with the strains of the doxology.

That was not all that was fine. Boulder Creek has always been mindful of its young. The Junior L. T. L. sang their prettiest, and the Seniors—well, they outdid themselves. Their L. T. L. band of eight pieces discoursed excellent music, kindly responding to encores.

Miss Cooney, a teacher in the public school of Boulder Creek, has done some splendid work in School Savings Banks. Altogether the work of this union for the children is fine. Mrs. Dorcas Spencer gave the evening address. The whole day's work added seventeen names to the local union.

The pastor of the church spoke helpful words, and indeed helped all along; and that pastor is a woman, Mrs. Kail. The Methodist church cannot ordain her, but the conference acknowledges her ability and character, and has given her a regular charge for some years. Her ministry has been very successful and her record satisfactory to the conference.

The Work in Australia—Tasmanian Convention.

Mrs. C. E. Morton, Correspondent.

HOBART, Tasmania.—Two events during the past month have directed attention to the subject of temperance. One is the formation of a public-house trust on the lines followed by Earl Gray in England, the other is the annual convention of the state union. The plan of holding this convention alternately in Hobart, in the south, and Launceston, in the north, gives each local union two years in which to prepare for the visit of delegates, and spreads the interest over a larger area than if the meetings were always held in the capital, Hobart.

The convention began on the morning of March 10, and was presided over by the state president, Mrs. Rooke. One or two reports were read, and various business transacted, and in the afternoon Mrs. Rooke delivered her annual address. This briefly reviewed the position of affairs in regard to temperance in the states, and mentioned as a weak spot in the national life the increase of drunkenness among the women of England, and the large number of licenses held by women in the states for the sale of liquor. Mrs. Rooke was hopeful that the women of Tasmania would have the state franchise—indeed, it seems an anomaly that they should have the suffrage for the more important commonwealth elections while the state legislature still refuses it.

In addition to the usual business meetings there were two public evening meetings, at which several ministers and laymen spoke encouragingly, and Mrs. C. E. Clark, Australasian Press superintendent, gave some account of the great work now being done in New Zealand in the direction of prohibition, and gave the members some practical advice. The convention was marked by a spirit of harmony, and was very much enjoyed by those who had the privilege of meeting to compare notes of work done and to stimulate each other to more work in the time to come. The serious drop in the state membership is cause for consideration, with a view to some determined effort to arouse fresh interest. Last year's report showed that there were 258 active, thirty-seven honorary members, while this year there are 197 active, twenty-eight honorary. An organizer, such as Mrs. C. E. Clark, who has recently paid us a visit, would arouse more sympathy with the work and lead to an increase in the membership.

The election of officers resulted in Mrs. Rooke being again chosen as president; Mrs. W. S. Bell, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Wilkins, recording secretary, and Mrs. Kirby, treasurer. Members were entertained at afternoon tea by the mayoress, Mrs. Storrer, who selected the most picturesque spot possible, in a lovely glen by the side of the Cataract Gorge, for the function.

Besides the members of what might be called the teetotal party, there are a number of thoughtful men and women in Hobart, as in most places, who deplore the evils of the liquor traffic, but who do not agree that drink itself is so much an evil as the way in which it is sold. It has been decided to form a public-house trust, with the leading principle of the elimination of private profit, as a step in the direction of reform. A resolution of the convention placed on record its apprehension of this growing tendency, and is distinctly out of sympathy with it, believing that no one has ever abolished any evil by making it respectable. That indulgence in alcoholic drinks is harmful under almost any conditions, that it is totally unnecessary, and that it is against the economic progress of the world, are so much a matter of creed with white-ribboners that they could scarcely do other than pass such a resolution. Yet the promoter of the trust has written a grieved letter to the press, deploring that a movement to help our cause has been so coldly received. The resolution might have gone further and given a clear presentment of the reasons for the attitude taken up by the W. C. T. U. It is certain there are still many who do not know why the union takes the stand it does. With the growth of the L. T. L. there should be more understanding on this important subject.

THE WEALTH OF HEALTH.

By David Paulson, M. D.

WE should enthusiastically co-operate with the Master Mechanic in developing the human machine—the masterpiece of all created works—to mental, moral and physical perfection. We see a great procession marching towards premature graves. One-half the infants die before they are five years old, and a large number of those who live soon drift into a life of miserable invalidism. Insanity is increasing three times faster than is our population. The insane in this country alone would form a procession 123 miles long. Consumption, comparatively rare a generation ago, now weeds out one-third of our adult population; while pneumonia is responsible for almost as many more deaths. Typhoid fever, which is an entirely preventable disease, carries away 50,000 of our people each year. The majority of the 27,000,000 cases of illness in the country each year is a legitimate harvest resulting from colossal ignorance, carelessness, and indifference to natural law.

In the advertising columns of some of the popular magazines may be seen, in bold display type, a dozen or more advertisements of morphine, cocaine, and other drug cures. Conservative authorities estimate that there are 60,000 morphine fiends in Chicago; and it has been estimated that there are 1,000,000 persons in the United States addicted to various drug habits.

It is no financial dream that there is something radically wrong with society, which demands that the public conscience should be aroused to cultivate mental, moral, and physical health. If it were possible for some one to go out and raise several persons from their graves, the very next day it would be heralded in two continents; but is it not a grander thing to save a thousand people from having premature funerals? Nothing is easier than to do that very thing. A health officer in Buffalo instituted sanitary reforms which lessened the death rate of that city 2,400 a year. That was surely a greater work than would have been the raising of an equal number from the dead.

There is being developed among us a class of sedentary men whose health is being undermined by office work and who are physical wrecks when they should be in the very prime of life. Every individual requires daily the exercise that would be taken in climbing a ladder more than a mile high.

Every intelligent physician knows that our mothers, daughters, and wives, are sacrificing their health and happiness in the effort to make their bodies fit their clothing, instead of adapting their clothing to their bodies; and the wretched ill-health of their children testifies to the far-reaching evil result.

If there were a business investment in sight which would be certain to realize 10 per cent, what a rush there would be to take advantage of it! Yet the average individual can readily lengthen his life at least ten years and add twenty-five, fifty, and, in many cases, even 100 per cent to his physical capacity and endurance. Notwithstanding this fact, most people are content to drift along, day after day, in their present enfeebled condition, soon to drop into untimely graves.

Only good food can be transformed into pure blood and sound muscle. It should be intelligently cooked and should be free from all injurious substances. It ought to contain the maximum amount of nutrition, with the minimum quantity of waste material. It should be palatable and should be eaten slowly and at regular times. A fact worthy of mention is that the honors in feats of physical endurance are invariably earned by men who live exclusively upon the natural products of the earth.

The almost magical results secured from dashing cold water into the face of a fainting person are just as certainly secured when it is applied to the entire twenty square feet of body surface. A short daily cold sponge or tub bath acts as a sort of fire-alarm to the heart, lungs, liver, stomach and other vital organs.

Recent scientific experiments have shown that sunlight possesses almost miraculous restorative powers. We should, therefore, covet every opportunity to be exposed to its benign influence.

There is a far larger number of honest people who are dying from wilful deprivation of pure air than there are criminals who are forcibly deprived of it by being hanged for their crimes.

We must not be content with merely looking and feeling well to-day; we must take into consideration how we shall look and feel ten years hence, unless we change our present wrong physical habits.

It is important to accept the divine truth that the body is a temple wherein God dwells. We teach our children not to mar costly pictures and rare furniture; how much more important is it that they should recognize the abundant evidences of God's miracle-working power in the human body, so that they shall be inspired to properly care for it, and shall endeavor to glorify God in body and spirit.

Chicago, Ill.

THE ATTITUDE OF CAPITAL.

By Mrs. Isabella Webb Parks.

IF anyone has doubted that the struggle between organized capital and organized labor is war to the death, the action and spirit of the National Association of Manufacturers recently in convention at New Orleans, must remove such doubt. President Parry's address was one long, bitter arraignment of organized labor and denunciation of its aims. He accuses organized labor of knowing but one law "the law of physical force—the law of the Huns and Vandals." "All its purposes," he says, "are accomplished either by actual force or by the threat of force." Another speaker, Mr. Post, asks, if ever "in all the history of the world there existed such a condition of oppression, cruelty to men, women and children, terror, anarchy, beatings and murder as now exists under the acts of desperate members of labor unions." No reference is made to the oppression and cruelty which the investigations of the strike comsion showed to be the continual condition under the reign of the mine operators, and which exceeds all the oppression and cruelty which existed during the strike, under the "desperate members of the labor unions."

In accordance with the suggestion of the president that it was desirable to secure "organization among manufacturers and employers which shall embrace the last employer in the United States, the various minor organizations to be combined in one grand national federation," a committee was appointed with power, at the request of five members of the association who are employers in kindred trades, to call a meeting of the employers in those trades with the view of forming an organization. The president and secretary of the Manufacturers' Association were instructed to co-operate with the officers of such organizations when formed, "to form a permanent central organization that will create a clearing house for ideas and provide means for co-operation on matters of common interest."

In the resolutions adopted, the association declares that it is not opposed to organizations of labor as such, but it also declares that "employers must be free to employ their work-people at wages mutually satisfactory, without interference or dictation on the part of individuals or organizations not directly parties to such contracts," and further, that "employers must be unmolested and unhampered in the management of their business and in the use of any methods or systems of pay which are just and equitable."

To the ignorant, the unthinking and the prejudiced, this sounds plausible, but it means that while employers are preparing to organize on a national scale to set the rate of wages and arrange the conditions of labor, laborers are to act as individuals in accepting or rejecting these terms. True, they assert they are not opposed to organizations of labor, but of what use are such organizations if they can have nothing to say as to the wages paid the individual? And who is to decide what "methods or systems of pay are equitable and just?" Obviously the employers and the employers alone. These resolutions carried out mean the practical enslavement of labor.

Speaking of organized labor, President Parry says, "It denies to those outside its ranks the individual right to dispose of their labor as they see fit—a right that is one of the most sacred and fundamental of American liberty." Once this was true, but conditions have changed since the days when our forefathers saw in the right of each man to compete with his fellows in an open field the ideal of liberty. The time has come in our industrial development when the laborer who "sees fit" to dispose of his labor on starvation terms imposes upon his fellow workmen the necessity of disposing of their labor on similar terms. His right to accept starvation wages is curtailed by their right to a living wage. In denying this "individual right" the labor unions are undermining, not American liberty, but capitalistic tyranny. This "hard-earned freedom" of our ancestors has "withered to a bond."

President Parry's arraignment of organized labor is flatly contradicted by the strike commission, which indeed reported that violent methods had been resorted to in some instances, but completely exonerated the leaders from any complicity. In other words, not organized labor, but, as Mr. Post said, "desperate members" of the unions were guilty of violence. Organized labor is striving to get its disorderly element in hand and is succeeding fully as well as could be expected.

There has been some violence in the uprising of labor, although not nearly so much as has been reported by the press. But there was a time, not so far distant "in the history of the world" that Mr. Post need have forgotten it, beside whose "terror and anarchy" the most exaggerated reports of the present are peace and tranquility. That time was when the downtrodden and oppressed overthrew society in the earthquake which we call the French Revolution.

We may be profoundly thankful that the laborers of today organize, and that they demand recognition for their organizations. It means the difference between the French Revolution and the bloodless English Revolution of 1688. The starving mob, frenzied by the sufferings and by its sense of its own helplessness, can destroy bastiles, overturn thrones and massacre with the bloodthirstiness of tigers. When its rage is spent, it has nothing to show but ruins. The excesses of the French Revolution were the inevitable accompaniments of the uprising of a people who did not know how to organize. The patient, dogged, steady march through the centuries of the English people toward political freedom was the natural progress of a people accustomed to united action. The one, in impotent fury turned on its oppressors with fire and sword; the other, through its representative, deliberative parliament, demanded, with a voice which could not be denied, "redress of grievances." The French mobs secured speedy and terrible vengeance; the English parliament established the liberty of the English people.

Our industrial struggle is but the continuation in a changed form of the struggle of our English forefathers. "It is an endless battle to be free." Once the conflict raged round the English parliament; now it rages round organized labor. Now, as then, it is the battle of the whole people, for the enslavement of labor means the loss of our civil liberty.

OHIO THE CRUSADE STATE

PAST AND PRESENT

MRS. ANNIE W. CLARK
Present-Day President.

Greetings from Mother Thompson to the National Convention

Hillsboro, Ohio, May 5th, 1903.

Dear White Ribbon Comrades:

When we heard that our National Convention was certainly to be held in Cincinnati next November, and that a delegation from said Convention expected to visit Hillsboro, a vote of grateful appreciation was sent by our union to the National officers for their compliment and good will. To this allow me to add my assurance of a hearty welcome and my personal benediction to everyone in attendance at the Convention in Ohio's Queen City or to those who make the additional trip to the "Old Fort." If it is God's holy will that I still remain we will join in the exclamation: "What hath God wrought since December 23, 1873!"

Yours sincerely,

Eliza J. T. Thompson.

Early Days.

By Mrs. Antoinette H. Clevenger.

AS I read, in the February Magazine Number of THE UNION SIGNAL, the sketch, "An Organization Memorial," my thoughts ran back to many memorable happenings during those stirring days when the heroic women pioneers established our great organization.

No one doubts that the hand of God was marvelously manifest during the Crusade, and that His controlling power was also apparent in shaping the destiny of the same "called" womanhood.

Two state mass conventions followed the early weeks of the Crusade at Columbus, in February and at Cincinnati, in April. While entirely distinct in call, Doctor (now Bishop) Walden presided over both. Each of these conventions, by unanimous action, named Mrs. Harriet C. McCabe of Delaware, whose husband, Doctor McCabe, was then and for years afterward until his death, officially connected with the Ohio Wesleyan University, as the "leader" for the "risen host."

At the Cincinnati Convention, a committee was appointed to meet at Delaware, draft a constitution and select a name for a permanent state organization of temperance women. Mrs. McCabe was chairman of this committee; Mrs. Frances W. Leiter, secretary, and the constitution was duly prepared.

To Mrs. McCabe the name Woman's Christian Temperance Union came as an inspiration, and it was promptly accepted by the committee on organization, and finally permanently adopted by the convention held in Springfield, June 17. This convention elected as officers of the new organization: Mrs. H. C. McCabe, President; Mrs. Frances Wait Leiter, Corresponding and Recording Secretary; Mrs. Eliza J. Thompson, of Hillsboro, Treasurer. The three officers were women of unbounded faith. It was Mrs. McCabe's remarkable insight into the future which gave her the courage to say to a committee composed in part of some of the ablest men of the state, that the organization growing out of the Crusade should be composed of and regulated by women only.

The first few years were spent organizing districts according to the political divisions of the state. Some of Ohio's most talented women at that time manned these districts. After five years of efficient service Mrs. McCabe declined re-election to the presidency, as the growing work was proving too arduous for her strength.

The W. C. T. U. does not need to be told of our dear Mother Thompson, who served Ohio union as treasurer for a number of years. The story of her life and of her gifts are known to all.

The leader of that first praying band that went out December 24, 1873, was for years an inspiration to this work, as to every work for Christ with which she has been associated. She always claimed that she "never could make a speech," yet she never failed to say something worth hearing, and she possessed the happy faculty of seeing and presenting the witty phase of even serious things; frequently at the expense of herself, her husband, or some member of the sisterhood. Her wit was always forceful and to the point, never failing to produce a ripple of mirth as it captured all hearts. This was in the days when our beloved was one of the expected at state convention.

The third member of this "Central Committee" (then so-called), Mrs. F. W. Leiter, was the great-granddaughter of Gen. Benjamin Wait, of Revolutionary fame, in memory of whose sterling worth in that eventful period, the people of Waitsville, Vt., have erected a monument. Probably from him she has inherited her fine executive ability, courage, and indomitable perseverance. At the time of the Crusade she was young, highly educated, cultured, happily married, and with a brilliant social life before her, yet when God's call came to her in a memorable experience in a saloon, she gave herself willingly, joyfully to the work, and she has never since faltered. For a little time she doubted whether God meant that a wife and mother should enter public life, and it was Miss Willard's personal plea for the "world which needs mothering," which finally resulted in Ohio's claiming Mrs. Leiter for service. She began in the Crusade and has never ceased effort along state lines.

MRS. H. C. McCABE President. MRS. E. J. THOMPSON Treasurer. MRS. FRANCES W. LEITER Secretary.

In the beginning of the organization a yearly membership fee was greatly opposed by many because this was a religious work, and it is due to Mrs. Leiter's earnest endeavor that the union was placed on a financial basis.

Having been principal of several of the leading high schools in the state, Mrs. Leiter possessed innate fitness for the educational phases of temperance, and to her untiring and efficient service during a period of four years as state superintendent of the department, Ohio is indebted for her first Scientific Temperance Instruction law (1889). The same fitness for service is evidenced also in her national work for physical education.

May our state, National and World unions never cease to honor these pioneers to whose consecrated ability we owe so much of the success of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Wilmington, Ohio.

MRS. Annie W. Clark, state president of Ohio W. C. T. U., was born at Meadville, Pa., where her father, Rev. Homer J. Clark, D. D., was for many years president of Allegheny college. Dr. Clark's ancestors for several generations, lived in Vermont, his native state. Mrs. Clark's mother was Agnes Wilson, daughter of Hon. Thomas Wilson of Morgantown, Va., and her ancestors were Virginians. Vermont and Virginia is a good combination for ancestry. Annie Clark was married in 1866 to Captain Charles T. Clark, then but recently returned from the civil war. She thus remained loyal to her family name. Captain Clark is now a lawyer at Columbus, Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. Clark have five children, two sons and one daughter married, and two younger daughters now students in the Ohio state university.

Mrs. Clark and her husband joined the Good Templars soon after they were married and they have been good haters of the liquor traffic ever since. When the Crusade reached Columbus in December, 1873, Mrs. Clark joined the crusade band led by Mrs. Desellum and worked with it daily. Her official work in the W. C. T. U. began in 1889 when she was elected county president. Prior to that time her energies, outside of home duties, were given to Sunday School, Missionary and Woman's Relief Corps work. As president of Franklin county, Mrs. Clark visited every place where a union might be sustained, organized a dozen new unions, and systematically carried the work forward.

In 1899 Mrs. Clark was made state superintendent of Fairs, and a year or two later she was invited to address the state Board of Agriculture, her views being received with such favor that the board recommended county boards to encourage W. C. T. U. work on the fair grounds, especially in the furnishing of rest tents or rooms.

In 1895 Mrs. Clark was elected state corresponding secretary and two years later, state president, to which office she has been re-elected each succeeding year.

Ohio W. C. T. U. has gained in membership since Mrs. Clark became president an average of one thousand a year, and the work in all departments has increased and become more effective, a fair share of the credit being due to the improved methods introduced by the general officers.

Mrs. Clark goes to the World's Convention at Geneva, Switzerland, sent there by offerings from over two hundred Ohio unions, who rejoice in thus showing her their love and appreciation.

Chapter XII.

ON the following Monday morning Hugh packed his bag, made a pleasant little farewell call at the Vicarage, and, a few hours later, walked quietly into the midst of the family circle at home. The hubbub of welcome subsided at last, and he sat, not without embarrassment, in the midst of his womenkind, sipping tea. The embarrassment was caused, at any rate in part, by the disconcertingly personal nature of their remarks.

"Only ten months; and how changed you are, somehow," said Madge, again and again.

"Ten months implies a change at my age," said her brother good-humoredly.

"He has grown into more intimate acquaintance with his clerical clothes; but it isn't only that," said his mother reflectively. There was a hint of trouble in her voice, or Hugh fancied so.

"He looks older and graver," put in Constance, before her brother had time to change the subject; "but it isn't only that—"

"No, it's something in the—"

"Come, I say, drop it!" interrupted Hugh hastily. "If you must discuss a fellow's looks, you needn't do it before his face."

With a general laugh the point was waived, and within a day or two most of the family had forgotten that they had noticed any change.

The solicitor's only remark was made in private to his wife.

"He has lost his cock-sureness, which isn't to be regretted. It surely isn't disillusionment already, poor chap."

"A parson! Just such another as his grandad before him. He, he, he!"

Mrs. Brotherton looked intensely annoyed. It was really intolerable that the boy should be pursued in this way.

For the moment Hugh looked as if he could willingly have slain grandad, but meeting his scowling look, the old man sniggered apprehensively; and turning away, with an agonized mixture of loathing and pity, his grandson abruptly left the room. Soon afterwards he went out, and as he wandered in desultory fashion about the quaint, picturesque old city, his face gradually lost its gloom. At the very worst, life, as yet, was before him, not behind, as with grandad. Thank God, at any rate, for that. Through devious ways, his wanderings led him to the quiet, decorous close, and entering the majestic cathedral, he passed slowly up the long nave to the choir. Yes, as nearly as he could remember, this was the exact spot where, but ten short months ago, he had knelt in the unbounded confidence of youth and excellent intentions. But for the presence of one or two vergers, he would have knelt there again; in no confidence this time, but in utter abasement of spirit. Well, and why not? He was a clergyman. Should not that fact sufficiently account for his action in the eyes of the inquisitive? There, where he had knelt, in the loftiest spirit of self-consecration, less than a year ago, he fell on his knees once more, and his agonized cry went up to heaven:

"God help me! God help me! God help me!"

It seemed to him that God must help him; he was so young, and meant so well. Even granting that, so far, he had not done much to help himself, surely God would intervene to save him! Surely He could not, would not suffer him to fall utterly away! He knelt on in an agony of self-pity which he accepted as penitence, and having forgiven himself for his most shameful sin, he arose at last and passed from the cool deep shadows into the sunlit air, with the serenity of a conscience at peace with itself upon his face.

Poor grandad! Poor old grandad! In his pitiful mood, his thoughts, even of that old reprobate, were more tender than they were wont to be. He would like to know more than he yet knew of grandad's history. Poor old boy! Hugh strolled away from the gray cathedral, through the quiet meadows beyond, going over all that he already knew. Suggestive as his father's words had been, Hugh's actual knowledge of the facts of his grandfather's downfall amounted to very little, but over that little he had deeply brooded, from that day to this. As he lingered along the banks of the slow transparent river (how deliciously transparent it looked after the murky streams to which his eyes had been accustomed of late), and watched the darting trout, his thoughts were of grandad still. He wondered had the poor old fellow ever really taken himself in hand. Suppose that, when he had first discovered the vulnerable spot in his manhood, he had made a determined stand against the attacks of the enemy? Hugh was far from imagining it to be an easy thing to do, but suppose that grandad had been man enough, while still young, to do it! Ah! how different things might have been; how much better for himself; how much easier, in all probability, for those who came after! Doubtless a man must take his nature, as he must take his life, as he found it, and work out his own salvation; but when it came to the doing of it, surely it was a little hard not to feel fierce resentment towards those from whom his characteristics came!

Hugh sighed heavily as he sauntered under the shade of ancient lines towards his favorite almshouses. There was old Smithson, as usual, sunning himself on the bench outside his porch, and there, on this side of the almshouse garden gate, on their usual log sat the Kenrick girls. Hugh found it necessary to school his features to decorous gravity as he passed the sedate row. The five impassive, mask-like faces were all young; yet for a lifetime, as it seemed to Hugh, these girls had been wont to sit upon this self-same log, prodding their parasols into the grass, and gazing stolidly at the passers-by. He knew them well by sight, but neither he nor any of his friends had advanced to a speaking acquaintance with the shy sisterhood. The fact was not one likely to cause him any regret, for although, after his absence, his eyes gladly recognized them as a well-remembered feature of the landscape, the girls were not otherwise interesting. Under their steady, observant scrutiny, he passed on, through the quiet haven of the trim gardens, stopping only to exchange a kindly greeting with old Smithson. How obsequious the old man's salutation seemed after the amusing brusqueries of Tummas Windle. The smile called forth by the recollection still lingered upon Hugh's lips as he turned into the road, and so home between the flowering hedgerows that were a feast to his eyes after their months of familiarity with stone walls. On re-entering the house, he repaired at once to the comfortably appointed room in which grandad spent the greater portion of his days, and dismissing the attendant, made a patient and determined attempt to penetrate into the inner workings of the old man's senile mind. At the end of a painful half-hour he was driven finally to the conclusion that of ordered or deliberate thought or intention there was nothing left. The nearest approach to coherence was invariably achieved when some tone of his grandson's voice seemed to arouse a dormant brood of recollections into temporary activity. Hugh was conscious of a sickening conviction that in him the old man recognized the promise of his own youth.

"I believe there are moments when he sees what no one else sees, that I have started on the same line, and am, perhaps, booked through to the same hateful end. But it touches him not a bit. He doesn't care—not he! In fact, it amuses him."

"He! he! he!" gurgled grandad suddenly.

"Hold your tongue! Do you think I want all the world to know what you have done for me? Hold your abominable old tongue! Have you no sense of decency left?"

The terrified old man shrank from him, cowering, but just then Hugh's heart was hard. In the hope of arousing some momentary attention, he once more shook the shoulder beneath his grasp.

"You wretched old sot, with your abominable jest over the most miserable inheritance to which a human being can be born! Think of my fate, if you can! But what do you care for my fate? What do you care for your own? Did you ever care? You shall answer me!" with another shake. "Did you ever care?"

The old man burst into tears.

"I don't know. Yes, I do care; God knows I do!" he cried, with the remorse of many years ago. "Where's Milly? Milly, where are you? Don't let me taste another drop! Don't let me see it! Don't let me smell it even, or I can't resist it. I can't, I tell you—I can't, indeed, and I don't want—I don't want—"

The quavering tones had sunk into senility again. He stopped, looked bewildered into his grandson's face, and feebly struggled under his hand.

"What do you want? Nurse! I want nurse!"

Hugh came to himself at once.

"There, there, don't be frightened! It's all right," he said soothingly. "Poor grandad! Poor old grandad!"

With conscious magnanimity he soothed and coaxed the old man until he resumed his wonted chuckle, then summoning his attendant, went hopelessly away. Milly was his grandmother's Christian name. She had died comparatively young. For a day or two he brooded over what he had gleaned, and at last attacked his father recklessly.

"About grandfather," he said one day abruptly. "You may as well tell me the worst at once. My imagination is pretty sure to carry me beyond the truth."

"I don't know whether that is possible," replied his father gloomily, "but perhaps you are right. I hoped that his memory was gone. It seemed the best that one could hope. But it appears that your clerical dress, and perhaps an undoubted likeness to what he once was, has dimly recalled his own youth. He was ordained at about your age, and seems, soon afterwards, to have contracted the drink habit. If he had but been found out things might never have gone to such lengths, but he seems to have been clever—or hypocritical enough— to keep suspicion at bay. For some years he did his clerical duty—preachments, services, visits, and all the rest of it—diligently enough, and something about him, his good comradeship probably, made him a general favorite. That was by day. At night, when he knew himself to be safe, he got drunk. Now and again he seems to have made some sort of a stand, and to have tried to pull himself together. In one such interval he got married, and for a time things were better. Unfortunately, the improvement in him didn't last. He was soon at the old game. With his wife's help he kept it dark for a time, but he might have forseen what would happen. The cares of housekeeping, children, and parish duties, all came upon my poor mother, and there was no home happiness to make the burden seem lighter. He had only himself to thank for it when she, too, gave way."

"'Gave way? Gave way to—to it?" stammered Hugh, horror-stricken.

"Aye,' said his father bitterly. "At the time to which my first recollections go back she was a good woman, but latterly there was little to choose between them. In point of fact, he did, here and there, make an attempt to pull himself together, but by that time she was beyond all care to do it. I have never told this to any living soul except your mother, and only tell it to you now for your own good. There are times when you are horribly like your grandfather, Hugh."

It was thoughtlessly said, and he realized it even before the blood rushed to his son's face.

"Father, do you mean to say—"

"No, my boy; no, no, no! I spoke without thought. I have better hopes of you. Still, forwarned is forearmed. It was so in my own case, as you know."

"What became of her?" asked Hugh hoarsely, and without looking up.

"It caused her early death. That pulled him up for a time, but whispers were in the air, and he knew it. Perhaps the knowledge—or remorse—made him reckless. Anyway, he made a public exhibition of himself in the end."

Involuntarily, Hugh groaned.

"Ay," said his father bitterly. "Of course, there was a scandal, followed by an inquiry, and in the end he was suspended. At that he cast off the last shadow of pretence, and let himself go. There is no need to go into further detail, but I am sorry to say there lives no more unmitigated scoundrel than your grandfather has been in his time."

Beads of perspiration were standing on Hugh's pallid forehead.

"You believe that his efforts to pull himself together count for nothing. You hold that hypocrisy was at the bottom of it all?"

Mr. Brotherton's reply was prefaced by a short laugh.

"As regards his zealous ministrations, what else would you suggest? 'By their fruit ye shall know them.' That's orthodox guidance, I believe," he said drily.

His son drew in his parched underlip, and moistened it.

"Might not his have been, in the early days, at any rate, a real faith, hard to kill, yet gradually weakened by despair after repeated yielding to temptation?"

Mr. Brotherton shrugged his shoulders.

"I can't say that I ever argued the matter out, or cared to do so. It's enough for me to know that, within a year or two of his ordination, he was proved to have been a drunkard, although he continued to press upon the acceptance of other people a faith that he had found powerless to effect his own salvation. Said to have been more than ordinarily earnest and convincing about it, too. Faugh, it sickens one to think of it!"

Yet, having cooled down, he began to regret having allowed his indignation to carry him so far. Until recalled to himself by the pallor of his son's face, he had overlooked the fact that a sensitive fellow like Hugh was sure to brood over the family disgrace.

Conducted by Mrs. Helen G. Rice, General Secretary.

Notes.

MAKE early and careful preparations for that most beautiful of all Red Letter Days, June 9, the birthday of Miss Jennie Casseday. Let your program include the cheering of sad and lonely hearts by gifts of flowers, God's own messengers of comfort.

If your Legion has not held a Hospital Meeting this year, it should make haste to do so. This meeting should not only include donations of money for our L. T. L. room, but the preparation of bandages and other hospital supplies; also papers upon the principle of Non-Alcoholic Medication, for which the Frances E. Willard National Temperance Hospital stands, and upon the work which the hospital has accomplished. For needed information address the president of the hospital board, Mrs. Margaret Inglehart, 179 Pearson St., Chicago.

In regard to the L. T. L.'s offered prizes for this year, the effort has been to make the conditions absolutely fair so that the smaller and newer states should have an equal chance with those already well organized. In working for the prize offered by the National superintendent of Social Meetings and Red Letter Days, it will be of great advantage to make a study of her leaflet, "To Hold and to Gain." Order from Mrs. Mary D. Tomlinson, 212 La Grand Ave., Plainfield, N. J.

The "Anti-Cigarette Speaker," compiled by Mrs. Ida B. Cole and published by W. T. P. A., 184 LaSalle St., Chicago, is a valuable and timely adjunct in the preparation of entertainments. The price is ten cents per copy.

Miss Anna A. Gordon has recently spent two weeks in Indiana, everywhere meeting and addressing the boys and girls, and speaking to the grown people in behalf of the young.

Mrs. Clara E. Beede, General L. T. L. secretary for Illinois, and formerly a teacher in New Hampshire, is doing much field work in her state, and securing excellent results in the organization of new Legions.

The Maine L. T. L. secretary reports several new Legions organized since the National Convention and much interest manifested. The Michigan secretary writes: "I am having a great deal of encouragement these days."

New York: "A Senior Legion has recently been organized near Syracuse for Indian boys and girls. Their leader, the principal of their school, read of the L. T. L. in THE UNION SIGNAL and at once realized that it was just what his young people needed. He called some W. C. T. U members to help him organize. This Legion is prosperous and we are hoping to have their male quartette at our state convention." "A Senior colored Legion has just been organized in Ithaca. The president and secretary are bright, young high school girls, who can conduct a meeting with credit. They are about to have a medal contest. Our Seniors take turns in assisting this new Legion in its regular meetings."

PENNSYLVANIA: Reading, always busy, seems busier than ever. The "Fishing Club" plan recommended at Portland is working beautifully in the Neal Dow Legion. The alumni has again served coffee and buns to the trolley men at the barn, a service which was highly appreciated. If these men are not won as members of the L. T. L., their friendship is being secured. The "Anna Gordon" observed Peace day with suitable program, and made a visit to the Widows' Home with oranges, flowers and a program to entertain the inmates. The Legions of the city also gave an entertainment at the "Hope Rescue Mission" and fine department work is being done. A county superintendent says she likes Perry pictures the best of anything she has tried for rewards.

Williamson School L. T. L. recently gave an entertainment, including fine musical selections and recitations. President Shrigley and Superintendent Bitting each made a short address. A most enjoyable feature was a "Musical Romance," suggested in THE UNION SIGNAL, in which one asks a question and a few strains of a selection played on the piano gives the clue to the answer, the audience guessing the words that fill in the story. The pledge was written on the blackboard and all joined in repeating it.

The Frances E. Willard Senior, assisted by the Elma M. Preston Senior of Harrisburg, had charge of the closing evening of the week of the temperance revival service in Thirteenth street Methodist Episcopal church. Recitations and songs were given by both Legions. They had the opportunity for this service and used it. A bouquet social is in preparation by the Elma M. Preston. The Elma M. Preston Juniors held a social January 16 with good program; gained four new members.

By Mary E. Kuhl, National Superintendent Miners.

ORGANIZE for a membership contest. Elect a captain for each side, calling one the Body Guard and the other the Home Guard, let each guard work two months for new recruits, carefully enrolling names of new members and giving to each a membership badge or button after exacting a promise to attend all meetings regularly. Give each Legioner five credits for every new member secured, and make the one receiving the largest number of credits the guest of honor at the membership rally.

Arrange to hold the membership rally at the end of the two months. Have good music, recitations and decorations provided by the major wing, and a nut party or fruit social to be furnished by the minor wing.

Do not fail to have on hand the pledge cards, good literature, benefits and picture cards to be distributed where they are needed. Sometimes a china sociable is very profitable and enjoyable. Each pupil earns enough to buy a cup and saucer, or small piece for decoration; these brought together make a very pretty display, and may be sold or given away, as may seem best; the former plan is the better, since the principle of working for what is possessed ought to be instilled into the life of every boy and girl. Wisely directed efforts are the basis of character-building, and the combining of beauty with utility is a very important lesson.

In every possible way keep the temperance ball rolling. Agitate, educate, undertake, until the death blow is dealt to the saloon power.

Chicago.

Timely Hints.

ONE of the New Jersey Legions last summer maintained an ice water barrel on the main street of the town. On the barrel was printed, "Loyal Temperance Legion," and no doubt many a thirsty passer-by who stopped to drink of the pure cold water, was impressed by this silent testimony for temperance.

Encourage the members of the Legion to have their own flower-beds and raise flowers for the Flower Mission work. It will mean more to them if they are gathered from their own gardens. Observe Flower Mission Day, June 9, in the Legions. Teach the boys and girls about Jennie Casseday and the work she inaugurated.

Place temperance and mercy books in the Sunday school or town library.

Send THE YOUNG CRUSADER to poor children or to Institutions for children in your vicinity.

Entertain the Sunday school teachers at a reception and inform them on the work of the L. T. L. and Seniors. Often their prejudice can thus be turned into sympathy.

Remember the Sunset Prayer Pledge: "I will faithfully endeavor to observe seven o'clock as the hour of prayer for the Loyal Temperance Legion, particularly for the advancement of L. T. L. work in our own community."

Response of Herman W. Zimmerman, Berks County.

There is never a time when I feel more like turning face about and fleeing than when I am required to do public talking. I would rather any time do individual temperance work.

On behalf of the L. T. L.'s of Berks county, I extend to you greeting, and welcome to our beautiful city by the hills, hoping that your stay with us may be one of the most pleasant memories in your L. T. L. career.

At Pittsburg last year we bade you come to Reading. Our invitation was accepted. You have come, and have almost overwhelmed us with numbers, with enthusiasm, and with good reports. We are glad you came to this convention—to us Berks contains the "grandest" in our recollection—to be fired with a holier purpose and higher aims for our glorious L. T. L.

Response of Gertrude Rhoads, Chester County.

Dear Legioners of Pennsylvania: In coming before you to-night to represent Chester county Loyal Temperance Legion, I feel how great a responsibility rests upon the county officers of this organization. They and the superintendent determine, to a large extent, the power of the Legion, for they must be the leaders. The work of our county as an organized body has just begun, although it has known the Legion for many years. There is no doubt that it has now begun to move forward with more zeal to accomplish its work. Since organization we have felt more life and enthusiasm in our midst and proved it to you by the number of delegates to this Convention. We trust that the progress will be good during the coming year.

The Loyal Temperance Legion has not discharged its duties when it fulfills its own requirements. It owes much to its mother, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and every true Legioner will remember his duty and be glad to discharge it. This mother taught us to hate the liquor traffic and to join the army fighting to put it down. She taught us how to fight and encouraged us in all our efforts, and there can be no doubt that she is glad to have this Loyal Temperance Legion of Pennsylvania as an ally. May we be ever true to the principles they have taught us.

Response of Mary A. Wert, Cumberland County.

The Legioners of Cumberland county send you greetings. We, of Old Cumberland, have endeavored to make our work a success, and in the future we mean to press on till the victory is won.

"Press on! there's no such word as fail;
Press nobly on! the goal is near;
Ascend the mountain! breast the gale!
Look upward, onward, never fail!
Why shouldst thou faint? Heaven smiles above
Though storm and vapor intervene;
That sun shines on, whose name is love,
Serenely o'er life shadowed scene.

Press on! surmount the rocky steeps,
Climb boldly o'er the torrent's arch;
He fails alone who feebly creeps;
He wins who dares the hero's march.
Be thou a hero! let thy might
Tramp on eternal snows its way,
And through the ebony walls of night
Hew down a passage unto day.

With "Press on" for our watchword, with our minds and hearts possessed with an enthusiastic and untiring perservance, our efforts along the line of this, our chosen work, are bound to culminate in glorious realizations of those things for which we have so long prayed and toiled. We have been traveling through a wilderness surrounded by manifold evils, which we have been constantly combating, and we have been content to see in imagination the end toward which we are striving. But we know that soon the sun of truth shall scatter the mists and we shall stand in full view of the glorious Land of Promise. Then shall we indeed wear the victor's crown. Let no one despair and become faint of heart. Noble, consecrated women have led us on to victories in the past, and as they responded to the summons, "Enter thou into the joys of thy Lord," their mantles have fallen upon other noble, consecrated women, who shall lead us on to victory after victory, until we, too, may hear the divine benedic-

The Double Standard.

THE opening of a tea room and cigaret parlor for women by a prominent New York society woman, has afforded opportunity for masculine editors throughout the country to free their minds and tell the public just what they think of the type of woman that deliberately appropriates their long cherished vices. One of them thus expresses himself:

"If the women take to staining their pretty fingers and befouling the feminine sweetness of their breath with nicotine in its nastiest form, what shall we have left to respect them for? This will be a dreary old world when women are merely lightweight men. If they cease to maintain the standard of refinement, what chance will there be for the survival of social ideals?"

Why this epidemic of protest and remonstrance on the part of the men? Can they not tolerate in their wives that which for years they have been diligently cultivating in their own lives? Would they deprive their women friends of that sweet solace which furnishes them so much joy? Volumes have been written on the delights of the weed. It is the exceptional man who fails to spiritedly defend it when attacked by a woman. Why this somewhat hysterical expostulation when woman would share with him these pleasures? The editor before quoted even suggests with some force that if the cigar and cigaret habit is to be prevalent among womankind, marriage will become unpopular.

Much as one must deplore the tendency on the part of a certain class of women to befoul their dainty persons with this disgusting habit, may it not be possible that it will afford the cigar-smoking portion of mankind the opportunity to see themselves as others—especially feminine others—have long seen them? If a man who finds enjoyment in the weed, first hand, cannot endure the nicotine-tainted breath in his wife, let him try to imagine how the mothers and wives, the sweethearts, sisters and daughters have borne with it since the days when Sir Walter Raleigh borrowed the uncleanly custom from the savages.

Perhaps woman has grown weary of being regarded as the sole fountain from which shall flow all the ideals of purity and refinement for the race. We do not believe for a moment that she has; no true woman does believe it. With Mrs. Russell Sage, we would affirm our confidence in the women of this country in saying: "My faith in American women is so great that I do not believe she ever will do anything that will lower the moral tone of her country." Men need not fear that the springs of refinement and true womanliness are drying up in the souls of the women of the nation, nor that in the near future will be experienced a social famine of those old-fashioned graces which beautify the home life. If such calamity should befall, man could blame only himself. Woman, dainty and cleanly by nature, would never have taken the initiative in such a habit, neither will she pursue it if she find it is belittling her in the eyes of the men whom she respects and loves. With men lie the remedy, and the more severe their condemnation and criticism, however unjust it may be in the light of their past attitude, the better for women, for such expressions will act as a positive deterrent with the better class of women.

Still more swift would be the reform if, coupled with the criticism, there might be a chivalrous appreciation of a common weakness and a realization that the same high standard of cleanliness of body, mind and soul must be maintained by man and woman alike, without which the future of society is imperiled.

British or American Workman?

IT was Mr. Mosely, a sagacious and wealthy English manufacturer, who conceived the plan of sending a large commission of British experts to make a comparative study of the British and the American workman. And it was Mr. Mosely himself who defrayed the expenses of this remarkable commission. The members of it, picked from the various trades and leading industries, were instructed to make a thorough study both of men and of labor conditions in this country. The report of this comparative investigation has been published, and it makes exceedingly interesting reading.

Some of the leading questions set before them were these: Which workman, the American or the British, is better equipped by early training and education for his work? Which workman, on the average, does more in an hour? Which has the longer hours of work? Which needs most "overlooking?" Are the American employers more accessible to their men than are English employers? Can the careful, sober, steady man, whilst keeping himself efficient, save more in America than in England? Is the American working man temperate and sober? How does the value of the American wage compare with that of the English, cost of living being taken into the account? On the whole, in which country are the general conditions of life of the workman most favorable?

On nearly all these points the answer of the Mosely commission are emphatic and in favor of the American conditions of labor and of wholesome living.

The gratifying statement is made that "drunkenness is here comparatively unknown." Says one of the commissioners, "Americans have seen clearly enough that the greatest force to enable them to win their way in the world's markets is education, and they have made wonderful strides of late to improve this."

Mr. Mosely, summing up the results of this very notable line of international study, says for the British employer:

"If we are to hold our own in the commerce of the world, both masters and men must be up and doing. Old methods must be dropped, old machinery abandoned. Practical education of the masses must be instituted and carried out with efficiency. The bulk of our workmen are already both sober and intelligent, but with many of them there is urgent need for them to become more sober, more rational, more ready to adopt new ideas in place of antiquated methods, and improved machinery whenever produced, and to get the best possible results from a day's work."

But the most significant thing about all this unique form of so open-minded investigation and study is the evidence it gives as to how closely the questions of education, of temperance, of personal character, are now seen to be linked in with the whole labor problem.

A Bill of Particulars.

"THE saloons pay $1,200 into the treasury," says a South Dakota paper, "and we need the money to run the village government and pay outstanding indebtedness."

There are people who live continually in the comfortable consciousness of accumulating credits on one side of their account books, never taking the trouble to turn the page to see what debits may be entered thereon; who never strike a balance until some sad day when they are obliged to face a disconcerting overdrawn account. The citizens of this Dakota town seem to be related to that class. What they need is a full, detailed bill of particulars, revealing to them not only the credit but the debit side of their account and presenting for their inspection and contemplation a truthful balance sheet. No more interesting nor fascinating piece of bookkeeping can be imagined.

Another Dakota editor, in commenting upon the situation, furnishes interesting data for the experiment. Over against this credit of $1,200 secured from saloon licenses, he says, must be placed an enormous debit of $10,000 of uncollectible debts incurred in the legitimate business houses of the town, caused by the drinking habits of the debtors. There should follow a long list of impoverished homes, many foreclosed mortgages upon homesteads, a few bank defalcations, likewise not a few burglaries, a goodly number of accidents and consequent damage suits resulting from unsteady legs and hands—traceable directly to alcoholic indulgence—an unusual accumulation of doctor's bills for lacerated heads of wives and children, and various sicknesses caused by lack of food and fuel.

We are told by sociologists that the value of any man who has an average earning capacity of $500 per annum, viewing him solely as a piece of mechanism, is at a low estimate $10,000. If this be true, one more stupendous item must be added, for it is an insignificant liquor enterprise that does not each year make way with a dozen men.

It is quite clear, therefore, that even though the catechism of this Dakota town reads: "The chief end of man is to accumulate the almighty dollar," the result at the end of the year will be a financial disappointment. This, however, is viewing the question from a mere money standard. Viewed from a manhood standard, one is appalled at the awful discrepancy that the town must face. There is no quicker nor easier road to civic bankruptcy than by this route. A city's capital ought never to be estimated by the amount of wealth in its treasury, but rather by its potentialities of manhood, its enterprise, its industry and thrift as manifested in the persons of its citizens. Nothing will more rapidly drain such resources nor depreciate their value than the placing of a few legalized saloons and dram shops in their midst. Even if at the end of the fiscal year the municipal treasury be overflowing—and no such instance is on record—that which represents real value in the community will be found wanting, and on its municipal ledger will be discovered an awful minus balance of integrity and virtue.

Kansas Women and Resubmission.

DR. JOSEPH T. BERRY, editor of The Epworth Herald, spent three weeks in Kansas recently, visiting all parts of the state. He says editorially:

I had opportunity to talk with all sorts of people about the prohibitory law. I obtained the views of ministers, teachers, lawyers, merchants, politicians, editors, and hotel men. There is not the slightest question but that prohibition is more thoroughly entrenched in the confidence of the people of Kansas than ever before. During the session of the legislature recently adjourned an agitation looking toward the resubmission of the issue to the voters of the state was begun. I do not think those who started the agitation had strong hope that such a movement would succeed. It was intended to test public sentiment. Well, it did that very thing. The proposition was buried under an avalanche of 'nays,' and the agitators wished they had not invited the protest. It will be many a day before anyone will make another attempt to secure resubmission. And even if the legislature could be induced to submit the issue to the voters of the state, prohibition will be reaffirmed by a majority which would fairly startle the country.

This refers to the petition work carred on by the state W. C. T. U., which placed in the hands of the Kansas legislators 20,460 signatures protesting against resubmission in any form.

Flower Mission Day. The approach of June 9, the Red Letter Day which commemorates the birthday anniversary of Miss Jennie Casseday, our first superintendent of the Flower Mission department, should inspire all workers to a special effort along this line. The program given in our last issue will require but little time for preparation and it is certain to awaken the interest of those who are not familiar with this beautiful work. Our missionaries to foreign countries find that the Flower Mission opens the way to hearts and homes otherwise unresponsive to our special message. Mrs. Addie Northam Fields writes from Mexico: "The ninth of June last year we observed Flower Mission day by a parlor meeting, the most successful meeting of the year. About sixty of the finest ladies of the American colony were present. We had a very interesting program and the number of flowers sent in would have astonished anybody from the States. Immense bouquets were sent to each person in the American Hospital and many to people who were ill outside." Mrs. Fields asks for suggestions for further work in this department. Those of our workers at home who have not a perfect understanding of what we aim to accomplish by means of "God's messengers," should address the National superintendent, Miss Lella M. Sewall, 330 Massachusetts Ave., Boston, Mass.

Summer Meetings. In the program for the Thirtieth Annual Assembly at Lake Chautauqua, N. Y., one week, August 3-8, is dedicated as "Liquor Problem Week." There is to be "a broad survey of this field from the physiological, sociological, moral and religious points of view." An hour on Tuesday afternoon, August 4, is given for the presentation of the work, plans and principles of the National W. C. T. U. On August 11-13 there will be a New England W. C. T. U. Institute at Old Orchard, Me. The presidents of all the New England states and other white ribboners will participate.

The World's Convention. From letters and reports received we judge that the coming World's Convention will be the most successful in our history. Many of the most remote countries are sending their full quota of delegates, and the party from England will be unusually large. Our American contingent sailed from New York on May 16 and will reach London in time to attend the annual meeting of the B. W. T. A., at which time Lady Henry Somerset will deliver her farewell address as National president. An acting vice-president will be elected for the year, in the hope that Lady Henry's health will be restored sufficiently to enable her to accept the presidency again twelve months hence.

Personal Mention.

Mrs. Bertha Fitch-Forbes, former Y secretary of Michigan, accompanied by her husband, made a pleasant call on the editors recently. Mr. and Mrs. Forbes were en route from Sparta, Mich., to the Pacific coast, where they expect to locate. Spokane, Washington, will be their home for the present.

Miss Annie A. Robbins, National lecturer, spent last week in Chicago and took occasion to exchange greetings with the editors. Miss Robbins has recently closed a successful itinerary in Florida, and now goes to the state of Minnesota for a year. Her address for that length of time will be 721 12th Ave. S. E., Minneapolis, Minn.

Delegates and visitors to the World's Convention have looked in upon the editors while passing through Chicago on their way to New York, the sailing port. Among these were Mrs. G. W. Brown, of Augusta, Kansas, president of the local union; Mrs. Findley, of Pond Creek, Oklahoma, and Mrs. Satella Penman, of Rock Rapids, Iowa.

Experience Corner

COMRADES, ALL:—Not long ago, THE UNION SIGNAL, with characteristic wisdom, urged upon members of the W. C. T. U. prompt and uniform and unremitting payment of dues into the local treasury. A friend of this corner, a white ribbon woman, whose employment usurps the entire first five working days of the week, writes that since she could attend the union meeting only on Saturday, and as it is never held on that day, she is inclined to count this "taxation without representation."

Granted. But we live under majority rule in our organization, and one of the lessons we women have to learn and need to learn is peaceful submission to rightful authority. In this case that authority is the majority. A Saturday meeting bars out more than the day now used, evidently, or the day would be changed.

But who would fail to be counted with the host now holding hands forward "without wrath or doubting," the host composed of the very elect in all churches and in all communities? Not I, surely, nor this busy correspondent. Whether or not we may take part in discussions that determine the local polity of the society, we know the foundation principles, and with our badge always proclaiming them, "we all belong."

Some sort of influence has sent into this quiet corner a regular rush of items and opinions on the attitude of the medical fraternity towards us; especially in the line where some of them may think we meddle with their dignified and circumspect and professional business, in a certain very practical department of ours. No set of earthly residents believe more in minding their own business than we do, we working white ribboners. But when it comes to the kind of "remedies" given our children—and every child belongs to us—we firmly take our stand against alcohol.

If I might use three columns this month, I should love to reprint an editorial from a secular paper, headed "Once More the Insidious Peruna," in which this "exhilarating beverage," common alike to prohibition and license territory and sometimes bearing the endorsement of ministers of the gospel and other folks who ought to learn better, is held up to the most withering and well deserved contempt. Its wholesale invasion of the best side of advertising newspapers and the blind side of respectable homes calls for a bugle blast of remonstrance, in which let us all help that doughty reformer Martha M. Allen.

How? Send to her, at Syracuse, New York, for the documents in which she gives the chemical analysis of this and of some other juices of Inferno. If you do not happen to know she is National superintendent of non-alcoholics in medicine, get up a "National Drill" in your union, from our "Annual Leaflet of the W. C. T. U." The patented nostrums of the country, with Peruna well in the lead, are likely to take every stronghold of family life with their alcoholic potency, and Christian women, intelligently armed with the facts of the case, are the only effectual resistants of this immediate danger.

"You cannot get many of the women of your town out to the union, to listen to such facts?"

Go to them, then. Few parlors will close their doors to a social gathering or a mothers' meeting where this is tactfully interwoven with a general good time. There is no "cannot" in all the W. C. T. U. dictionary, you know.

On this very line, of such interest to each of us, I am glad to note that the late meeting of the American Medical Association, through its hygiene and science department, is trying to impress upon physicians throughout the country the necessity of co-operating with the Census Bureau, not only in trying to more perfectly record vital statistics, but in improving on the methods of determining the causes of death.

It might be startling, but it would be an undisguised blessing to the future if the obituary column sometimes had these added words: "Died of Boggs Bitters;" "Died of Health Beer;" "Died of Mrs. Winslow." May these medical solons and their governmental co-adjutants in the Census Bureau be given full sway!

MOTHER EXPERIENCE.

There are no disappointments to those whose wills are buried in the will of God.—F. W. Faber.

Soul! wouldst thou from the battle shrink,
Dost thou beneath the burden sink,

O'ercome and triumph here!

We shall be glad—really glad—of everything that has come to us, no matter if it is sorrow or pain, when we find that our experience fits some one's else need, that some one else can build our lives.—Maltbie Davenport Babcock, D. D.

There are cheerful hearts and lives that are glad,
Which wake to a day of praise;
There are those whose hearts for a weary while
Have long forgotten the joy and smile
Of life's sunshiny days.

So easily day by day
Remember the lives which grieve and are sad,
And, remembering, strive to make them glad,
And brighten life's sombre gray.

It is true that love cannot be forced, that it cannot be made to order, that we cannot love because we ought or even because we want. But we can bring ourselves into the presence of the lovable. Red-Letter Day.
June 9, Flower Mission Day.
BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF MISS JENNIE CASSEDAY.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR SISTERS: Mrs. Annie G. Darley, National superintendent of the department of Work Among Foreign Speaking People, is having calls for Japanese literature. If she succeeds in publishing leaflets in that language, it will be the twentieth different language in which she prints literature for her department.

Mrs. A. S. Bowen, president of the Georgia No. 2 union, is seriously ill and may have to go to a hospital before she is better. Owing to her condition the state convention will have to be deferred beyond the date originally intended. Mrs. Lucy Thurman is now in Georgia, having visited several of the colored state unions, organized locals, addressed colleges and seminaries and assisted at state conventions.

Mrs. Eugenia F. St. John is reported as ill and probably will not be able to do much work this summer, but her husband, Dr. St. John, a staunch temperance worker, who has been in the field for a number of years, is available for Chautauquas and other summer gatherings.

An elaborate invitation to the dedication of the St. Louis Exposition was received at National headquarters. It bore an embossed cover and the invitation proper was duly signed by the president of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, David R. Francis, and by Thomas H. Carter, president of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition Commission; also by the joint committee on ceremonies, but no one at this end of the line was able to grace the occasion by her presence and doubtless we were not missed among the thousands upon thousands that thronged St. Louis upon this notable occasion.

Rest Cottage had a call lately from Dr. Levi B. Salmans, a missionary of the M. E. Church to Guanajuato, Mexico, and Miss Ella M. Dunmore, also a Methodist missionary to the same place and president of the largest W. C. T. U. there. They were accompanied by a Mexican gentleman greatly interested in temperance and education. Dr. Salmans was about to bring out a temperance song book for Mexico, some months ago, when his office and papers were burned. He is endeavoring to replace the material for the book.

The party reported Mrs. Fields as doing a great work in Mexico. The educated classes there seem to be greatly aroused on the question of temperance and are ready to work not only along moral suasion and educational lines, but along legislative lines as well. Dr. Salmans said it would be a great calamity to take Mrs. Fields from Mexico at the present time as the City of Mexico alone keeps her busy by constant calls upon her for advice and information in carrying out their plans for temperance, and other places are calling for her also. A number could be kept busy all the time in helping the people who are so eager for information. In the City of Mexico they have closed the saloons on Sundays, feast and fete days and indeed on all holidays, which is most remarkable, as these are the days when the populace most do congregate in the saloons.

We were sorry to hear some time ago that Miss Anna Downey, one of our most active National evangelists, was suddenly forced to stop work because of serious illness from which we hope she may speedily recover.

White ribboners will sympathize with Mrs. L. E. Bailey in the damage done her home by the fire which destroyed the auditorium at Prohibition Park, Long Island, and partially destroyed her house. Mrs. Bailey is absent in Florida and at this writing had not ascertained the extent of her loss, but felt almost heart-broken at the damage to the home she had toiled so hard and patiently to acquire.

Mrs. Ella M. Thacher has gotten out a new Memorial Day leaflet for her soldier boys. The cover has a little medallion head of Miss Willard in blue and the American flag in colors and the leaflet is tied with narrow red, white and blue ribbon. It is right to the point—and may it reach and save many of our boys.

Word has been received at National headquarters that the niece of Miss Anna and Miss Elizabeth Gordon has just passed away in Iowa, and that Bishop Foster, father of our National press correspondent, Miss Eva K. Foster, has closed his life's work here on earth. I am sure the sympathy of white ribboners will go out to these and all other sufferers from loss of friends and sickness and they seem to be not a few these days.

Saturday, the sixteenth, Mrs. Stevens, Miss Gordon and our other white ribboners steamed away from New York bound for the World's Convention. Let us follow them with our prayers as well as our love.

Yours for the work,
SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Superintendents.

Soldiers and Sailors.

DEAR COMRADES: The work is broadening and extending until the "Isles of the Sea" are being heard from. Memorial Day will soon be here and the special new leaflet is ready at $1.00 per hundred not punched for the ribbon to tie the little bow of white, or red, white and blue; if punchod, $1.25 per hundred. This leaflet is called "The Blue and the Gray" and is to be given the Confederate as well as the Union soldier and sailor.

I like the new custom of sprinkling the "waters" with flowers, in the memory of our sailor dead. If it is not done in your town or city, the W. C. T. U. can introduce this solemn rite, and show that we remember the sailor as well as the soldier dead.

We need more comfort bags; there are over 150 pledged boys awaiting this little token of our love and sympathy. More than 200 bags are in my house awaiting supplies.

The Frances E. Willard room in the Sailors' Rest, at Newport News, where thousands of our jackies congregate under good Chaplain Steele, still needs some articles of furniture. As your National superintendent of this department gave the $25.00 for this room, she would be glad if part of it, at least, could be sent her by the white ribboners.

Our union at Delaware City is progressing finely. A framed picture of our dear Miss Willard is needed there, to place under the flag which I sent them; who will help in these gifts? What is done must be done quickly.

Yours for service,
ELLA M. THACHER.

Social Meetings and Red Letter Days.

MY DEAR CO-WORKERS: As I read the reports from the various states in THE UNION SIGNAL, I am pleased to know that you are holding social meetings, and that you do not forget the Red Letter Days. This is very encouraging and I shall be disappointed if I do not receive a fine report from each state superintendent next September. I think that the unions holding membership contests always close with a social, and the members gained on this evening could be counted in our department. Please bear this in mind.

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, our National President, has requested me to prepare a sketch of Miss Anna A. Gordon, to be read by members of the W. C. T. U., and its two branches on the Red Letter Day, July 21, which is Miss Gordon's birthday. A portion of this sketch was written by Miss Willard June 8. 1897, a few months before she left us. This appreciation, with contributions by Mrs. Katherine Lente Stevenson and Miss Eva Kilbreth Foster greatly enhance the value of the sketch. This booklet and those of "Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens," "Why We Belong," and "Our Work," can be purchased from the W. T. P. A., 184 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill., or from me; price ten cents each.

The name of the street where I reside has been changed. Please note the address given below, which also appears on my newly printed leaflets.

Yours with the desire to serve,
MARY D. TOMLINSON.

Proportionate and Systematic Giving.

LAST year's offer of five dollars' worth of literature to the state superintendent who gives evidence of the most careful, thorough and painstaking work for this department, is renewed this year. It is not so much for the amount of work accomplished as for the real effort to reach out. Last year New York and California South stood so nearly equal as to outreaching and constant care that five dollars' worth of literature was sent to each. Now, to whom shall it go this year?

ESTHER PUGH.

FROM THE BENCH.

A Judge Commends Pure Food.

A Judge of a Colorado Court said: "Nearly one year ago I began the use of Grape-Nuts as a food. Constant confinement indoors and the monotonous grind of office duties had so weakened and impaired my mental powers that I felt the imperative need of something which neither doctors nor food specialists seemed able to supply.

"A week's use of Grape-Nuts twice each day convinced me that some unusual and marvelous virtue was contained therein. My mental vigor returned with astonishing rapidity; brain weariness (from which I had constantly suffered) quickly disappeared; clearness of thought and intellectual health and activity which I had never previously known were to me the plain results of a few months use of this food.

"Unhesitatingly I commend Grape-Nuts as the most remarkable food preparation which science has ever produced so far as my knowledge and experience extends." Name and address furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The judge is right. Grape-Nuts food is a certain and remarkable brain builder and can be relied upon. There's a reason.

DR. SHOOP'S

Rheumatic Cure

Costs Nothing If It Fails.

Any honest person who suffers from Rheumatism is welcome to this offer.

I am a specialist in Rheumatism, and have treated more cases than any other physician, I think. For 16 years I made 2,000 experiments with different drugs, testing all known remedies while searching the world for something better. Nine years ago I found a costly chemical in Germany which, with my previous discoveries, gives me a certain cure.

I don't mean that it can turn bony joints into flesh again; but it can cure the disease at any stage, completely and forever. I have done it fully 100,000 times.

I know this so well that I will furnish my remedy on trial. Simply write me a postal for my book on Rheumatism, and I will mail you an order on your druggist for six bottles Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Cure. Take it for a month at my risk. If it succeeds, the cost is only $5.50. If it fails, I will pay the druggist myself—and your mere word shall decide it.

I mean that exactly. If you say the results are not what I claim, I don't expect a penny from you.

I have no samples. Any mere sample that can affect chronic Rheumatism must be drugged to the verge of danger. I use no such drugs, and it is folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

My remedy does that even in the most difficult, obstinate cases. It has cured the oldest cases that I ever met. And in all my experience—in all my 2,000 tests—I never found another remedy that would cure one chronic case in ten.

Write me and I will send you the order. Try my remedy for a month, as it can't harm you anyway. If it fails it is free.

Address Dr. Shoop, Box 948, Racine, Wis.

Mild cases, not chronic, are often cured by one or two bottles. At all druggists.

The W. C. T. U. reading room at Platteville, Wis., is well patronized. The average attendance is about twenty-six each evening. The union has been cheered by liberal donations for the room, among them being two dozen chairs from the city and 100 books from Mrs. Cora Rountree Hathaway.

Mrs. Henry D. Annable, president of Kings county, N. Y., union, spoke on "The Women of the World in Missions and Temperance" before the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the M. E. church. The address was illustrated by young women dressed in the costumes of the different countries.

The Livingston county, N. Y., institute met in Dansville. An interesting symposium on "What next can be done to rid the world of the drink and tobacco habits?" was discussed by several of Dansville's leading citizens. The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, former president of the Illinois W. C. T. U.

Hudson county, N. J., held its semi-annual meeting at Jersey City, April 9. It was essentially a meeting for general discussion of the work in the various unions. Interesting topics brought out an exchange of ideas and plans for general improvement. Mrs. Isabella Demarest, state corresponding secretary, was the speaker of the evening.

Mrs. R. H. Jones, president of the Norfolk, Va., union, had a narrow escape from death while alighting from an electric car. She was struck by a car going in the opposite direction. The motorman stopped the car instantly and though Mrs. Jones was under the fender the wheels had not touched her. She escaped with some painful bruises.

The most successful institute in the history of Herkimer county, N. Y., has just closed at Ilion. Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, National organizer, and Mrs. Frances W. Graham, state corresponding secretary, were present. Many interesting papers were read and discussed. Rev. E. V. Stevens of Herkimer closed the session with an address on "How to Stand for the Best in Christianity."

Ashland, Wis., W. C. T. U. has an excellent press superintendent. The union showed its appreciation by presenting her with a beautiful china plate at its last meeting, and white ribbon refreshments were served. These consisted of wafers tied with white ribbon, white cake with white icing, coffee with cream, as white as consistent with its richness, and white sugar, of course.

Yolo county, Cal., held its seventeenth annual convention at Winters not long ago. Mrs. Mary Case Lord, editor of "The Pacific Ensign," Mrs. Annie Little Barry, state recording secretary, and Mrs. Emily Hoppin, state treasurer, were present. Mrs. Mary Tongier of Los Angeles gave a brilliant address. An appropriation of six dollars was made to send THE UNION SIGNAL to local unions.

Mrs. Emma Spencer Townsend, the Friend minister who lately resigned a six years' pastorate to devote herself to the state superintendency of the Christian Citizenship department in Ohio, has been called to the Deanship of Earlham College, Indiana. She has taken it only temporarily, with intent to return at the close of the school year to her own state and the important W. C. T. U. work of which she is the head.

Mrs. L. E. Bailey, who has been doing successful work in Florida for four months, will remain there during May. Already there are 336 active and 114 honorary members as a result of her work, with eight unions organized and as many more reorganized, beside the organization of three Loyal Temperance Legions. June first Mrs. Bailey goes to Ohio, where she will remain until after the National convention.

Although the Arkansas Anti-Saloon League fathered the dispensary bill in the legislature last winter the W. C. T. U., with only 382 members, set itself against and defeated the bill. "The Searchlight" is the Anti-Saloon League paper and the W. C. T. U. pays for space in it as its official organ. Through its columns was sent out their slogan against the dispensary bill. The situation was slightly amusing.

Mrs. Mae M. Whitman of California has been appointed acting National superintendent of Temperance and Labor by Mrs. Mary G. Stuckenberg, who is now in Europe. All communications pertaining to the department should be addressed to Mrs. Mae M. Whitman, Campbell, Santa Clara county, Cal.

Dayton, Oregon, union conducted a successful silver medal contest with a class of five girls and boys. Mr. Hanville won the medal, and a second prize of one of Miss Willard's books was given to Miss Sadie Waggoner. The receipts were twenty-one dollars which enabled the union to redeem its pledge for state work, contribute to the Memorial Fund, donate something to the county work and pay off a debt of long standing.

Of Miss Rose Davidson, Y secretary of Colorado, a state critic writes: "She is an acquisition indeed to our working forces; cultivated, attractive, a young woman of whom to be proud and for whom to be thankful. Her rendition of 'A Singular Life' is marvelously fine, suitable for the most critical circles. She is, besides, very helpful in other ways in the institute work where she helps Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford, the acting state president."

Newberg, Oregon, union gave a reception April 17 at the home of the president, Mrs. R. W. Kelsey, in honor of Mrs. Kelsey Trowbridge, of Nebraska, who spent the winter here with her brother, Rev. H. Gould, and Mrs. Kelsey, of Chicago, who has been visiting her son, Prof. R. W. Kelsey of Pacific College. A large number of guests were present, and a pleasant afternoon was spent. A progressive conversazione was one of the features of entertainment.

That a prophet is not always without honor in her own country was evidenced in the recognition accorded Mrs. Lucia H. F. Additon, National organizer. Two receptions were tendered her just before she left home for an extended trip. The first was by the Frances Willard union of Portland, Oregon, all the other unions in this, her home county, uniting. The second reception was given by Mrs. Additon's home union. There were many pleasing features of both meetings.

The annual report of the secretary of the Marshall, Mich., union shows much good work accomplished. Prizes were awarded for the best three books of clippings on the effects of alcohol and tobacco on the human system. These books, together with a beautifully framed picture of Frances E. Willard, were presented to the high school. Much literature has been distributed and food and clothing sent to needy families. Marshall, with its 110 members, is the banner union in Calhoun county.

Faith union of Denver, Col., lately came off victor in a case against a saloonkeeper who was accused of selling liquor to minors. Five complaints were entered against him, two of them being made by members of Faith union, one of whom was mother of the main witness for the union, a boy of eleven years of age, while the boy's father was the saloonkeeper's witness. The boy told a straightforward story and the court was not long in fixing the fine at twenty-five dollars and costs.

Payne county, Ok., held a two days' convention in Stillwater, at which forty-two delegates and many visitors were present. Mrs. Dorothy J. Cleveland, territorial president, Mrs. Kate McWethy, territorial treasurer, and other distinguished guests were in attendance. There was a gold medal contest and an address by Prof. Jamison of the public schools. His topic was "How can we best impress temperance principles upon the children?" During convention week the local union edited and managed the Stillwater daily newspaper. This venture was a success in every way and placed $36.82 in the local treasury.

To know by rote is no knowledge; it is only a retention of what is entrusted to the memory. That which a man truly knows may be disposed of without regard to the author, or reference to the book from whence he had it.—Montaigne.

A Useless Member.

"YES," said Aunt Sarah, surveying her bandaged wrist, "the doctor says it's a bad sprain; and the minister says I know now how the church feels, in not having the use of all its members. The minister didn't mean that for just a joke, either; he looked at me as if he wanted to see how I'd take it. I had sense enough, too, to feel I deserved to have him say it to me. A word like that comes home pretty straight when one of your members is useless, and worse.

"I've never thought just what being a member of the church meant before, though I've been one for thirty-five years. I've never felt obliged to do what the church wanted done. I felt it was a favor, my doing it at all, and half the time I let someone else do it instead. When I was through with work at home, and with what things I liked to do outside, then I was willing to do something in the church—if it was the kind of work that suited me. I guess I've been just about as useful a member to the church as the sprained hand is to me, all stiff and crippled, and refusing to bend more than an inch or two.

"There's lots of things I need to do, but I can't use this member to do them—that's certain. That's the way the minister has felt about me, I guess. I've been a useless member for thirty-five years, that's the long and short of it; and, if the rest of the members had been like me, the church would have been as paralyzed as old Cousin Josiah Jones, that can't move hand nor foot. I'm ashamed of myself—I truly am—and things are going to be different from now on," and Aunt Sarah nodded her head with firm determination, as she looked at the church spire from her window.—Forward.

BE INDEPENDENT.

It's Easy to Shake Off the Coffee Habit.

There are many people who make the humiliating acknowledgement that they are dependent upon Coffee to "brace them up" every little while. These have never learned the truth about Postum Cereal Coffee which makes leaving off coffee a simple matter and brings health and strength in place of coffee ills. A lady of Davenport, Iowa, who has used Postum Food Coffee for five years is competent to talk upon the subject. She says:

"I am a school teacher and during extra work when I thought I needed to be braced up I used to indulge in rich, strong coffee of which I was very fond and upon which I thought I was dependent.

"I began to have serious heart palpitation and at times had sharp pains around the heart and more or less stomach trouble. I read about Postum and got some to try. I dropped coffee, took up the Postum and it worked such wonders for me that many of my friends took it up.

"In a short time I was well again, even able to attend evening socials. And I did not miss my coffee at all. Now I can truthfully say that I have been repaid fully for the change I made, I have no indications of heart disease and not once in the past four years have I had a sick headache or bilous spell.

"My father, 78 years old, is a Postum enthusiast and feels that his good health in a large measure is due to the 6 cups of good Postum which he enjoys each day." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The University of the People.

By Minnie Barker Horning.

WHEN, more than a quarter of a century ago, the spirit of the temperance crusade reached out with its throbbing heart-sent impulse and touched the women of the nation, east and west, it found many more of them reading their cook-books than were reading the daily papers. Later when the crusade became crystallized into the greatest organization of women the world has ever known, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union became a college, it broadened into a great university. It has extended and widened until it now has thirty-five different colleges, each covering a special work of which not the least is a school of journalism.

When the women first began to write they used the only style they knew, school-day composition, verbose and flowery, covering for a small item one side of a large sheet of foolscap, and often—it is feared—both sides. But after they had been rebuffed by practical busy editors seeking for news and not essays, editorials nor secretary's reports, they began to learn the lesson that the editors wanted news, not gush, facts not fancies. While this lesson was hard and long it has been effective and the working motto of the press department is "Better one line accepted than a column rejected."

Another motto given the department by our beloved Chieftain, who has lain down her armor here, we will always keep; "So tell the world's story today as to make the world better tomorrow." That was a guiding principle with her in journalistic work.

Thanks to Miss Willard's effort the Woman's Christian Temperance Union now has trained women writers in every state, a state superintendent at their head, and local writers wherever our organization exists. These press women write without recompense other than the good they may do. Their stories are read at every breakfast table in the land. Unknown to fame they work on, inspired by that great hearted mother love that goes out to make the world a safer place for the innocent, the weak, the tempted.

More and more, as the lengthening years separate us from our long time leader, will we fall back to the words she uttered, and the instruction she gave us. This is what she said about the teaching of the press: "Each year the press becomes a greater power; more people read, and public topics are more generally discussed. I can remember when it was considered hardly polite to mention the newspaper at home; men never referred to it except when they talked with men. Women read the papers now as well as men, and though certain old school editors maintain that 'their eyes are glued to the department especially made and provided for them,' the fact is that those very eyes take in all the territory there is to be possessed. Every topic is open to their understanding, so that the reading force of the country is practically twice as large as it was when the crusade began; indeed it is quite possible that the eagerness of many an anxious woman to know what that self-same crusade was doing, may have been her first lesson in newspaper reading.

"What we now need to do, first suggested at our very first convention, is to put a pre-emption claim upon the press to spread the temperance propaganda. Every brain must be to us an open furrow, every word a seed dropped in; we must agitate, educate, organize in the minds of those who read, for the thought-world is the laboratory of reform. Quietly in our homes we can compile the world's best temperance thought and launch it forth upon the rising tide of popular intelligence. We can create a new sentiment; we have our hands upon the levers that lift the world and all 'just for the asking."

The banding together of women in the local, county, district and state unions with their pens in hand constitutes the press department of the National W. C. T. U. These superintendents have their eyes on 22,000 papers, they furnish the news of the doings of the great army of three hundred thousand W. C. T. U. women in the United States, and if false statements are made by the press, they make haste to contradict and set right even so great a power.

Not only the great metropolitan dailies are supplied with news, and watched as to their utterances, but the small local and county papers are in the list. The W. C. T. U. takes a maternal view of the press. She is like a mother hovering over her small son, she not only helps the lad to be good, but watches over and corrects him if he does wrong. Two thousand eight hundred and sixteen women in all the states are doing this work. They also write and furnish "copy" for 1,000 regular columns each week. Their work averages forty thousand columns per year.

The mission, then, of the press department is to herald the work of the unions. This presupposes working unions. An active union makes an active press superintendent. Only as the union brings about results, can a superintendent report.

Then unions be up and doing. Discuss live topics of local interest. Listen to the messages flashing over the wires, and keep in touch with the world's work. Study the laws of your city, and then help secure their enforcement. Keep yourselves before the public, by good practical, womanly, Christianly, persistent work for better conditions. Press women, whether secretary, president or press superintendent wield your pens, write the news of these wide-awake unions. Do not be discouraged if all you write is not used, nor if often none of your work appears. Keep ever on. Each little helps. Our mission is accomplished if the public reads our one line.

Remember the story of the mushrooms, the softest, weakest growth known, and how thousands of them coming up under a great granite stone in the pavement lifted it out of its place in a single night. One pen may be feeble in itself, but thousands of them united against the granite of intemperance will acomplish its uprooting.

An Editor's Tribulations.

By Mrs. Antoinette A. Hawley.

THERE lived a man of whom the world has very often heard,
Who shod a horse, or built a house, whichever you preferred;
He made a watch, or laid a wall, or paved an asphalt street,
Or painted nymphs, or carved in stone, or planted fields of wheat;
Indeed, there wasn't anything but what that chap could do,
Except to hold a perfect job up to the public view.
So he became historic, and good boys were taught to shun
The fate of Jack of all trades, who master was of none.
From that man I'm descended, and unhappily, it's true,
That of all the many sorts of things that people have to do,
I've tried my hand at most of them, and find it isn't fun
To be a Jack of all trades, with mastery of none;
For, as a woman told me once, I'm just the sort to be Available for chinking most anywhere, you see;
That's just the reason why I'm here, for once my checkered life
I striped with a few troublesome months of editorial strife,
And this program committee, doubtless hearing of that time,
Inferred the tribulations—and requested them in rhyme.
Mine was a weekly paper, as probably you knew;
And oftentimes the sheets were damp because of too much due;
And then its circulation became so languid that
Its friends just kept it moving by passing round the hat.
I took my pay in squashes, or in tallow, or in hides,
Or buttermilk, or sausages, or lard, or bacon sides,
And then I had to testify in items by the score
That such fine hides and squashes I never saw before.
Sometimes my best subscribers would send in a batch of rhyme;
And once I asked a brother what he did at such a time;
"Why, publish it," he said, "for bait; you'll often catch a fish

With angleworms like that, which might fall in some other dish."
Yet sometimes I grew desperate, when everyone in town
Had "written a few verses and thought they'd bring them down;"
And when they asked me as to space, I spoke their fearful doom,
And said: "The only space I have is in the lumber room."
They laughed at my waste basket, thinking I could truly sing,
"There's poetry of every sort in almost anything."
Then, too, the man who wrote the jokes was liable to say,
"I'm out of humor, so you needn't look for any fun today."
That made me savage; and just then it wasn't safe to try
To pull the sheep's wool over the editorial eye.
A fellow asked me if he could an article get in
To my most valued paper; I answered with a grin.
That "It depends on the size; if t'was a cup or plate,
A picture frame, or set of knives, he needn't hesitate,
But wrap it up and tie it up, without the slightest doubt
The thing would stay securely till he chose to let it out."
The people interested in the wildest sort of schemes
Expect the editor to help materialize their dreams,
And all sorts of reformers besiege the littered den,
Whose guns are just a paste pot, some scissors or a pen.
With comments that will make the people want to go and hear;
And the politicians want to run the paper on a plan
That will land them at the counter, with a pie for every man.
The editor is human and no doubt would like to be
As honest as the average, but back of him, you see,
Is the man who owns the paper, who perhaps would like to win
A franchise from the council, and will compromise with sin
To get there; so each column quite eagerly he scans
To see that nothing's published interfering with his plans.
But if by some mismanagement, an item should appear
That doesn't suit his majesty, that editor will hear
A fusillade of language that will fiercely let him know
He musn't do that thing agin, or he will have to go.
Down South they have a custom, somewhat "honored in the breach."
Of settling these matters with a pistol within reach;
But since writers are so plenty, it's a less expensive way,
To advertise his failings, and then—shut off his pay;
But seriously an editor has much with which to fight,
And many of them bravely, are standing for the right;
And you and I might falter, if we tried to fill his place,
With the bread-and-butter question always leering in our face.
So since his tribulations we can only faintly guess,
We'll assure him we appreciate the favors of the press,
And if he ever asks one, we will surely answer yes.
While we clothe our cranky notions in such real attractive dress,
And take our snubs so sweetly, and persist with so much grace,
That he will not fear to give us what we're after—simply space.

An Appreciation.

TODAY we bring to your notice THE UNION SIGNAL, our National organ, of which we as well as all other white ribboners as so justly proud. With any publication either secular or religious, it compares favorably

As to appearance. Its present dress is comparatively new, and we think admirable. The better type gives more pleasure to the eye, as does also the better quality of paper, which admits, as was formerly impossible, of fine illustrations.

Then as to cost.—where can you find the equal of "our paper" at so low a rate? $1.50 per year, with a reduction to $1.25 in clubs of ten.

Its income from advertisements, the chief source of gain to the secular papers, is limited for two reasons:—the smaller space devoted to them, and the unhesitating rejection of many of the most profitable, which find ready admittance to the secular, and even to some of the religious periodicals.

From a literary standpoint the material used in THE UNION SIGNAL is of the highest order, nothing being admitted to its pages which is not well written, and of an elevated and elevating tone; even the news notes and correspondence, in many periodicals often slighted, is subjected to as careful consideration as the more prominent departments. The contents of the paper are varied and well classified, reminding one of the abundant store of the householder in our Saviour's parable, who brought forth "out of his treasure things both new and old."

How thoroughly THE UNION SIGNAL subserves its specific purpose as the organ of the W. C. T. U., only one who reads it for herself, carefully and thoughtfully, can possibly realize. Its broad and comprehensive survey of the entire field of temperance effort throughout the world, its fresh news items, its bright letters from widely separated parts of our work, showing what is being done, and inspiring to "go and do likewise," its strong and fearless, wise and wonderfully varied editorials,—diversified programs, not only for the Red Letter Days, but for the regular meetings, Mothers' Meetings, etc., its Experience Corner, where queries concerning the many difficulties arising in our local unions are helpfully answered, as well as that for solving the entangled problems of Parliamentary Law, its letters from the National officers, the talks by superintendents and others on the various departments, especially those for the Y's and L. T. L., its uplifting Bible Readings and other helps for the spiritual side of our nature—indeed it is quite impossible to even name all those features of THE UNION SIGNAL which make it the ideal representative of our work. It is certainly invaluable and no white ribboner, no woman in sympathy with temperance work, can afford to do without it.

We certainly owe our loyal support to the paper, for only as we support it, by means of a large and well-paid subscription list, can it live and do the work for which it was established. But much as it may need us far more do we need it, and why should any one of us think to escape our share of responsibility concerning it? How can any Christian temperance woman be well equipped, "thoroughly furnished for every good work," who is not, by this world-engirdling band of love, brought into touch with every other of her kind? By it, as by an electric chain, our organization is rendered indissoluble, as we realize that we are a part of the great sisterhood—which everywhere in our broad land, in city and village and country place, sends forth its radiance of truth, purity and righteousness.

Yes, we owe it to ourselves that we have this paper, even at the cost of some sacrifice, that we may be more efficient to do our part in "gathering out the stones" from the highway of the King of Kings.

Temperance Sentiment is Spreading in Texas.

Liquor Interests Becoming Alarmed and Aid Officers in Detecting Infractions of the Law.

HOUSTON, Tex., May 15.—There is a general movement among the saloon men of the state to obey the Sunday law. A year ago there was a conference of wholesalers and brewery managers at Galveston, at which it was decided that it was to the best interest of every one in the business to have all the laws obeyed strictly, but this the retailers felt to be entirely too much to ask of them. Since then the local option sentiment has continued to spread throughout the state at a rate that was alarming to the liquor interests. Now the first-class saloonists in all of the cities have come to the conclusion that the wholesalers were right, and they have decided to aid the peace officers in enforcing the laws to the extent they think is demanded by local sentiment. In Waco the saloons are to be kept tightly closed and the saloon men helped the officers to get a conviction. At Houston the saloons are to be kept tightly closed during the church hours and nominally so during the rest of Sunday, and this rule is being adopted in the other cities and larger towns.

Rocky Road for Saloonists.

WACO, Texas, May 15.—The saloon men who have refused to close their places of business on Sunday are having a rocky road to travel. Two of the men kept open last Sunday and they have been prosecuted in the city and justice courts. It cost one of them $150 in the city court and the other $80. These same men have been prosecuted in the justice court. They have entered pleas of guilty in this court and will not fight the cases any longer. The saloon men who have entered the agreement are aiding in the prosecution.

Humboldt, Neb., Goes Dry.

New Administration Begins Reform.

HUMBOLDT, Neb., May 7.—The city yesterday entered upon its "dry" reign, and neither saloon, billiard hall, bowling alley or other similar place of amusement or resort is open. After two years of license reign the people this spring again returned to her former policy of no open saloons. The newly elected council with Mayor John Power at the head were sworn in Tuesday by Retiring Mayor C. E. Nims, and this gives the temperance element absolute control, there being but one license man, Captain Enoch, on the board as a hold-over member. Under the circumstances no effort has been made to get a license granted, and interest centered principally in the question of whether or not permits would be issued for the billiard hall and bowling alley to do business. Tuesday when the matter came up for consideration Mayor Power refused to grant permits under any circumstances.

Dram Shops Closed at Covington, Tenn.

COVINGTON, Tenn., May 7.—A truce was agreed upon yesterday afternoon between the saloonkeepers and the Anti-Saloon League of Covington, whereby the saloons were all closed last night at 10 o'clock, to remain closed for at least twenty-one days, to await the decision of the Supreme Court of the state upon an agreed case which will be carried before that court at its present sitting at Jackson from Union City, to test the validity of the tippling license taken out for twelve months, just before the passage of the Adams bill, for the purpose of evading the operations of that law.

CONSUMPTION GERMS.

Blood

GERMS OF GRIP.

THOMAS A. EDISON, the inventor, in mapping out the problems of the future, gives first place to the necessity of fighting the bacteria which gives us our diseases. Next to the actual bacteria of disease, the mosquitos and flies are the most dangerous enemies of man. The mosquito with its bite injects into our veins malaria, yellow fever, and other fatal troubles. The fly, with spongy feet, collects the invisible germs of diseases, spreads them over our food and poisons us with typhoid, cholera and other plagues of the human race. The bacteria of disease we can see only through microscopes. The bacteria of consumption is represented in the left-hand corner of the sketch above. The bacteria of influenza, or grip, is shown on the right. These little organisms can point to victories by the million, which lie in such numbers in our cemeteries. Thus far scientists have not been able to fight these bacteria very well. The best thing we can possibly do individually at present is to keep ourselves in such a state of health as will enable us to fight the bacteria with our own vitality.

GOOD RED BLOOD OUR AMMUNITION.

The blood which flows through our veins and arteries should contain healthy red blood corpuscles which are capable of warding off the attack of the disease germs if they get into the system. While we keep our blood in good condition and our little army of fighters in order we can resist fairly well the attacks from the outside. In preparing ourselves against bacterial attacks there are many important things to be thought of—proper nourishment of the blood, nerves, lungs, heart and liver. Important to us is proper food for the stomach, pure air for the lungs, exercise and cleanliness at all times. Good wholesome air taken into the lungs helps oxidize the blood and make it strong. Sunlight is also important for our well being. If our stomach is "out of whack," if the blood does not get the proper nutriment out of the food eaten, we at once weaken our defensive forces and the germs of catarrh, consumption or grip readily enter.

Dr. Pierce, the eminent physician of Buffalo, N. Y., says, "if each person will consider his system as an army of men which he controls as a general, and will see to its proper provisioning and that it has plenty of ammunition in the shape of good red blood, he will be able to overcome the enemy in the shape of the germs of disease." Every healthy person has five million red blood cells or corpuscles to every cubic millimeter of blood. The number of red blood corpuscles in the average human being is so great that it is almost incomprehensible. However, their numbers increase with health or decrease with illness or mal-nutrition. The best tonic for increasing the red blood corpuscles and building up healthy tissue is no doubt Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. This medicine has been on the market for over a third of a century and numbers its cures by the thousand.

A tonic made up largely of alcohol will shrink the corpuscles of the blood and make them weaker for resistance. A cod liver oil makes the stomach groan because it is irritating. What is needed is an alterative extract made of roots and herbs, without the use of alcohol, that will assist the stomach in assimilating or taking up from the food such elements as are required for the blood, also an alterative that will assist the activity of the liver and cause it to throw off the poisons in the blood. When we have accomplished this we have put the system in a fortified condition so strong that it can repel the germs of disease which we find everywhere—in the street-cars, the shops, the factories, the bedrooms, wherever many people congregate, or where sunlight and good air does not penetrate.

ONLY HEALTH CAN RESIST THEM.

Recent experiments have proven that the germ of consumption was present in the mouths of physicians and nurses who were in attendance on tubercular patients. They were not themselves infected on account of their power of resistance, due to perfect health. The breath one inhales from the lungs of another may contain germs of disease. You will not only be able to resist the germs of consumption, but many thousands of cases have been known where persons who were suffering from incipient phthisis, or the early stages of consumption, were absolutely cured by Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It maintains a person's nutrition by enabling him to eat, retain, digest and assimilate the proper nutritious food. It overcomes the gastric irritability and relieves indigestion, and the person is thereby saved from fever, night-sweats. headache, etc., which are so common.

$3,000 FORFEIT

Will be cheerfully paid in lawful money of the United States, by the undersigned, proprietors of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, if they cannot show the original testimonial and signature of the individual volunteering that published below, and also of every testimonial among the thousands which they are constantly publishing attesting the superior curative properties of their several medicines, thus proving the genuineness of all the multitude of testimonials volunteered by grateful people, in their behalf.

World's Dispensary Medical Association, Buffalo, N. Y.

Mrs. R. J. Hall, of Roxboro, N. C., writes: "I suffered nearly two years with jaundice and indigestion; in fact, my health failed completely. I tried everything for relief, including several doctors. Did not improve, but grew steadily worse and was given up. Was unable to do any work, and at night (after sundown) was blind, so that I would walk against chairs, etc, in room with lamp burning brightly. My husband finally wrote to Dr. Pierce, and under his advice, I began taking his 'Golden Medical Discovery.' Am happy to say that after taking six bottles I was cured. All my friends who saw me when sick and see me now, wonder at the result of your great and grand remedy. I was given up by all, doctors included, and had lost all hope myself. I feel that I owe my life to Dr. R. V. Pierce and his 'Golden Medical Discovery.' I recommend it to all my friends and to every one suffering from similar ailments."

Accept no substitute for "Golden Medical Discovery." There is nothing "just as good" for diseases of the stomach, blood and lungs.

An Irish harvester found himself in a small Scottish town. At the gasworks he saw a gasometer for the first time in his uneventful life, and stopped a countryman, who was passing to ask: "What's the big round thing there, sitting on its end?" The man scratched his head and replied, "A dinna ken." "Get out wid ye," said the Irishman, "ye niver saw a dinner can as big as that in yer life."

As to great and commanding talents they are the gift of Providence in some way unknown to us. They rise where they are least expected. They fail when everything seems disposed to produce them, or at least to call them forth.—Burke.

Because of the higher price of licenses in New York the saloonkeepers will abolish free lunches.

Because the licensed saloons in Jonesboro, Tenn., have been voted out, the citizens observed May 1st as a day of jubilee.

The Anti-Saloon League has just formed a state organization in Massachusetts. Nearly every county in the state was represented at the meeting.

A. C. Rankin, the noted temperance lecturer, is holding a series of meetings at Oskaloosa, Iowa. April 22 he spoke to a large audience composed largely of labor organizations.

The big Prohibition auditorium at Port Richmond, Staten Island, was destroyed by fire April 29. Many Prohibition conventions had been held there. The $21,000 loss was fully insured.

The Anti-Saloon League is planning an aggressive campaign in Kansas City, Mo., this summer. The co-operation of the police is promised and all vile pictures, winerooms and other violations of existing laws will be suppressed.

The entire congregation, 1,200 in number, of the Holy Saviour Roman Catholic church of Wilkesbarre, Pa., took the total abstinence pledge for one year, after a recent Sunday service. Last year 1,000 pledged themselves, and it is said all kept the pledge faithfully.

Some of the railroad contractors of the Wabash Railroad have been aroused by the frequent deaths of their laboring men. The Jefferson county, Mo., authorities have been asked to assist in arresting the men who have been selling doctored liquor, which has caused these deaths.

It is cheering to note the continuous reports of local option victories in various states. McLeansboro, Eldorado, Ridgway, Flora, Fairfield and Benton in Illinois, Tunstall and Wytheville districts in Virginia, Whitesville in Tennessee and Centerville, Mineola and Grayson county in Texas are the last ones reported.

The Prohibitionists of Polk county, Iowa, at their recent convention passed strong resolutions of condemnation of any form of license of the liquor traffic. They regret that so many legislative, judicial and executive officers owe their positions to the dominance of the saloon power, favor the repeal of the mulct law and declare for woman suffrage.

Jacob A. Riis sees the overcrowding of our city slums with great misgivings for the national welfare. He urges the necessity of meeting and checking the evil which comes from the lack of home ties, consequent on tenement conditions. In his new book, "The Peril and the Preservation of the Home," Mr. Riis points out how the advance of this trouble may be opposed.

The Americanization of children of foreign birth and parentage is the principal object of the City History Club, of New York. It is now co-operating with several organizations of allied aims in an exhibition of work done by these children. Two hundred and forty-nine scrap books were entered by the children in competition for a prize offered for the best scrap book history of New York. The exhibition has been largely attended.

Dr. Delbruck, of Bremen, president of the Anti-Alcoholic Congress, has furnished some striking information with regard to the injurious consequences of excessive beer drinking in Germany. He said the idea that beer drinking was a means of combating alcoholism was erroneous. "The belief that delirium tremens is unknown among beer drinkers is a mistake. It is impossible to convey by statistics the extent of the misery caused by beer alcoholism."

The forty-second annual convention of the National Educational Association will be held in Boston July 6-10. To the many who will attend this meeting the College Extension European tour, offered at a very low rate by the Wabash railroad, will be a matter of especial interest. The new Wabash folder, with its pictures, descriptions and accurate map of "The Hub," will be of great value to all who expect to visit Boston this summer. These folders can be obtained by addressing F. A. Palmer, 97 Adams street, Chicago.

Publishers' Notes.

The Crusader Monthly.

A very pleasant surprise is in store for the subscribers of THE CRUSADER MONTHLY (formerly the Young Crusader) as a result of the changes which commence with the June issue. While the magazine will continue to be the organ of the L. T. L. and contain the Required Readings, Legion reports, etc., it will be enlarged and greatly improved.

Departments of photography, nature study, exchange and bright, interesting stories will be regular features of this attractive illustrated magazine for young people.

If you wish your young friends to see a copy of THE CRUSADER MONTHLY send us a list of names and we will take pleasure in mailing sample copies to each one.

All L. T. L. superintendents are especially urged to forward a list of their members that sample copies may be forwarded to each. Although THE CRUSADER MONTHLY is to be enlarged and improved the subscription price will remain at 25 cents per year.

Flower Mission and Mercy Number.

It is with genuine pleasure that we announce the beautiful Flower Mission and Mercy number of THE CRUSADER. It is not only brim full of the glad spirit of these departments, but it presents fresh and interesting material of sufficient variety for a full Flower Mission program. There are recitations, stories, anecdotes, besides reports of the world-wide work and helps and suggestions to superintendents regarding general methods and special day observance. Notable features are: original programs for both Seniors and Junior meetings, and several unique Flower Mission entertainments. Miss Ethel Shrigley tells just how to give a Flower Show, and Wild Flower and Bow-K parties are outlined.

This number of THE CRUSADER should reach every Legion and be scattered throughout both Sunday and day schools. Send in your orders early. Price per hundred, $2.

May Responsive Reading.

In the Responsive Reading for May, the Scriptural authority for, and great importance of, the use of Unfermented Sacramental Wine is effectively presented by Mrs. Lillian Lewis, the New York state superintendent of the department. Mrs. Lewis in a forcible manner brings out the inconsistency of using in one of the most sacred religious rites something which we everywhere else unsparingly condemn. Price 50 cents per 100.

Anti-Cigaret Helps.

Now that people everywhere are becoming awakened to the evils which follow cigaret smoking, we should push our campaign in this department with redoubled energy. Two effective helps are "An Anti-Cigaret Program," price five cents, and "The Anti-Cigaret Speaker," price ten cents, both prepared by Mrs. Ida B. Cole, associate and lecturer for the Anti-Narcotic department. The "Program," which is to be given by the boys and girls, presents the subject effectively and would make a pleasing entertainment. The numerous recitations mentioned in the program are found in the "Speaker." This book should be in the hands of every mother or teacher, who is called on to furnish "something to speak." The recitations are suited to all grades, are easily memorized and will be welcomed by the children, for whose use the book is prepared.

An Inspiring Booklet.

No more tender tribute to Miss Willard was ever penned than is found in "Frances E. Willard's Message to the Womanhood of the Age," by Rev. Frank M. Bristol, D. D., of Washington, D. C. Having been a pupil of Miss Willard, at the Northwestern University, in Evanston, Dr. Bristol speaks with knowledge of her wonderful life and its value to the world. Place the booklet in the hands of your friends, reserving a copy for your own desk, that her "message" may often inspire you. Only a limited number of copies are left. Price 15 cents.

Pennsylvania's New Libel Law.

A Move Toward The Discouragement of "Yellow" Journalism.

Jane A. Stewart, Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., May 25.—The new law affecting Pennsylvania, which has just received the approval of the state executive, is, as the governor intimates in his long and lucid public communication regarding it, likely to have an effect without as well as within the Keystone state.

The provisions of the bill are very simple. It the publication of newspapers of every class in grants that suits may be brought against journals and pecuniary damages awarded for negligence in printing statements affecting the character, reputation, or business of citizens, and requires, under penalty ranging from $500 to $1,000, that the names of those responsible for a publication shall be printed at the head of the editorial columns in each issue.

There are no inhibitions in the bill, saving that of carelessness in the ascertainment of facts and recklessness in publishing statements calculated to do injury to any individual. The law fixes responsibility and makes it incumbent on any newspaper publisher to be able to validate its statements. On the other hand any complainant must be able in court of law to prove innocence on his part of any charge, and carelessness on the part of the journals in making charges public.

Whether the purpose of the projectors of the law and of those who so enthusiastically promoted its prompt passage in the state legislature was to prevent the unjust defamation of innocent parties and to conserve and uplift the general standard of the press of the state, or whether their design was chiefly to prohibit the publication of culpable acts of wrong-doers and to protect the machinations of machine politicians—in any case—it is not easy to see why the law might not be a most wholesome one, nor why it need be feared by any reputable paper.

This is the light in which Governor Pennypacker evidently regards it when he declares that there is no provision of the bill which would seem to be uncalled for, unjust or unduly harsh. In his view, apparently, it is better that a few guilty parties should escape public disgrace than that scores of the innocent should suffer, the dignity of public office be dragged in the dust, and the great noble enginery of the public press become permeated through and through with the contagious, deteriorating effects caused by the abuse of its essential freedom, frequently debased by pernicious license and by departure from the best types of journalistic enterprise.

Governor Pennypacker gives many pertinent illustrations and samples of those who are affected by the bill. "The corporation officer who has been falsely charged with crime, the manufacturer who has been falsely accused of being a drunken brawler, the woman whose domestic griefs have been unfeelingly paraded, or whose chastity is improperly suspected, the student who has been falsely accused of murder, the clergyman who has been cruelly maligned, the quiet citizen whose peace of mind has been destroyed by the publication of evil gossip, the merchant whose credit has been affected by groundless rumors;" all are instances he points out of what has, in fact, recently occurred.

A mayor of our chief city has been called a "traitor," a senator of the United States has been denounced as "a yokel with sodden brain," and within the last quarter of a century, two presidents of the United States have been murdered. In each instance, he declares, the cause was easily traceable to inflammatory and careless newspaper utterances.

The entire press of the state of Pennsylvania have stood, it seems, with amazing unanimity in solid array against the bill. The chief objection which they bring against the law is that "it invites and encourages the institution of vexatious suits upon insufficient grounds." Now that the law has, however, gone into effect, this consideration does not seem to materially affect the policy of the reputable papers of the state who have stood with the "yellow-hued" variety in opposition to the passage of the statute.

The Public Ledger, for example, a sheet which has carried at the head of its editorial columns for years the attractive legend, "All the news that's fit to print," while strongly deprecating the enactment of the law, declares its firm intention of printing "now as before, the truth about men, measures and things 'with charity for all, with malice toward none.'"

This seems to show that whatever its disadvantages, the new law of Pennsylvania is not likely to hamper or suppress legitimate news exposition, and it is to be hoped that it may successfully and fairly put a much needed curb on certain tendencies of modern journalism which reputable publications are the most desirous to discountenance.

Telling Field Work in West Washington.

Many Medal Contests—New Members Secured.

Blanche Buell, Correspondent.

ARLINGTON Wash., May 23.—The very successful work of Miss Hollister has already been reported by our state president, Mrs. Platt. Interest in the Y branch was aroused and we hope to see it increase.

Mrs. Munns, state corresponding secretary, has been conducting medal contests in Chehalis county. One contest each at Hoquiam, Aberdeen, Montesano and Elma. The attendance has been good and much interest has been aroused. The Hoquiam class will repeat its contest at Cosmopolis.

Mrs. Margaret Platt, state president, spoke May 3 in the Baptist church at Aberdeen, at the Y. M. C. A. in the afternoon and at Cosmopolis at night. At Aberdeen nineteen new members were secured. At Cosmopolis a union of ten members and four honoraries was organized, with the Presbyterian minister as recording secretary. Thirteen members were secured at Hoquiam and the state officers expect soon to organize a Y there. May 10 the state president and corresponding secretary were in Oakville, and May 17 at Satsop which closed their very successful campaign.

Progress in Indiana.

Field Work—Law Enforcement—Successful Financial Plans.

Mrs. Hattie Wright Brand, Correspondent.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., May 25.—Miss Carrie Lee Carter and the state chairman of organization began a tour in the extreme southern part of the state May 15. Their effort will be entirely in unorganized counties. Most of our missionary territory is in southern Indiana, but conditions are unusually favorable and we are hoping much from the work of Miss Carter.

Mrs. S. M. Stahl, state superintendent of Mothers' meetings, is one of our most efficient workers. Parlor meetings are growing in favor in the state, and we find them most helpful in enlisting interest and members. Mrs. Stahl began a tour in the southern part of the state May 13.

The fight against the saloons in Kokomo, in which Miss Styer, a member of one of our unions there, has taken such a successful part, is still on. Liquor men have raised nearly $2,000 to fight the case, but the W. C. T. U., the ministers and citizens loyal to the best interests of the town are working hand in hand, and we hope for another victory. The remonstrance work is being pushed in many towns. The women are not only helping, but are pushing for a law which will prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor within our borders. We are full of courage and determination.

The membership dues in Indiana are $1.00 per year, which is divided as follows: Twenty cents to the local treasury, fifteen cents to the county, forty cents to the state, and twenty-five to cover the subscription to the state paper. The latter arrangement meets with almost general favor. It places "Our Message" in the hands of every member in the state, assures a means of communication with the entire membership and no time or effort is spent in soliciting subscribers. The twenty-five cents is sent to the state treasurer with the dues. The plan is a great saving of energy and enables us to reach every member of the organization.

Local Union Enterprise That Pays.

Chadron, Neb., "Rest Room" Furnishes Headquarters and Benefits the Treasury.

Special Correspondence.

CHADRON, Neb., May 25—After six months' experimental work in our "Rest Room" we can report progress, as our enterprise has been generally pronounced a successful one. Over 800 women and children have visited the rooms, many of whom have rested, eaten their lunches and availed themselves of the appliances for letter writing, reading and toilet purposes. All those who have patronized the rooms have praised the conveniences furnished. Almost all our business men have spoken favorably of the work we have undertaken, and have contributed liberally to help us carry it on. Many of the ladies of our little city have given or loaned articles of use or ornament, and altogether we feel that a very pleasant impression has been made upon the hearts of our people by the unselfish work which the local union has wrought for the comfort of many.

We have greatly enjoyed having such headquarters for our own meetings, with a permanent place for our record, music and other books. It has been a pleasure to give a meeting place for our local Humanitarian Society and in which to greet and listen to an occasional speaker on equal suffrage, domestic economy and other topics. We are hoping to continue this beneficent work indefinitely.

Difficulties we have had to meet now and then, as a matter of course. In spite of an enforced change of location and the giving up of her work by our first matron, who to our surprise migrated from the Rest Room to the state of matrimony at the end of one month's service, we have more than "held our own"—that is to say, we have paid all bills and have more money in the W. C. T. U. treasury than when the rooms were opened. We are very grateful for the prosperity we have enjoyed and the co-operation of our many friends, and propose to go forward with our plan, expecting still larger results in the future.

Advance Along All Lines—Notable Speakers Present.

Mattie R. Turner, Correspondent.

TERRELL, Tex., May 25.—The twenty-first annual convention of the Texas Woman's Christian Temperance Union marked the closing of the most successful year in all our history. The convention was held in the First Christian church in Fort Worth, May 7-10. The beloved president, Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard, fresh from the state capital, brought many cheering messages concerning her work at Austin. She gave unstinted praise to the "rank and file" for their confidence in her leadership as demonstrated by their immediate and hearty response to her every appeal. Her report showed a vast amount of work for the past year.

The treasurer's report showed an encouraging increase in number of local unions, and no doubt Texas will have a place on "Benefit Night" at Cincinnati, next November. The corresponding secretary's report gave evidence of more practical methods having been employed by the unions than formerly. The county presidents gave flattering reports of their work, which demonstrated the wisdom of substituting county for district organizations.

A large number of babies were dedicated to the principles of the W. C. T. U. by Mrs. Stoddard during the session, and several veterans in the cause were presented to the convention.

An amendment to the constitution was adopted, which provides for a vice president-at-large, and the president was vested with the power to appoint her vice, as well as the office secretary.

The following amendment to the by-laws was adopted: An organizer must send to the state treasurer dues for at least seven members, and as many subscriptions to the 'Texas White Ribbon' before an organization can be reported." This recommendation was adopted by the executive committee last fall, and proved so valuable that it was incorporated in the by-laws by a unanimous vote. The Lecture Bureau was adopted as a regular department. The editor and business manager of the "Texas White Ribbon" reported a healthy increase in the mailing list, and a gratifying condition in the business department.

Nearly all the department superintendents made encouraging reports, while those of two new departments, adopted at last convention, Sunday school and Mercy, were excellent. The Press and Literature report also deserves especial mention.

All the old officers were re-elected with the exception of Mrs. Minnie Kirtland, who for six years past has filled the office of corresponding secretary with marked efficiency, but on account of increased duties found it necessary to decline a renomination. Her successor is Mrs. J. B. Ammerman, of Cisco, a lady of unquestioned ability, who was "bred in old Kentucky" and has capably filled the office of superintendent of "Reading Circles" for several years.

Officers for the ensuing year are: President, Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard; vice-president-at-large, Mrs. Mattie R. Turner; corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. B. Ammerman, Cisco; recording secretary, Mrs. Effie Miller, Beaumont; treasurer, Mrs. J. A. S. Curtis, Beaumont; Y secretary, Mrs. Minnie Kirtland; L. T. L. secretary, Miss Hattie Henderson, Marshall; editor "Texas White Ribbon" and state reporter, Mrs. M. R. Turner, Terrell.

Texas has a fine corps of county presidents and superintendents of departments, whom it would be a pleasure to mention if space permitted.

Mrs. Weed's Address.

The crowning event of the convention was Mrs. Maria Weed's address on "The Dangers of Modern Mormonism," at the St. Paul's M. E. church Sunday morning. The audience of representative people remained almost breathless throughout the discourse, and flocked to congratulate and thank her when she had finished. Mrs. Weed expressed surprise at the generous collection at the close of the service. This was her first appearance in Texas. She will give a number of dates to this state before she returns North.

Personal.

Miss Rhena Mosher was with us again to the delight of her many friends. Mesdames Curtis, Zehner, Sweeney and Miss Henderson, "our own" state workers were all present and spoke in the various churches on Sunday.

A number of the Fort Worth pastors and other prominent people were presented to the convention, and all brought cordial greetings.

The daily papers gave most generous reports of the proceedings, and one editorial in the "Register" is so good I pass it on:

"The ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, now in session in this city, transact business with better order and precision than most deliberative bodies of men. They go about their work with the grace of ladies of the drawing room, yet with proper regard for all of the rules of deliberation. Such a well marshaled and well managed army of pure, true women, representing all the tenderness of womanhood, with all the earnest solicitude of Christian motherhood, may well be feared by the interests against which they are arrayed."

Forceful Minnesota Unions.

Well Planned Meetings—Hard Working Officers.

Mary E. Hoover, Correspondent.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., May 25.—In Dakota county, in the Dakota-Goodhue-Rice district, Hastings' W. C. T. U. pursues the even tenor of its way, a way that is the secret of permanence and success. A study of the union's printed program reveals the depth and breadth of W. C. T. U. plans for reaching humanity's needs. Eleven departments have superintendents, there is a visiting committee of six members, a committee in charge of the hall where the union has its headquarters and in which every Sabbath afternoon gospel service is held. The first meeting each month is devoted to temperance, and there is an L. T. L. of about fifty members. Business meetings are held twice each month in the W. C. T. U. hall and the other meetings are held in the homes of the members, with some special subject for study. These studies are of an inspiring nature, as "Culture of the Intellect," "Power of Influence," "Ideals the Basis of Progress," "Our Thoughts as Educators" and the departments and Red Letter days are woven into the year's plan of work. The union keeps in touch with Mother National by such subjects as "Hopeful Signs," this being a chronicle of the year's work as given by the National corresponding secretary, and "Readings on the Life and Work of Miss Willard," at which time the organizing fund is collected. "How may a better celebration of July 4 be secured?" suggests a practical discussion along reform lines. The monthly Responsive Readings are used.

Hastings is a town of 4,000 people, and has eighteen places in which liquor is sold, so there is need for work. The president of this union, Mrs. D. L. Rust, is in her fifth year of service and during the first three years never missed a meeting. Mrs. Rust takes care of the littles, encourages her women to do their best, is prompt and firm and kind without ostentation, and the hearts of the workers safely trust in her. Mrs. E. S. Fitch, vice president, makes the wearing of the badge and the reading of THE UNION SIGNAL, specialties, and though comparatively new in the community exerts an important influence in favor of the principles of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. E. L. Cook, press superintendent, has for many years reported the work of her union both to the state paper and state reporter, and her faithful work in this line has contributed to the permanency of the local organization. These women and the recording secretary, Miss M. Countryman, the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Hattie Cecil, the treasurer, Mrs. B. A. Day, and former state superintendent, Mr. M. A. Dockstader, modestly disclaim praise, but the women of the Hastings union, "as others see them" are standing loyally by the state, and waging a great battle. May such unions increase! They have truly "builded better than they knew," welcoming speakers, and along all lines standing for the righteousness that exalteth a nation.

MRS. E. S. FITCH, Vice-President.

Hennepin district will hold its convention in Minneapolis, June 16-17. A diamond medal contest and platform meeting are planned for the evenings and a fine program for each day.

To put life and enthusiasm in your temperance work, you should read of victories gained on the skirmish lines of our great white ribbon army, which are chronicled each week in THE UNION SIGNAL. An intelligent comprehension of the great reforms of the day must include a knowledge of W. C. T. U. achievements. THE UNION SIGNAL from now until December 1 for 50 cents. Subscribe at once.

Mary E. Hopper, Correspondent.

CHICAGO May 22.—State President Brehm is so constantly in the field that she has become almost a stranger in person, though not in memory, at "headquarters." Her wonderful endurance is a matter of comment, and the results of her work very gratifying.

The outlook at present indicates that the gain will be even greater in the state this year than last, not only in membership, but in department work. The number of cradle roll members are legion, and Mrs. Hunt is still urging on the work, and through it a good interest in the W. C. T. U. is being aroused.

Medal contests are the order of the day and we will surely succeed ourselves in possession of the "banner" judging from present indications.

Nearly fifteen thousand Sunday School pledge cards have already been sent out this year. Pledge-signing is not being neglected as the record will doubtless show later.

The new regime, embracing county organization, is now in active operation, either as county or bi-county organization, with a full corps of officers, recently installed. These officers, with the impetus given the work by the institutes just closing, will doubtless, during the five remaining months, show good results; one of which should be an increased subscription to our National and state papers. The work is broadening, deepening and growing in Illinois.

Mrs. Unruh in Georgia.

(Special Correspondence.)

UNION POINT, Ga., May 25.—Mrs. Ada Wallace Unruh has just finished a most successful work in the state of Georgia. She delivered fifty-nine lectures, held twenty-three Mothers' meetings, visited nineteen schools and three Sunday schools; gaining over 300 active and 131 honorary members, and organizing six new unions. Among the most noticeable features of her itinerary were first, the crowds that greeted her, filling, in some instances, every available space; second, the cordial support of the pastors, regardless of denominations; third, the co-operation of the teachers in the schools; fourth, the large number of anti-tobacco pledges taken; in one instance 117 out of 119 boys took this pledge; and fifth, the "Men's meetings" at Greenesboro, a marked event in our very conservative state.

Mrs. Unruh's audiences everywhere were not only charmed with, but deeply impressed by, her logical reasoning, irresistible eloquence and consecration.

Louisiana Unions at Work.

A Drinking Fountain—Field Workers and Public Meetings.

Lury Gould Baldwin, Correspondent.

BALDWIN La., May 25.—The Central union in New Orleans has started a fund for a drinking fountain in that city.

Mrs. A. M. Porter, president of the Zwolle union, is sorely afflicted by the loss of a well beloved sister. She had faithfully worn the white ribbon for ten years and her death is a loss to the W. C. T. U. in this state.

Mrs. Porter sends word of Mrs. Howe's ministrations at Zwolle. She has been here five seasons and her lectures still win commendation and the collections are good at her meetings. Mrs. Porter adds: THE UNION SIGNAL has been a weekly visitor in my home for over ten years, and I don't see how any one can be a good white-ribboner without it.

Mrs. N. E. Oliver, state organizer, began a three weeks' campaign in the Second and First districts on May 16. Her meetings opened at Rayne, and after ten days, she will go east from New Orleans, along the Illinois Central railroad, for a series of meetings, and the convention of the First district about June 10.

Mrs. Oliver held a public meeting at Gueydan and also visited Abbeville and Raplan and contemplates organizing Vermillion parish for the W. C. T. U.

Miss May C. Walker sailed from Boston in company with eight delegates to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention at Geneva. She has devoted much time and labor to the Louisiana W. C. T. U. since her election to the presidency last November; it is hoped the sea voyage will prove beneficial and restful for her.

The Fifth district convention was held at Collinston. Mrs. Annie L. Wilson, of Monroe, is the president. Owing to sickness and other causes, the attendance was small. The local union most cordially received and entertained its guests and regretted that so few of the delegates came.

Mrs. Annie L. Wilson outlined the plan and scope of the W. C. T. U. work in an interesting manner. The teachers were interested and promised to get their scholars to sign the anti-cigaret pledge. Several subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL were secured. The local union felt encouraged by this manifestation of interest and invited the district to meet there again. Mrs. H. Howell, district corresponding secretary, is the president of the local union.

An executive meeting of the Second district was called at Berwick to transact the unfinished business of the convention. Mrs. H. C. Pharr presided. The resignation of Mrs. Barnett was accepted. Ten superintendents were appointed and the district minutes were ordered printed at once. Mrs. A. M. Zable, president of the Central union in New Orleans, was present. Mrs. Zable held a meeting at night, resulting in four new members and a good collection. The decennial convention of the Second district was photographed in the church at Morgan City; it makes a valued souvenir for the members.

Another Victory In Delaware.

Interesting Gatherings.—Helpful Workers.

Lila Wilson Aron, Correspondent.

WYOMING, Del., May 18.—The proprietor of the only hotel in Wyoming applied to the court a second time for license and was again turned down. It was a wonderful fight and one which meant much more than whether or not liquor would be sold there. The whole town was aroused and divided; it seemed that every man and woman was in line on one side or the other. The majority of the better element were against the license and it has turned into a man fight, as the men have practically taken it away from the women who started the movement. The court-house was filled, largely with the temperance people. Most of the neighboring towns were represented—it was almost a county affair.

SENATOR FRANK J. ALLEE.

Never before has temperance sentiment run so high. It does one's heart good to see the men of the town so stirred. It has come to this, that the temperance people see they must take care of their own and, by dealing in every possible way with each other, make the "whisky set" see where they stand.

The politicians have taken the issue up boldly and are planning for the campaign two years hence. They propose to vote only for men who will pledge themselves to help the temperance cause.

The white-ribbon women have now a stanch friend from Delaware at Washington, Senator J. Frank Allee. He is a man who has the courage of his convictions. He believes in the right and will dare to stand against a multitude in the wrong.

An L. T. L. conference was held in Dover April 15. Although the morning was very stormy a good attendance and an interesting session are reported. L. T. L. work is gaining interest in Delaware. There are now fourteen Legions, two having recently been organized—one in Wilmington, with fifty-six members. Newark has the only Senior L. T. L. in the state, with a membership of thirty very active and enthusiastic members.

MRS. H. C. MEARNS.

April 16, another stormy day, found the white-ribboners of Kent county assembling as though the sun was shining, in annual convention at Harrington. A profitable day and evening were spent, with our Mrs. Kate E. Smithers in the chair. Mrs. Thacher, Mrs. Caulk, our state president, and other helpful workers were in attendance.

A similar meeting was held in Sussex county, April 23, and in New Castle county, in Wilmington, April 30. The last place, in addition to Mrs. Thatcher, had Mrs. Ellis, who was exceedingly helpful. The young women had charge of the evening service, which was a very interesting feature. Demonstrations were given by twenty-one soldiers from the forts and by one hundred school children.

Kent county elected a new secretary, Mrs. M. Hettie Jenkins, of Wyoming, and New Castle county elected a new treasurer, Mrs. H. C. Mearns, who is also the very earnest superintendent of Anti-Narcotics. In whatever position she may be found she is always a loyal white-ribboner.

YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH.

Conducted by Mrs. Clara Parrish-Wright, General Secretary.

Our World's Missionary Fund.

My Dear Young Women:—From Mrs. Campbell Wells' formal report you will note that about $80 had been sent to her up to May 10 for Miss Smart's interpreter, as a result of the meetings on April 14. At the present writing, May 18, I am happy to tell you that we have more. A letter from Mr. W. Lambert, the good husband of our York state secretary, received this morning informs me that Mrs. L. has in hand, for forwarding to Mrs. Wells, $43.38, and he "feels sure that there will be more!"

I am so pleased to know that so much interest has been created in the observance of a particular day, and my faith reaches a good many more dollars when all reports are in. Let us turn on all the fountains of inspiration, dear state secretaries, until the enthusiasm for helping on this department of our work grows to a white heat.

I received by the last Japan post a copy of Miss Smart's report which will be read at Geneva. In it she tells how she has been crippled for lack of a regular interpreter. Let us see that this does not occur again. Mrs. Evans, World's custodian of our fund, has already sent her an installment, and we must be ready to follow it up as occasions demand.

By Miss Gordon I forwarded to Geneva our gain in membership as per National treasurer's books. If she should bring the beautiful World's banner back to us we should have a jubilee at Cincinnati, should we not?

I would give you an outline of the Geneva Y conference program, but prefer that you wait for the report, which I am sure Miss Cameron will send.

"The time draweth nigh" for these meetings when this letter is read. Do not forget to pray for the World's work, of which the National in the States is so important a part.

Yours for continual victories,

Clara Parrish-Wright.

A Letter From Our Canadian Leader.

Dear Y Comrades:—A request, which is to me a command, come from our general secretary, for a monthly letter. Did she know the Canadian Y secretary better she would have realized the burden of blue penciling she is taking on her shoulders, for the Y girls of Canada are not to be passed over lightly with a few words. There are no departments of work which are not carried on somewhere between Victoria, B. C., and Halifax, N. S. Just three little incidents that have come to my knowledge within the past week will illustrate the kind of girls that I call mine.

In one town, which shall be nameless, two Y girls helped a teacher through the great sorrow that came to her when God took her mother home. Having the necessary qualifications they divided the labor of the school work between them and gave their lonely friend mental and physical rest during her trial. The sad, motherless girl is now one of our very own—a Y secretary, with a large territory recently put under her supervision. Wasn't that beautiful flower mission work?

Another Y has refused invitations to attend teas and receptions as a guest so that she might keep a weaker sister from going on the vaudeville stage—or worse. This is what she did: She engaged with her friend as a professional musician, used her influence to get desirable entertainments, chiefly afternoons; and together they charmed everyone with their music. The money all went into the needy purse, which is a secret that only the Y secretary knows.

A local Y union in the metropolis of Canada has arranged with country unions for flowers, which will be distributed to the children of the slums, each bouquet having a text card. These flower mission girls are going to divide the summer work, and simply walk the hot, dusty streets and respond quickly to every "Please, missis, give me a flower."

We are all striving to make the best of everything, think the best of everybody, hope the best for ourselves, and persevere. In the noontide prayer say a word for the Canadian Y's and their leader.

Elizabeth Griswold Waycott.

Gleanings.

Miss Olive M. Blount has organized her third Y in Morgan county, Ill.

Many letters, telegrams and flowers were sent to Mrs. Barnes on her birthday.

Miss Elizabeth H. Goodwin, of New Jersey, sails with her sister for Europe June 20.

Miss Tinling, as well as Miss Swankie-Cameron, will address the Y mass meeting at Geneva in French.

The Sunbury, Pa., Y opened in April a reading room in the heart of the city. This society has 125 members.

Mrs. Cora E. Seberry is able to be in the field again, and reports a new Y at Springville, Erie county, N. Y.

Mrs. Elizabeth Griswold-Waycott, our Canadian Y secretary, writes that Y work is becoming more and more popular there.

The Clarksville, Ohio, Y held a musical and oratorical contest May 16 for the benefit of the World's Y missionary work.

On our World's Y Missionary Day the Y's of North Attleboro, Mass., enjoyed a charming address from Miss Ida C. Clothier.

All Y's will sympathize with Miss Anne Rothwell Stewart, in the loss, by fire, of her beautiful country home—"Whitehall"—near Chestertown, Md.

One of the strongest and most promising of the new Y's of New York state is at Fishkill-on-the-Hudson. They start out with forty-five members.

Miss Ella F. Merrill, president of the Old Town Y, of Maine, has been asked by her pastor to give a talk on white ribbon missionary work before their Epworth League.

Miss Ina MacGregor, a prominent Y of South Africa, purposes visiting the States after the Geneva Convention, and attending our National. A most cordial welcome awaits her.

The largest amount of money received by the National custodian from a single society, as a result of the meetings on April 14, comes from Pennsylvania—Kane Y, $8. A high honor.

Maryland's Co-operative Committee has appointed a "Bureau of Information" where a young people's society may obtain helps, literature, speakers and instruction along all temperance lines. A big step.

At the eleventh annual convention of the Methodist Protestant Christian Endeavor Union, held in Washington, May 7-10, our Florence Hammond, of Maryland, gave a twenty-minutes' address on "Temperance that tells."

Mrs. King, of Northern California, has organized a new Y at Martinez, Contra Costa county. The Byron W, because they were all quite young women, has changed to a Y, so the state has two additional Y's since last report.

Delaware has a new Y at Harrington, organized by President Caulk and Mrs. Thacher. St. Paul's Y, Wilmington, received thirteen new members at a recent meeting, in large measure the result of Mrs. Thacher's work.

Miss Tami Imai, of Tokio, whom many will remember having met at Portland, with such pleasure, will leave for her beloved Japan in August. Miss Imai was our secretary for Japan during Miss Mitani's absence in this country two years ago.

Miss Rose A. Davison, of Colorado, has organized, altogether, five new Y's and Y branches during her spring institute work. Correspondents to the state paper from points she has visited speak in most complimentary terms of her addresses and delineations of character.

April 30, Miss Florence Hammond, of Maryland, organized a Y at Reisterstown, Baltimore county, of fourteen members, the W's lending one of their members for president. Most of the young women were students. The society is to be known as the "Florence Hammond Y."

Mrs. Lydia J. Newcomb-Comings, our successful Michigan secretary, and one of the National lecturers in the Physical Education department, has been urged by the "powers that be" in Florida to accept our secretaryship in that state and has consented. Tampa is to be her future home.

At the recent anniversary social of the Lincoln, Va., W. C. T. U. the Lincoln Y gave the mother union a delightful surprise by presenting a birthday cake, with twenty-five lighted candles. It was accompanied with appropriate remarks by the secretary of the Y, Miss Martha Brown.

Miss Eunice Cusick, of Illinois, has been doing excellent Y work in Iowa. She organized Y's at New Sharon and at Colfax, and prepared the way at Ames and at New London. The state secretary, Mrs. Dollie Dick-Burgess, writes: "I fully expect to reach the twenty societies I wanted so much." She, herself, has organized at Council Bluffs.

"How can college girls spread the work of the Y. W. C. T. U.?" "Can college girls pay their dues?" and "How can our honoraries help us?" were among the interesting topics discussed during the day session of the Inter-collegiate Oratorical Contest and Conference of North Carolina Y's (Thurman) arranged by Miss Lynch and Mrs. Stevenson.

April 27, Miss Grace Van Vleet, state secretary, organized a Y of twenty-five members at Elkton, So. Dakota also one recently of thirty members at the Free Methodist seminary at Wessington Springs. Not long ago Miss Van Vleet made her first speech in her own home-town of Hartford. When she made her appearance upon the platform, the entire audience gave her the Chautauqua salute.

TRANSLATING THE BIBLE FOR THE PHILIPPINES.

BLIND CHILDREN READING THE GOSPEL.

THE BIBLE, ITS WORLD-WIDE DISTRIBUTION.

THE world's demand for the Bible is great and is rapidly growing. Voltaire, who died in 1777, prophesied that within a hundred years the Bible would be an unknown book. The number of volumes of Holy Scripture that come from the press now every twelve months is about eight million, more than the total number that saw the light during the first eighteen centuries after Christ. The Bible, which in Voltaire's day existed in only thirty-eight tongues, is now being read, in whole or in part, in over four hundred. One hundred and fifty of these languages were for the first time reduced to writing by Bible translators.

The chief instruments for meeting this great need have been the Bible societies, of which the American and the British and Foreign are foremost. They co-operate to the fullest degree, but thus far the British society has been able to do a work more than twice as large as the American. For the first period of twenty-five years, 1816-1841, the American Bible society issued 2,798,366 volumes; in the second, 18,987,210; in the third, 32,478,138; and for the fourth period, would reach 50,000,000, at the present rate of about 2,000,000 a year.

All Doors Now Open.

It is no longer a crime to circulate the Bible. Translated into the language of Thibet, it is being carried even into that forbidden land, in advance of foreign commerce and travel. The Russian government, while hitherto intolerant of missionaries, gives the Bible itself free course among the people. It is admitted free of duty, and has often been transported free of charge. Its influence upon Tolstoi, and its leavening work among the masses, are well known.

Dr. Osvaldo Magnasco, Minister of Justice and Public Instruction in the Argentine Republic, is officially advocating, to use his own words, "the advent of an epoch in which—imitating England and Germany—the unprejudiced reading of the Bible shall constitute one of the most delightful and edifying occupations of our public schools." In 1886 a ton of Bibles was condemned to be publicly burned in the capital of Ecuador. Now, the American Bible Society is finding a welcome in all parts of South America.

It is significant that the Society of St. Jerome, composed of Roman Catholics, is, with the Pope's approval, and with Bible society methods, putting the Scriptures into the hands of the common people of Italy. One hundred thousand copies of the Gospels and Acts in one volume, at four cents in paper covers and eight cents in cloth, have rapidly been sold. This is a new, scholarly, and simple translation from the original Greek.

Why The Bible Finds a Welcome.

The main reason is because the human heart is made for fellowship with God, and is an aching void without Him. Other reasons are that the Bible does no violence to the individual; it does not intrude; it does not proselyte; it is not mercenary. In lands where literature is scarce—and they are many—reading matter of any kind is an object of careful interest. Moreover, such lands have their own sacred books, and are prepared to examine with respect, and even reverence, a volume which claims to contain the sacred teachings of Christendom. This is especially true in the vast lands of Confucius, of the Vedas, and of the Koran. Many of these millions, whose prejudices do not allow them to enter a church or associate with a missionary, will gladly secure a portion of the Holy Scriptures when given a chance.

It is a remarkable fact, as Sir William Muir has shown, that the Koran, which contains scores of allusions to the Old and New Testaments, always refers to them as authoritative and divinely inspired. No Mohammedan, therefore, can feel offended at a copy of the Bible or fear to read it.

How The Bible Goes.

The world's need of the Bible and the duty of meeting it is clear to all. Few have any idea how great is the task and how it is being done.

First, the Bible must be translated—and there are hundreds of languages, many of them crude and unspiritual. Secondly, the translation must be printed, and made into books, often at great expense, only a very small part of which can be borne by the poor and half-enlightened people. Thirdly, the books must be brought to the attention and put within the reach of the people. This requires a large force of Bible sellers and colporteurs, wisely directed. It is a work essential to the success but beyond the resources of the missions of the various denominations working separately; for giving the Bible itself to the world, Christians of every name must co-operate in a special organization, above and beyond denominational lines. This was clearly foreseen in 1816, and led to the formation of the American Bible Society, to serve as the channel through which the Bible lovers of America could pass the Bible on to the destitute, both in our own land and throughout the world.

Work In The Home Land.

In our own land the churches are naturally engaged, mainly, in serving those within reach and those identified with them.

Whose business is it, then, to see that the Bible goes into prisons and hospitals and almshouses; to provide the men of the army, navy and merchant marine; to offer to the hundreds of thousands of immigrants, as they cross our threshold, the Constitution of the Kingdom of God; to put it into the hands of the blind and of destitute Sunday-school children; to take it to the homes of our colored brethren in the South, or to our isolated fellow citizens on the mountains, buried in the mines, or out of sight on the distant prairies?

All these classes are, and must continue, the special objects of the Bible Society's care.

But the most urgent need now is for those lands where Bibles are as rare as they are abundant with us. Throughout Asia, Africa, South America, and the Island World—that is to say, for the great majority of the human race—the Bible societies are practically the only source of supply for the Scriptures.

Distributed At Cost.

The society never sells the Bible at a profit, but at cost or less than cost. It can turn a dollar into five Bibles or twenty Testaments or fifty Gospels. Experience proves it is almost always better to charge something as a test of the receiver's sincerity. Thus ninety-eight per cent of the half million volumes circulated yearly in China are paid for, at least in part, by the Chinese. This means that, even at half price, the poor Chinaman or Armenian must give a week's wages for a Bible that an American can earn in a few hours.

The society makes no indiscriminate or wasteful distribution anywhere. "The people come after Bibles, they are not thrust upon them," is the testimony from China and elsewhere. It relies on pastors, church officers, and friends of the Bible everywhere, whose work this really is, to furnish the power which moves the great machinery of distribution.

The Foreign Work.

To meet the great foreign needs, the American Bible Society works with and through missionaries of all denominations.

The society has also about four hundred colporteurs, Christian men, who endure great hardship as they go everywhere offering the Word of Life. This foreign work is already costing the American Bible Society about $250,000, and it ought to be doubled. The value of this service to the missions of various denominations is thus summed up by the Rev. Judson Smith, D.D., Secretary of the American Board, Congregational: "If there were no agency doing the work of the American Bible Society, we should be compelled to inaugurate one. Our debt to it is immeasurable. We should feel hopeless, helpless, without it."

The Bible In The Home.

William Tindale, who translated even our own English Bible, was strangled and burned for it in 1536. Of Tindale's first edition of three thousand English Testaments, only a burned fragment of one copy has come down to us. His avowed object, to make it possible for even a plough-boy to know the Scriptures, has been grandly attained.

It was a true instinct that led Robert Burns, after describing family worship in "The Cotter's Saturday Night" to burst forth:

That makes her lov'd at home, rever'd abroad:
Princes and lords are but the breath of kings,
An honest man's the noblest work of God."

Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, says that Burns has here put his finger on the secret of the success of English-speaking races.

The vitality and progress of nations can be gauged by their consumption of Scriptures. Protestant lands, only about one-eighth of the human race, have consumed at least three-fourths of the world's supply of Bibles.

There Are Other Homes.

What the Bible has done for us, it can do for other races. It lives and gives life because it is itself the product of right living—of the divine life in men. We, who have profited most by the Scriptures, are bound alike by duty, gratitude and self-interest to, at least, put them within the reach of all our fellowmen.

Sir Robert Hart, for many years the Director of Customs in China, says that the only way to avoid an industrial war of world-wide magnitude with China is to Christianize her, that is, help her adopt the same ideals that are slowly but surely moulding our own civilization.

We are getting our ideals from the words of the Son of Man, spoken in Galilee nineteen centuries ago. China must also be allowed to hear them, and they will be spirit and life to her as well as to us.

Already China, which had to wait over eighteen centuries for her Bible, has a record of saints and scholars of which all Christendom may well be proud. It ill becomes us to look with scorn upon races that have not had our chance, and call them inferior. They are, rather, like children, undeveloped, with the eyes of their understanding not opened. Ours is the privilege of teaching them. We have been "put in trust with the Gospel."

Hope Entreated. By Ella Mae Elliott.

SWEET angel of my soul, returned!
What joy to claim thee as my guest;
I bitterly thy absence mourned.
Thrice welcome thou, and I, thrice blest!

Oh, precious Hope, forsake me not!
Be my companion of the way;
Each doubt dispel, inspire each thought,
And mine shall be a cloudless day.

Chapter XIII.

THUS it happened that the curate of Pitsmoor returned to duty looking very little the better for his brief holiday. The fact was the subject of general comment; and it was accounted for in various ways. Enoch sternly repressed incautious female lamentations by inquiring how a faithful minister of God, who bore the burden of his people's souls upon his own, could be expected to look either happy or well. Tummas Windle shrewdly opined that young folks, to whom pleasure came nat'ral, could not, in the nature of things, "go on givin' up here, and givin' up there, without sufferin' from the pinch of it in their feelin's somewheers"; and Miss Smith ventured secretly to hope that the outraged conscience of "a dreadful poor visitor" had something to do with the delinquent's "poor looks." Rose Glyn's blue eyes followed Mr. Brotherton wistfully; Mrs. Langley, with flippancy that was more than half-assumed, protested that she had always known him to be too good for this world, and Mrs. Boyd found various excuses for inviting him to partake of nourishing food. Rose Glyn alone succeeded in extracting a hint of explanation.

"People are very kind to trouble their minds about one at all," he said, in the course of a rare and brief tête-à-tête in the Vicarage drawing-room. "Still, one would think that they ought to understand one's tremendous sense of responsibility, and one's overpowering sense of one's own unworthiness."

"That is what Enoch says, or something like it," said Rose frankly; "but do you really think that God wants us to feel our responsibilities so heavily as to make us quite ill, Mr. Botherton?"

"I am not ill," protested Hugh.

"Look at yourself in that mirror, and tell me whether you look as you used to look,' said Rose, in her pretty authoritative way.

Hugh glanced shrinkingly.

"Pitsmoor isn't exactly the place to which one would resort for the improvement of one's complexion, Miss Glyn."

"Perhaps not; but shall I tell you what I think? You have something on your mind."

She was looking steadily up into his face, but Hugh only smiled down upon her in his fatally open way.

He had been a fine open fellow not so long since, and if he was so no longer, the trick of manner still clung to him.

Rose turned her eyes to the fire, which was welcome on this cold spring day.

"Of nothing at all. I thought you might have some trouble, and I was sorry; but I have only made myself seem very inquisitive."

"Not inquisitive at all, but most sympathetic and kind," said Hugh, in a low voice; "and after all, you are quite right. It is a trouble, but one of which I cannot speak, even to you."

"But I made you speak of it," said Rose, much distressed. "Please forgive me!"

"Indeed, there is nothing to forgive," said Hugh earnestly. "I am glad that you should know."

And indeed he was glad, for the little bond between them was very sweet; to her, he was sure, no less than to him. But he said to himself, with a shudder, he must see to it that beyond that vague admission of trouble her knowledge must never go. He must see to it that never more should there be anything that he would fear for her to know. Nevertheless, the haunting thought of one Milly kept him away from the Vicarage for a week.

To his extreme annoyance, the doctor was the next to tackle him.

"Look here, young man," he said abruptly, after a few minutes' conversation in the street. "You hav'n't had any more trouble with those precious friends of yours, have you?"

Hugh colored violently, but looked him squarely in the face.

"I always knew that you had no great opinion of me; but I wonder what you take me for?" he said quietly.

Without pretence or reason, he felt hurt at the implied doubt of him.

"For anything but a bad sort, on the whole," said the doctor, laughing. "The idea popped into my head, and out of my mouth; that's all. I apologise. But you do look hipped. What's the matter with you?"

"Nothing at all, if people would only believe it," said Hugh, all the more irritably for the doctor's apology. "If it comes to that, you don't look any too luxuriant yourself."

The doctor laughed and yielded the point. For Hugh was right. If he looked haggard and wan, the doctor, just now, looked more haggard still; but the truth was, that the parish was too well accustomed to his furrows to marvel at them. Dr. Mann was some years short of forty, but furrows seemed to be natural to his worn and weary face. He went his way, and thought no more of the suspicion that cost Hugh a sleepless night and a few days of rigorous self-denial.

Things were not going very smoothly for the doctor at home. The relations between his sister and himself had been rather strained of late, and some three or four days after Dr. Mann's encounter with Hugh, some inconsiderate snarl at her expense roused Mrs. Langley's smouldering wrath into sudden flame. The brother and sister were at the breakfast-table, and the doctor's indiscretion was succeeded by the usual pause.

"Shall you require the brougham today? I am thinking of driving into Milborough," said Mrs. Langley pleasantly.

There was a second pause.

"I don't think that's in the contract, is it?" asked her brother slowly.

"Perhaps not. Neither is such a remark as the one you have just made, not for the first time."

"That's true. Well, I apologise."

"Pray don't mention it," said Mrs. Langley sweetly.

The meal ended silently, but on leaving the room, Dr. Mann lingered at the door and made some attempt at conciliation.

"You shouldn't take any notice of me, Ethel. You know what an irritable brute I have grown to be."

"Unfortunately, I do," smiled Mrs. Langley. She sat smiling still when the door had banged behind her brother, and it was a smile that boded ill for the doctor's peace of mind.

Shortly afterwards the sound of wheels was heard crunching the gravel of the drive. She would not look out, but listened, with a curious expression on her face, until the carriage drove away; then she rang the bell.

"Tell John that I shall want the brougham this morning."

The maid looked surprised.

"Please'm, the doctor has taken the brougham today."

"Has he? How tiresome! Never mind; the dogcart will do."

"Yes'm; only I'm afraid there's no horse. I believe Thomas said he was taking the pair. I heard him mentioning to cook that, having got them orders, he supposed they was going a long round."

"How annoying; but never mind. Come up in five minutes, and I will give you a note which John can take at once."

It was a forlorn hope, for the one cab of which the village could boast was retained for the service of the Iron Company, and was only by special favor available for public use. Today, however, it proved to be at Mrs. Langley's service, and an hour later she was driving towards Milborough with an expression of calm content upon her face. She spent an hour or two in the town, visiting several shops, and in the last, a stationer's, she encountered Hugh Botherton.

"How very odd that we should meet," she said, as she shook hands. "I fancied that I saw you just now, only the circumstances were too impossible."

"Indeed; perhaps I have a double," said Hugh, turning to pay for his stationery.

Since she was not in the slightest degree suspicious of him, it escaped Mrs. Langley's notice that his color had changed a little.

This shop proved to be, in his case also, the last place of call, and as it was now raining steadily, he gladly accepted the lady's offer of a seat in her cab. As he deposited his bag on the unoccupied seat, he explained that he had been laying in quite a stock of stationery, books, and other necessaries.

"Where do you think that I saw your double?" asked Mrs. Langley, with pretended horror, when the driver had got his orders for home. "Coming out of Laycocks! The spirit merchant's, you know."

"Out of Laycock's," she repeated, laughing mischievously.

"What an extremely unfortunate resemblance for me!"

"Isn't it? Were I maliciously disposed, I could construct a pretty theory. There is that terrible story, for instance, that you told us the other day. Do what I will, I cannot get that story out of my head. However, that has nothing to do with my theory. He was a friend of yours, you said. Now, were I accustomed to thinking evil, what should hinder me from suspecting that you may even have been speaking of—"

Hugh turned those honest eyes of his from the passers-by, and looked steadily into her face.

"Of myself, you were going to say. You don't think that, Mrs. Langley; but, excuse me, I don't think you ought to turn that subject into a jest."

Her expression changed at once.

"I am sorry; I really am. I had forgotten for the moment that you spoke of him as your friend."

"I don't think I went quite so far as that. I said that I knew him well," said Hugh, with the pained look still upon his face.

Mrs. Langley laid a kindly hand upon him arm.

"If you are going to look so broken-hearted over every mere acquaintance who chooses to go wrong, you will speedily worry yourself to death, Mr. Brotherton. And as for my stupid jest, I believe that you are every bit as honest and single-hearted as you look, and that is saying a good deal. Will you forgive me now?"

"I must, and thank you very much for your good opinion," said Hugh, relaxing into a smile.

After dropping him at his rooms, Mrs. Langley drove home in excellent spirits, and during luncheon talked engagingly to her gloomy brother of her pleasant morning in town. She seemed entirely unconscious of the fact that he watched her narrowly the while. In the afternoon, with great glee, she watched him drive away in the direction of Milborough, and for the next few days she kept him constantly on the alert. Then, her vengeance being satisfied, and unremitting surveillance proving wearisome, she handed him a bottle of spirits with the cork undrawn.

"There, no doubt you devised some means of ascertaining the exact extent of my misdoing. Behold it! I am proud of my achievement."

Dr. Mann critically examined the sealed cork without the slightest change of countenance.

"If all is as it seems, it looks as if you had advanced a step or two," was all he said.

"I have, and oddly enough, I owe it to the awful example furnished by Mr. Botherton's acquaintance," said Mrs. Langley, with lightness that was obviously assumed.

If Dr. Mann was secretly amused to find that any good could come of that absurd exhibition of boyish exaggeration and folly, he took care not to let his face betray him.

For the next week he and Mrs. Langley lived together in unusual peace.

"Bob, what would you say if I asked you to let me have the brougham today?" asked his sister, after this period of cordial relations.

"I don't know that I should be indisposed to agree," said Dr. Mann, after an almost imperceptible pause.

"Bravo, Bob! If you really want to help me, that's the way to do it."

"Well, there's something in that; and anyway things have been much better of late. By the way, Brotherton was saying something about going into town this morning. If you see anything of him you might give him a lift back. He hasn't looked quite up to the mark lately."

Mrs. Langley was by no means indisposed for one of those chats with Hugh which she so rarely got nowadays, and accordingly, she kept a vigilant watch on the streets through which she was driven. Suddenly she started forward from her corner, then shrank back again, and watched breathlessly. There could be no possible doubt about it this time. Unmistakably it was the same figure—or rather, it was Hugh Brotherton—coming hurriedly, bag in hand, out of another spirit merchant's office. Thomas drove half-way down the street and stopped at a draper's shop. Mrs. Langley stepped quickly from the carriage.

"Do you happen to have seen anything of Mr. Brotherton?" she asked her coachman, standing with her back towards the direction in which she knew Hugh to be coming.

"Well, if you should see him, tell him that if he cares to wait a few minutes I can give him a lift home. I believe he is somewhere in town."

She quickly entered the shop, and immediately afterwards, from the counter, saw Hugh pass the carriage. Thomas at once drove after him. When she left the shop the carriage was in waiting, with the curate standing by the door.

"Bob told me that I was to look out for you and bring you back if I could. He says you have not been looking up to the mark lately, and indeed I thing he is right, Mr. Brotherton."

"It is kind of him, and of you, to take so much interest in my health, but indeed you are mistaken," said Hugh. "I am perfectly well, and if I look otherwise it is most ungrateful in me. What orders shall I give to Thomas?"

Children's Cozy Corner

An Unhistoric Dark Day.

BY BERTHA E. BUSH.

THEY were sitting before the fire reading.

"Candles were lighted in the houses," read Jimmy. "The fowls retired to roost; the cocks were crowing all around as at the break of the day; objects could not be distinguished but at a very little distance; and everything bore the appearance and gloom of night."

"Well, so they do every night," said Jennie; "that's not wonderful."

"Oh, this was in the day time," said Jimmy. "The darkness began at about ten o'clock in the morning and lasted all day long. The histories all tell of it, and call it the Dark Day. It was May 19, 1780."

Jennie's only answer was a great yawn, for she did not care for history as Jimmy did. The two were keeping house alone. Father and mother had gone to stay all day and all night. Jimmy and Jennie celebrated by sitting up very late.

"How jolly it will be not to have anybody to call us in the morning!" said Jimmy. "Let's sleep as late as we want to for once."

"Oh, no; let's get up early. There's lots to do, and we don't want father and mother to think we neglect things," said conscientious Jennie.

Fifteen minutes later they were both sound asleep, and only the old clock was left to make a noise in the farm kitchen. But the clock was not so faithful as usual. Something was wrong with it. In the middle of the night it stopped, and no ticking was heard for five hours. Then, without any apparent reason, it began again, as watches sometimes do.

The house was very still in the morning, and the two children slept heavily. Jennie woke up first just in time to hear the clock strike.

They had always been early risers at the farm, and seven o'clock seemed very late to them. Jimmy jumped up like a shot. He hurried to do the chores, and Jennie hurried to get the breakfast. It was a dull, cloudy day, and not a glimpse could they get of the sun. Jimmy went to his weeding like the faithful farmer boy he was, and Jennie was very busy about the house till the clock struck twelve. Then she called Jimmy in to dinner. They were very merry at dinner, and ate a long time.

"How dark it is!" said Jennie, when the meal was fairly over. "It must be going to rain."

They hastened out to scan the sky, but no rain cloud was to be seen, only the gray mist that had covered the sun all day.

"Why! Why-ee!" cried Jennie in astonishment. "The chickens are going to roost. Jimmy, it's another Dark Day!"

Jimmy ran into the house and brought out the book. He had to hold it close to his eyes to see in the dim light.

"Yes!" he cried excitedly. "It's just the way it was then. We're having another Dark Day. Hooray! Go and look at the clock."

"A quarter past one," reported Jennie. "Jimmy, we'll have to light a lamp. Oh, I wish—I wish—that it was night, so that mother would come."

"Nonsense!" said Jimmy, although his own hands trembled queerly. "It's only living history over again. Don't be a coward, Jennie. Just think how grand it is to be alive on such a wonderful day."

"Don't go out to weed again!" begged Jennie. "Stay in the house with me."

So Jimmy stayed, and although he wouldn't have liked to own it, he was glad to stay. He even wiped the dishes, "for company," he said. At two o'clock a rattle of wheels was heard and a buggy drove into the yard.

"It's mother!" cried Jennie, joyfully, and ran out, dish-cloth in hand. Mother got out with her arms full of packages and a beaming smile. But she looked at father queerly when she saw what the children were doing.

"Why, Jennie," she said, "haven't you got your supper dishes done yet?"

"Supper!" cried Jimmy and Jennie. "Why, mama, you mean the dinner! Did you come early because you thought we'd be afraid? We might have been if we hadn't read about the other Dark Day in the history last night."

"Early! Dark Day!" Mother looked up in astonishment. "What are you children thinking of? What time do you think it is?"

"Two o'clock in the afternoon," chorused Jimmy and Jennie, pointing to the clock.

Then mother laughed. Oh, how she laughed! The table fairly shook till the dishes rattled.

"It's almost eight o'clock at night! The old clock must have stopped. O father, father, did you ever hear of anything so funny?"

But Jimmy and Jennie did not think it so very funny. It was not till years after that they saw much amusement in their unhistoric Dark Day.—Youth's Companion.

"Good Mornin'."

HE always said "Good mornin',"
An' emphasized the "good,"
As if he'd make it happy
For each one if he could.
"Good mornin'!" Just "good mornin'"
To ev'ry one he met;
He said it with a twinkle
That no one could forget.

He always said "Good mornin';"
An' people used to say
That one o' his "good mornin's"
Clung to you all the day,
An' made you always cheerful
Just thinkin' o' the sound—
It always was "good mornin'"

He always said "Good mornin',"
An' glad an' happy-eyed,
Those were the words he whispered
The mornin' that he died,
Those were the words he whispered
As cheerful as he could—
An' I believe the angels—
They emphasized the "good."

The Stimulus of a Great Hope.

ALL the sermons are not preached from pulpits. Impressive ones are often heard in the court rooms of our great cities. A correspondent of a Chicago paper relates such an one. It was a simple tale, not unlike dozens heard every week—the story of a wife drawn into the temptation of drink through a husband's dissipation. Their two little ones were placed in the Home for the Friendless, and because of the inability of the parents to pay their board and the refusal of the matron to longer keep them, the matter came before the Juvenile court.

The thing, however, which differentiated this case from hundreds of others, was the finding of this weak, wayward woman by Christian friends of the kind who evidence their right to the name by the continual doing of Christlike deeds. One of these friends took the woman into her home, defiled though she was by strong drink and sin. Another gave her employment in his work-room, and both appeared in the court-room to testify that she was not a drunken degenerate but a woman with a mother's heart and an immortal soul. Nor was this the only evidence produced. Other there was in the woman's face, in the new look of hope and trust in her eyes as she stood before the judge and explained very simply and humbly, in answer to his questioning, that the power which had made her a new woman was the grace of God in her heart.

Her case was not difficult to understand either in its sad downfall nor in its triumphant transformation. With her husband's degradation, her home had been robbed of its happiness, her life had been made desolate, and there was within her no resources from which she might fill the void.

It is inevitable that there shall come to all, to none more often than to women, times when there is needed the stimulus of an overpowering purpose, a mighty passion, or a great hope of affection to enable one to meet moments of despair. Such an element this woman did not possess, and no friend was at hand to direct her to the One who alone could give it. There were not lacking, however, both from within and without, invitations to partake of that false stimulant which she knew would afford momentary oblivion of the dreaded present.

Does our Christian civilization offer anything like a fair choice to these sorely tempted men and women when they most need a stimulant to sustain them in moments of desperate weakness? The saloon makes certain, by proximity to its victims, that its response to every inward vicious craving of appetite shall be quick and ready. In most of our large cities a thirsty man or woman need not go the length of a block to gratify that thirst. The "water of life," that elixir of which one who drinks shall never thirst, is not so freely urged upon the tempted one.

This woman testified, as every truly reformed drinker must testify, that alcoholic stimulant offered no real temptation to one who had experienced the exhilaration of a great hope for the future, who was strengthened by the realization of a Divine love and power sustaining her.

That quality which gives our organization its unique position in society is that it offers an absolutely infallible, because a Divine remedy for the stupendous evil of the day. In the measure that it emphasizes its claims and its efforts as a "Christian" organization, does it link itself with Divine omnipotence and insure its final triumph over evil.

How about your interest in THE UNION SIGNAL? Are you as interested in it as it is in you and our organization? The paper is vigorous and up-to-date in its campaign against the liquor evil. See special offer on page 16.

THE news comes from the Tenderloin district of New York of the establishing of a new class of saloon. Its leading feature, which is expected to appeal to a certain class of reformer as well as to all "respectable" drinkers, is that it will permit no treating—every man must pay for his own drink.

The sound of the phrase, "Every man to pay for his own drink," would be pleasant to the ear if only its realization were within the range of possibility. Even a hasty second thought shows that it is not. Intemperance would be robbed of half its dreadful consequences if such a scheme could be made to work; if a method could be devised whereby every drinking man could be forced to pay for his indulgence, to take upon himself the consequences of his own weakness, to settle his own account and drop out of sight, the only victim of his awful sin. Tremendous as would be the loss to the world, it would be immeasurably less than under present conditions.

"Every man to pay for his own drink"—not until society has become completely disintegrated; not until the eternal truth, "No man liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself," has been erased by Divine fingers from the heart of humanity. Enormous, indeed, is the price the drinking man must pay for his drink bill, must pay with his health, his happiness, his eternal welfare, but when he has bankrupted himself body, mind and soul, the debt is far from cancelled. Look at the haggard, tired woman whom he calls wife toiling all day over somebody's washtub or burning out her sight over somebody's garments. She it is who is paying for the drinks with every particle of youthful beauty and vigor and health. Look at the little ones, before they have learned the meaning of life, forced into factory, mill and mine, because of dissipated fathers, ushered into the world handicapped with vicious appetites and tendencies which make their life one long-drawn-out temptation—these children are in reality paying for the drinks and striving to wipe out the debt incurred by heartless fathers.

Not only does the man who imagines he is paying for his own drink involve himself and family for all time, but so long as society shall tolerate his folly it must be held responsible, and unto the third and fourth generations of the descendants of such degenerates must bear the burden of these unliquidated obligations. There is not a single worthy enterprise that is not indirectly affected, that is not compelled to retrench its expenses and lessen the amount of its budget because of the encumbrance resulting from the failure of every man to pay for his own drink.

If this Gotham enterprise is really honest in its purpose there is but one course open to it: it should seek some lonely island in the midst of the sea, far from all human habitation, distant from all lines of trans-Atlantic steamships, unmarked on the charts of any sailing vessel, and there establish itself, taking with it all who honestly desire to live up to the principle announced that every man shall pay for his own drink. Even there they will fail to perfectly demonstrate their unique theory, but, at least, its vicious influences will be limited to those who legally and morally should be held responsible.

A Wayside Sermon.

A YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, paper relates a pitiable incident which marred the serenity and peace of Easter morning:

"As the throng of worshippers were on their way to a certain church, they were obliged to either walk round or to step over two drunken men prostrated at full length on the sidewalk."

The wording of the news paragraph is most significant. One might search long and find no more suggestive text. It classifies graphically the attitude of society towards the evil of intemperance—the individuals who "walk round" and those who "step over" its victims. The phraseology of the item seems to exclude the third class (who should have paused to lift the fallen men), perhaps because on this occasion, as on so many others, it had no representative.

The incident epitomizes the wide-spread tragedy that goes on day and night—the great highways of life strewn with the victims of the liquor traffic; the unfeeling procession, a well defined class who make no pretense to "Good Samaritanism" but who carelessly "step over" human wrecks, even using them as stepping-stones to their own success and wealth. Somewhat in the background, anxious to be concealed, are the throng who "walk round" the deplorable social evils, a great host, seeking circuitous routes in order to avoid that which might appeal to their sympathy or their judgment. In this crowd are the men who never permit themselves to look this great moral issue squarely in the face, the men who will not throw away their votes on a mere matter of principle, the men who consider it bad form to be known as outspoken advocates of total abstinence.

The utter futility of these efforts to dodge an unpleasant duty, is apparent. These startling, disquieting texts, these illustrated wayside sermons obtrude themselves at every corner, facing one often on the threshold of one's home, not needing the grace of oratory to brand themselves on one's memory, but haunting day-visions and night-dreams.

The only sure way to free oneself from the disturbing influence of a sermon is to eradicate the evil thing that necessitated its utterance. Never will the great vice, which defiles society today, be removed until men and women are equipped with a perfectly adjusted compass of Christian duty, whose magnetic needle of Christlike love shall guide them straight towards that evil which is destroying their brothers, regardless of the fact that it may guide them, as it did their Divine Master, into places of hard, distasteful service.

Clara Barton and the Red Cross.

The differences of opinion which have arisen in the ranks of the Red Cross Society concerning the administration of finances, have in no way touched the personality of Clara Barton, or detracted from the glorious record she has made in ministering to those who suffer from the horrors of war. Miss Barton's integrity is unquestionable, and her long life of self-sacrificing service has given her a peculiar place in the hearts of the American people. Even now, at her advanced age, she is occupied with active plans for greater usefulness. A new department is to be added to the Red Cross Society, which has for its purpose the education of the people in First Aid Treatment, in all cases of accident and emergency. First Aid Emergency Classes will be organized in every city in the country, and an ambulance corps will be formed among the employes of all manufacturing establishments. Miss Barton asks for the cooperation of physicians and employers of labor everywhere. All inquiries should be addressed to the General Superintendent, Red Cross Society, Union Square, New York City.

"Another Crusade." The Epworth Herald announces a great "forward movement" by the Epworth League, that wonderful aggregation of talent and energy which represents young Methodism. It is to be a movement against the liquor traffic, systematically organized, aggressive and relentless. Temperance study classes will be formed, literature will be distributed lavishly, and pledge-signing will be an important feature. We hail this new movement with joy. The consecrated young people of the Epworth League come, in great measure, from Christian homes where, more often than not, the mother is a devoted member of the W. C. T. U. The sentiment that has been making since the Crusade fires were lighted in 1873, bursts forth thus in answering signals from the mountain tops where the young people of the churches lead advancing hosts, and so we close up the ranks and fall in together for the battle that is the Lord's.

Local Union Workers. We are always gratified to note the activity of local workers, especially when the reading of the official organ is made a regular feature of the curriculum. The success or defeat of our organization depends upon the rank and file, and the accuracy of movement on the part of any great army is measured by its intelligence. Unless orders from headquarters are promptly transmitted to the farthest picket on the skirmish line, there can be no concerted action. The local officer who makes it her business to see that every member of her union is ready to "fall in" when marching orders are received merits the special commendation of her commander-in-chief. We take pleasure in giving on page 3, the portrait of Mrs. E. S. Fitch, of Hastings, Minn., who is lending all her influence to the task of pushing the claims of THE UNION SIGNAL upon those with whom she is associated.

Women Inspectors Dismissed. The daily press is authority for the announcement that the women inspectors at the port of New York have been discontinued. These women were appointed for a period of ninety days only, but it was hoped by those who were vitally interested that the success of the experiment would result in an executive order for their continuance. Certain officials of the Immigration Bureau have been opposed to the innovation and have from the beginning prophesied its failure. Those who are in a position to know insist that the desired protection for immigrant women traveling alone can be secured in no other way, and when President Roosevelt returns from his extended trip through the West the matter will be called to his attention.

Chain Letters Again. In response to numerous inquiries concerning chain letter schemes, particularly one which emanates from Philadelphia, we reiterate our former statements: The National W. C. T. U. has no connection with any chain letter scheme whatsoever, does not endorse them, and advises its members to "break the chain" whenever it comes their way.

Personal Mention.

Mrs. Frances A. Joseph, state president of the Willard union, of Louisiana, called upon the editors last week. Mrs. Joseph is spending some little time in Chicago in the interests of her work for the poor colored children of the South.

Mr. and Mrs. William Halsey, of Melbourne, Australia, were welcome callers at the editorial rooms last week. Mrs. Halsey has been for many years leader of the L. T. L. work in Australia, and she is just now especially interested in the Cradle Roll department.

President Roosevelt's Testimony.

IN her annual address delivered at Portland, Mrs. Stevens thusreverted to President Roosevelt's testimony concerning Sunday closing. The law was enforced when Theodore Roosevelt held the enforcing power in New York City, and that in reply to the cry made then as it has been made this year, that it was cruel to take away the poor man's beer and his only club room or pleasure resort, Mr. Roosevelt referring to Sunday closing said: "As a matter of fact, we have helped the poor man, and notably we have helped the poor man's wife and children. Many a man who before was accustomed to spend his week's wages getting drunk in a saloon, now either puts them up or takes his wife and children for a day's outing. The hospitals found that their Monday labors were lessened by nearly half, owing to the startling diminution in cases of injury due to drunken brawls. The work of the magistrates who sat in the city courts for the trial of small offenders was correspondingly decreased. All this was brought about by our honest enforcement of the law."

What the Churches Say of the Liquor Traffic

Methodism proclaims that, "The liquor traffic is so pernicious in all its bearings, so inimical to honest trade, so repugnant to the moral sense, so injurious to the peace and order of society, so hurtful to the homes, to the Church, and to the body politic, and so utterly antagonistic to all that is precious in life, that the only proper attitude toward it for Christians is that of relentless hostility. It can never be legalized without sin. No temporary device for regulating it can become a substitute for Prohibition. License, high or low, is vicious in principle, and powerless as a remedy."

Presbyterianism "earnestly recommends to ministers and congregations in our connection, and to all others, to persevere in vigorous efforts until laws shall be enacted in every state and territory of our beloved country, prohibiting entirely a traffic which is the principal cause of drunkennes and its consequent pauperism, crime, taxation, lamentations wars, and ruin to the bodies and souls of men."

The Cumberland Presbyterians: "Nothing short of constitutional and statutory prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages by the United States and the several states will be satisfactory."

The United Presbyterians: "Prohibition by law of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage is the true method of dealing with this terrible evil by the state. Any form of license or taxation of the liquor traffic is unscriptural in principle and contrary to good government. The time has come when Christian people should cease to be indifferent and unite their efforts, regardless of previous party affiliations, for its entire suppression."

The Baptists proclaim: "We favor the speedy and entire prohibition of the liquor traffic."

The Lutherans: "The right, and therefore the wisest and most efficient method in dealing with the traffic in alcoholic liquors for drinking purposes, is its suppression, and we therefore urge those who comprise the church which we represent to endeavor to secure in every state the absolute prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage."

The Reformed Church declares that, "We here and now, before God and the nation, record our protest against it, and earnestly call upon our synods, classes and churches to unite with us in zealous and persistent Christian efforts, looking toward its speedy extermination."

The Reformed Episcopal Church records "its unanimous and uncompromising opposition to the liquor traffic. It is an unmixed evil, and as such should not be regulated, but destroyed."

The United Brethren declare: "We believe total prohibition to be the divine law of duty for the state."

From the Roman Catholic Church is heard the echoes of the voice of Father Matthew: "The principle of prohibition seems to me the only safe and certain remedy for the evils of intemperance."

In the words of the Rev. Dr. A. J. Kynett, "Never in the history of the world has one great power proclaimed war against another with greater unanimity than has the Christian Church against the saloon."

Red-Letter Day.
June 9, Flower Mission Day.
BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF MISS JENNIE CASSEDAY.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR SISTERS: Delightful little farewell letters written on the S. S. Minnehaha letterhead, gay with red, white and blue colors, came from Mrs. Stevens and Miss Gordon in this morning's mail. They reported their comrades on board as "looking fine and seeming happy." Miss Tinling and others wrote by the way. It is amusing, and pleasing, as well, to think of Miss Tinling, who has made so many warm friends in this country, going to the World's Convention as a delegate from the United States. It came about in this way: The English delegation was full, and we had plenty of places to spare. She, therefore, joined the Norfolk, Virginia, union and received her nomination from Old Virginia, and the powers that be were glad to appoint her. Miss Tinling says in a private letter: "I know you will be thinking of us and praying for us," and goes on to say that she will especially need the latter for she has just learned through THE UNION SIGNAL that she is to speak at the Y meeting in Geneva, and adds, with her characteristic modesty, "I shall give it in French, then it will not seem so common-place as it is." We are glad to have a delegate who can please the French speaking residents of Geneva with an address in their own tongue.

Miss Frances Jones, of Philadelphia, writes of having a delightful time entertaining Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, and of grand results from Mrs. Ellis' addresses. Pennsylvania is moving on at a quick pace. It is refreshing to have one speak of delight in entertainment. Sometimes nowadays we long for the old time hospitality when it was a great thing and a most enjoyable thing to entertain, not only one's immediate friends, but the casual visitor, as well. I wonder if there were more angels to be entertained then than there are now.

By-the-way, I am wondering if the statement I made some time ago asking the unions to pay at the rate of $2 per thousand for the anti-polygamy leaflets when desired in large quantities for distribution, has dampened the ardor of our sisters. Don't forget, please, that smaller quantities can be had for the asking, though we would like to have you send postage if you can. Bishop Fallows' book, "The Mormon Menace," to be had of the W. T. P. A. for 25 cents, is just the thing for the unions to read during the summer. Get one and pass it around and you will be all ready to act with intelligence and enthusiasm a little later in the year.

I have often wished to recommend the Responsive Readings to the unions and take this opportunity to do so. The subjects are no longer published in the W. T. P. A. catalogue but the Readings are brought out the same as usual every month. For one dollar a union can have new ones every month for the entire year. I do not believe there is any better way to acquire knowledge concerning our different lines of work than to read these aloud in the union. They are always written by people thoroughly well up on their especial subject and are entertaining as well as instructive. New ones are brought out every year but the most valuable old ones are electrotyped and can also be ordered of the W. T. P. A.

A new leaflet on "The Duties of W. C. T. U. Secretaries," written by your Corresponding Secretary, has just been published by the W. T. P. A. I believe it will be helpful to all secretaries, whether local, county, district or state, and if it is, it will bring its own reward. Please remember all orders for literature should be sent to the W. T. P. A., 184 La Salle St., Chicago, and not to National headquarters.

It is most interesting to read the letters received at National headquarters telling of work accomplished and plans for the future. It really seems like it were house-cleaning time all the year around with the W. C. T. U., or that we hold a great Durbar every month in the year. All of our workers seem to be busy, some of them with engagements up to the National Convention. If any one has time to spare, don't fail to let me know, for there are inquiries. If you are not reading about the summer institutes, the spring conventions, the plans and purposes, contests, conquests and victories of our great organization in the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL nowadays, you do not know what you are missing. How I wish I could say this to any who may not be reading our official organ at present.

Yours for no cessation of interest, not even in July or August,

SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Superintendents.

Fairs and Open Air Meetings.

AS I have suggested before, this department opens and prepares the way for all departments to reach the masses, if they will use the opportunities offered. With this fact in view, let me ask, have you copies of your state liquor law? Have you an anti-gambling law, and if so, is each of your workers provided with a copy? How many speakers have you engaged to address the numerous open air meetings? How many of the Senior L. T. L. have you interested in this work? Have you invited them to conduct gospel meetings or to hold vesper services so that exhibitors, stock men and helpers could attend when "Day is dying in the west"?

How many L. T. L. bands are in training to march and drill? Will the members of Bands of Mercy and Anti-Cigaret Leagues march? Are School Savings bank depositors prepared to demonstrate that the W. C. T. U. teaches thrift and economy? Will they march and sing the song prepared by Mrs. Oberholtzer? How many fairs, expositions and open air meetings will be held in your state? Have you planned to have the W. C. T. U. represented at these assemblies, and arranged to have a "children's hour" or a medal contest? Have you permanent buildings? If not, why not? Tents are unsatisfactory, booths are unsightly, and our buildings ought to be the most attractive on the grounds, and can be made to yield an income, if rightly managed.

A superintendent, or anyone appointed to take the place of one, should plan to have all departments represented, and should study the special needs of the locality where public gatherings are to be held, so that speakers may adapt their addresses to the special line of work which is necessary. Call on superintendents of the different departments for literature along the lines of work which you wish to pursue, and distribute it judiciously, always keeping in mind the securing of new members, for which purpose the cards of this department should be used.

As gambling, questionable exhibits, and the illegal sale of liquor are a menace to society, every precaution should be taken to close all such places, and the aid of the law invoked where necessary. Write for instructions how to compete for the four prizes offered by this department.

Work Among Miners.

DEAR COMRADES:—Never before in the history of our country has the subject of Mines and Miners been so thoroughly discussed by all classes of people. This department of our work has "been pushed into everlasting recognition," giving us greater opportunities than ever before to gain audience with this class of the world's bread-winners. With the larger opportunity comes an added responsibility, which I am sure every true white-ribbon woman will feel is her responsibility. Let every local union have a superintendent of this important department—only the most capable all-round woman is competent for this work. If you are in a locality where there are no miners you can be of service to your county or district superintendent in supplying literature for distribution in the homes where it is needed and in most cases appreciated.

Last year Illinois carried off the National banner awarded to the state making the best report of work done. Shall Illinois retain it another year or are other states going to enter the contest? Only faithful, earnest work secures this, and I realize that nearly half of the year has already gone by. Let us be up and doing and redeem the time. Keep a minute account of all work done and report it faithfully, that "all the fragments may be gathered and nothing be lost." With an overcoming faith let us make this a year of victory for our department.

Yours for service,
MRS. H. D. HALL,
Associate National Superintendent.
Aurora, Ill.

China.

Mrs. Farnham asks us to send one of our missionaries to China to visit the different ports.

Miss Eva Palmer, who has been eleven years in China and speaks the language fluently, is willing to give part of her time to our work in Shanghai. Will some friends find the money for us to start Miss Palmer, of Law-k'-e Cheh, Kiang, on this greatly-needed work?

Japan.

The temperance work at the Osaka Exposition, under the able superintendence of Miss K. G. Smart and Rev. K. Miyama, is moving on apace. A new building is erected on ground leased for temperance work. Miss Smart writes: "The ladies here are hustling after the coffee, cakes, dishes, cook, and other things too numerous to mention. I start out shortly after tables, benches, and decorating material. Mrs. Meyers has very kindly offered us the free use of her house in which to store our literature, or that which we are not using, so that a fresh supply can be sent out each day. I think that I told you in my last that I am advancing the funds to build the building and get things under way, which we hope to secure back through coffee or some other way. It was too splendid an opportunity to lose. The Bible Society closed a contract with me last night to pay us 100 yen for the little plot of ground, twelve feet by fifteen, just in front of our building. Here for several hours each day they will have a table and some signs and one of their men will stand on a box and try to sell Bibles; the rest of the time we can use it as we please, and can go over it as much as we like. The Gospel Hall people have very kindly consented to give us three hours each day, from nine to ten in the morning, and from twelve to two in the afternoon. With the immense crowds constantly going and coming these are very good hours, though of course not as good as many others. Today we had a most enthusiastic meeting in the Gospel Hall, a crowded house, and much interest manifested, besides several pledge-signers. The temperance meetings there are well under way at last. You should have seen how greedy the people were to get hold of our temperance literature, that which we gave away; few seem to have the means to buy. I saw many of them reading the leaflet given them, before they got out of the house, and others went away reading as they went. I have the bunting, evergreens, and flags all purchased and ready to put up next Monday morning, and if the pictures get here in time we shall be ready for business Tuesday a. m. DOCTOR ON FOOD

Experimented on Himself.

A physician of Galion, O., says: "For the last few years I have been a sufferer from indigestion and although I have used various remedies and prepared foods with some benefit it was not until I tried Grape-Nuts that I was completely cured.

"As a food it is pleasant and agreeable, very nutritious and is digested and assimilated with very little effort on the part of the digestive organs. As a nerve food and restorer it has no equal and as such is especially adapted to students and other brain workers. It contains the elements necessary for the building of nerve tissue and by so doing maintains an equilibrium of waste and repair.

"It also enriches the blood by giving an increased number of red blood corpuscles and in this way strengthens all the organs, providing a vital fluid made more nearly perfect. I take great pleasure in recommending its use to my patients for I value it as a food and know it will benefit all who use it." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

lighted with them. The tables and benches are ordered, too, and will be ready at above time. There is little doubt but that we shall have crowd enough. Yesterday and to-day I stood in the door of the Gospel Hall and acted as an advertisement for the temperance meetings. The crowd came up to look me over and the other workers invited them to enter the audience room, and the room was soon filled."

India.

"The Women's Home" at Bangalore is carried on under the auspices of the local W. C. T. U. The first year's work has been eminently successful. Already the Home has sheltered ten women with their four children. The inmates are instructed in all branches of domestic work, flower-gardening, poultry-rearing, and plain needlework. The Home is entirely undenominational, while strictly Christian in its aims and teachings. Women are received the moment they express a desire to reform.

Cape Colony.

Miss McGregor writes: "Several unions are considering inebriate work, and before long we expect to start collecting for a Home to be erected near Cape Town. At present some unions are aiding the Salvation Army to furnish rooms in their Cape Town Industrial Home to accommodate women inebriates, and when this is done will turn their attention to a W. C. T. U. Home for Women Inebriates."

Burmah.

Mrs. Beedham is organizing in Savoy. She writes: "On Thursday I am to give a lecture on 'The Analogy of the Snake.' We are having it in the Circuit House, hoping to gain the attendance of the 'society' Europeans there, also the Eurasians, who are nearly all Catholics. These people never hear a straight temperance talk, and very seldom hear the Gospel. I believe they are going to turn out in good force on Thursday. I pray that I may have the grace and wisdom I need to speak to them effectually. Lectures are unknown in Savoy, and temperance lectures unthought of, so it is quite a venture I am making. I have had several opportunities of talking with men who are on the other side. On the boat coming over I was the only passenger.

"I succeeded in organizing a Burmese union, with a membership of fifteen, which will be increased no doubt. I shall hope to have another meeting with them before I return to Rangoon. As a result of the two meetings we have had, thirty-three Burmans have signed the pledge.

"I had about twenty-five Burmese to meet me this afternoon, and, through Mrs. Hancock, talked to them about the pledge and about W. C. T. U. work. I gave them each a pledge card (Burmese) and asked them to take it home and sign it and meet me again. I did not quite know what to say this afternoon, because most of them were Buddhists. I contented myself with reminding them that their religion as well as mine forbade the use of alcohol as a beverage. If we get a union it will be composed chiefly of Buddhists. I have decided to stay for some time in Savoy and neighborhood, partly for the work there and partly for the work in general.

"I received a very hearty welcome to Savoy—everyone seems delighted that I have proved that I came to Burma and not to Rangoon only.

"I hope to be able to report further progress later on. This is just to tell you of the prospects for work here."

More than fifty White Cross pledges were signed and at the close of the meeting Mrs. Unruh received many assurances of appreciation.

Oklahoma conventions and schools of method have been attended and conducted by Mrs. Dorothy J. Cleveland, state president. Weatherford, where the Custer county convention was held, has a Temperance Union of 300 members and a W. C. T. U. of 26 members. The two organizations work in harmony and have held eleven silver and one gold medal contests.

The W. C. T. U. school at Hindman, Ky., has closed for the summer. There were 234 pupils enrolled during the year, and one boy, Mirton Hale, did not miss a roll call during the entire ten months. This school is in the mountains of eastern Kentucky. It is proving very successful and it is hoped that new buildings can be erected and other teachers provided.

On the evening of April 28 the Central W. C. T. U., of Fairmount, W. Va., gave a reception in honor of the city teachers. Invitations were sent to more than sixty teachers, and to the clergy and press. The public schools, Normal School, Commercial College and Westover School were represented among the guests. An impromptu program was rendered and refreshments served. The guests, particularly the teachers, were profuse in their thanks to the union. This union, of which the state president, Mrs. N. R. C. Morrow, has been president for several years, has 195 members and forty honoraries. It has fine headquarters, owns a piano and organ, and will be hostess to the state convention October 13-15. In the first ward of the same little city is another union with sixty active and thirty or forty honorary members.

Campbell County Dry.

Seventeen Saloons Refused Licenses.

LYNCHBURG, Va., May 25—For a number of years all the districts of Campbell county have been dry, except Brookville, which is situated next to Lynchburg. Brookville has had 17 saloons. Today several of them endeavored to secure licenses, but the court did not think they had complied with the requirements of the Mann bill and refused to grant them. It is not thought the saloon men will contest the matter, and this makes Campbell county dry from end to end.

War Waged on Alcohol.

Berlin School Board Orders Instruction to All Pupils.

Berlin, Germany, May 25—The municipal school board has ordered that every opportunity be taken to direct the attention of Berlin pupils to the consequences of the intemperate use of alcohol. The instruction of pupils in natural history will include information as to how alcohol affects the human system. In arithmetical instruction they will be required to demonstrate the business losses following intemperance, and the quantity of nourishing food that is lost by the production of alcoholic beverages.

To Renew Fight Against Saloons.

KIRKWOOD, Mo., May 25—The people of Kirkwood will renew their fight against saloons at an election June 13, which was called by the board of aldermen at its last meeting. They expect to enforce the local option law against dram-shops.

At the city election, April 7, the party opposed to saloons elected an anti-saloon alderman, which made the town board equally divided on the question, but Mayor Daily, who has the deciding vote, is in favor of saloons.

While only sixty petitioners are necessary to force the board to call an election for voting on the local option, eighty names were presented. This has encouraged those opposed to saloons. They also find encouragement in the fact that John O'Laughlin, who applied for a renewal of his saloon license was refused.

One of the local optionists stated yesterday that the conduct of one of the saloon-keepers last summer in allowing young girls and boys to congregate in a garden and drink beer has changed the opinion of the people in regard to saloons. He said he had no doubt the proposition to close them would carry.

When Will Your Postal Come?

You who are sick and need help—when will you ask me for it?

Why do you wait, while thousands are getting cured? They simply write me a postal—just as I ask of you.

I will mail you an order—good at any drug store—for six bottles Dr. Shoop's Restorative. You may take it a month on trial. If it succeeds, the cost is $5.50. If it fails, I will pay the druggist myself—and your mere word shall decide it.

Don't you realize that such an offer would ruin me, unless I had a remarkable remedy? Could there be better evidence that I am curing the sick ones who write?

My records show that 30 out of each 40 pay for the treatment gladly, because they get well. There are 39 chances in 40 that you will gladly pay, too.

My success comes from strengthening the inside nerves, which alone operate the vital organs. I have spent my life in learning how to do it. It is like a weak engine that needs more steam. To doctor the organ is useless; what it needs is power to act. My Restorative alone brings back that power, and in most of these diseases no other way can cure.

My book will tell you why.

Simply state which book you want, and address Dr. Shoop, Box 948, Racine, Wis.

Book No. 1 on Dyspepsia,
Book No. 2 on the Heart,
Book No. 3 on the Kidneys,
Book No. 4 for Women,
Book No. 5 for Men (sealed)
Book No. 6 on Rheumatism

Mild cases, not chronic, are often cured by one or two bottles. At all druggists.

Some Mention of a Brutal "Sport."

To the Editor:

Kindly insert following in morning issue: "The Eureka Gun Club of Lyons will hold an all-day live-pigeon shoot upon their shooting grounds, at the terminus of the Ogden avenue electric car line, on Sunday, May 17. Shooters cordially invited. Secretary."

Yes, sir. We insert the foregoing mention as requested.

We also mention the fact that the shooting of live pigeons from traps is a low, brutal, cowardly, inhuman, barbarous and degrading performance unworthy of any persons above the mental and moral state of Hottentots.

We also mention the fact that it is a disgrace to Illinois that this revolting amusement has not been legally forbidden so that persons that engage in it can be put behind prison bars.

We also mention the fact that live pigeon shooting from traps is on a level with dog-fishing, cock-fighting, bear-baiting and other cruelties forbidden by law in all civilized lands, and persons that practice it properly belong to the dark ages.

We also mention the fact that the good people of Lyons should get together and invite the Eureka Gun Club to go elsewhere with its hideous amusements and lose no time about going, and it need not come back.

We shall hope also to mention the fact on Monday that the police have arrested the entire outfit. We shall take more pleasure in that mention than in any we have made for some time.—Chicago American.

MEAL TIME CONSCIENCE

What Do the Children Drink?

There are times when mother or father feeds the youngsters something that they know children should not have. Perhaps it is some rich dessert but more often it is tea or coffee. Some compromise by putting in so much hot water that there is not much tea or coffee left, but even that little is pretty certain to do harm. It leads to bigger doses. Then come the coffee ills.

It is better to have some delicious, hot, food drink that you can take yourself and feed to your children conscious that it will help and strengthen and never hurt them. A lady of Oneida, N. Y., says: "I used coffee many years in spite of the conviction that it injured my nervous system and produced my nervous headaches. While visiting a friend I was served with Postum but it was not well made, still I determined to get a package and try it myself and after following directions carefully the result was all that could be desired: a delicious, finely flavored, richly colored beverage. Since I quit coffee Postum has worked wonders for me.

"My husband, who always suffered from kidney trouble when drinking coffee quit the coffee and took up Postum with me, and since drinking Postum he has felt stronger and better, with no indication of kidney trouble.

"You may be sure I find it a great comfort to have a warm drink at meals that I can give my children with a clear conscience that it will help them and not hurt them as coffee or tea would." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The Local Union

An Excellent L. T. L. Meeting.

By Mrs. Grace Van Vranken.

OUR union and Junior L. T. L. gave an entertainment to the boys of our village. The program was furnished by the L. T. L., and ice cream and cake were served by the members of the union. By written invitation our eight school teachers were asked to come and bring their boys, which they did. After the program, pledges were passed, five boys and fourteen adults signing the anti-cigaret and several the triple pledge. The entertainment was given in one of our churches at 4 p. m., so the teachers and pupils could come directly from school.

As soon as possible we expect to entertain our girls, using a social purity program. This is the program we used for the boys' meeting:

Song, "Yield not to temptation."

Effective Presentation of the Literature Department.

By Emma S. Norton.

IT has been the custom of our union for many years to devote one meeting in February or March to the Literature department. One year the leading feature was the program made entirely from THE UNION SIGNAL. At another time, a request having been sent to each of the subscribers for our publications, the program consisted of letters and verbal testimonies to the merits of the papers and their most interesting features. Again, the experience of each woman in earning the money for her paper was interesting.

Perhaps the most elaborate occasion was when the home of the superintendent, Mrs. N. F. Colver, was given over to the occasion. Each superintendent in the union was given a window or corner or nook for the display of all she could find on her department, literature for distribution and decoration, pictures of workers in that line. A temperance item was pasted on each paper napkin and the guests were invited to take these home. The waiters wore caps and aprons made of THE UNION SIGNAL, Young Crusader and Watch-Tower.

Of course the program was about our literature and publishing house. Cards of invitation had been sent out with name and price of each paper and an invitation to subscribe. Every device for decorating with literature was resorted to. Some anonymous friend sent us a bright poem touching the occasion.

Presenting the World's Work.

By Clara E. Rowell

THE topic of one of our meetings was "The work of the W. C. T. U. in Foreign Lands." With the report of the World's Convention and a file of THE UNION SIGNAL I was able to cull items for a brief report—two or three minutes each—from a few of the countries where the work is going on. I had to be guided somewhat by the flags and costumes which were available in selecting the countries. We had England, India, Mexico, Norway, Syria (telling of Mrs. Barney's organization at Jerusalem on the day of Miss Willard's death), Japan and the Philippine Islands. All the speakers, except England, were dressed in costume made up by means of pictures in books of travel, and carried flags.

A native of Denmark, in national costume, sang the national hymn of Denmark. At the close, all sang "Some glad day." Just before the chorus of the second verse, a dozen or more children, carrying United States flags, came upon the platform and joined in the chorus, while the audience joined in the last chorus.

The earlier part of the program was a reproduction of Mrs. Hunt's demonstration at Portland, the children using the same foreign flags. This brought out the thought of working for other nations, at home as well as abroad.

Our regular afternoon meeting was followed by a tea, to which friends were invited, and the program was given in the evening, "Friends Night," we called it. Music, decorations, a speech by an honorary member on our present law,—he was a member of the legislature and fought bravely for the prohibitory law,—the recitations by the boys of Temperancetown and Whiskyville, all these made up a program which received high praise and must, I am quite sure, give a larger outlook for our work. It was quite difficult to get the material, but I felt the results more than repaid the labor expended.

A Suggestion for Contest Work.

MR. J. C. KENNEDY, of Binghampton, California, writes as follows:

"I have arranged a little tableau to follow 'The American Creed,' book three. The figure represents 'Queen Temperance,' with four little girls around the queen representing the talismanic letters, W. C. T. U. We used magnesium ribbon light. Just before the curtain opened the speaker, who has just recited the 'American Creed', recites the last half of the paragraph, which begins: 'The call to action has sounded.' It was very effective."

Are You Going Abroad?

If you are going abroad be sure to select the Lackawanna Railroad as your route East. The terminus of that line is within two blocks of the docks of the ocean liners operated by the Cunard, Hamburg-American, White Star, North German Lloyd, Netherland's American, American, Red Star and French Lines. To the traveler, often encumbered with luggage and accompanied by his family, the advantage of landing so near his point of embarkation is at once apparent. Not only is the Lackawanna Railroad the most convenient line to the piers of the great Trans-Atlantic Steamers, but the comfort of its patrons is the special care of a Steamship Agent, who will be found on the docks of all the principal lines. From Chicago three through trains are run daily in connection with the Nickel Plate, offering a service unsurpassed in luxury and convenience. From St. Louis there is also a through daily service in connection with the Wabash Railroad.

$19 From Chicago to Boston $19 and Return.

Make Your Work Definite.

By Margaret B. Platt, in the April Number of her state paper, the West Washington "W. C. T. U. Bulletin."

AWAY off in the woods, ten miles from anywhere, lived a family who had come from merry England. They set out to turn a bit of the virgin forest into a home, with nothing but their hands and pluck to help them.

It was twelve years before the home mother saw the inside of a church. Then she and her husband were in town and passed one. She said, "If I could only go inside, it would relieve the ache for the old church at home." They went to the parsonage and asked to go in. The minister assented heartily and showed them in. A W. C. T. U. prayer meeting was in progress. After the devotions came the program, followed by warm greetings to the visitors from the pastor's wife and the other white ribboners. Can you imagine this woman's delight? Men living in the woods do not have so hard a time as women, though they work tremendously hard to level the giant trees and grub up their roots; though they carry many burdens in order to minister to the material needs of a growing family. But, after all, it is not hard work that kills as often as loss of spirit? The isolation of the women in the woods of West Washington and on the plains of East Washington has driven many insane. Business, of necessity, takes the man out among men, where his spirit is quickened, while the woman may have no such relief.

There was one member of the union this afternoon who saw the soul of the stranger hunger and determined to minister unto it. She sent UNION SIGNALS, magazines, our leaflets, and Christmas cards to all the family, stories for the children and a personal letter occasionally.

This was done year after year. The result is a warm personal friend, an enthusiastic member of the union, and lately the eldest son and daughter joined the Y. The young man says he means to go into contests till he wins a medal, if it takes till he is seventy. Another thing—these three do not fail to testify by always wearing the white ribbon in sight. A badge under one's jacket doesn't testify for us.

This house mother visited a neighborhood where a little enterprise had brought together a score or so of laborers, and where a saloon was planning a start. The liquor traffic always scents a pay roll from afar like a hound does a hare. Some of the mothers and wives were distressed. They said to their visitor, "What do you think of it?" She pointed to her white ribbon, saying, "That tells what I think of it. Everybody knows what that means. I belong to the W. C. T. U. Though I have never been to but two meetings I pay my dues and wear the white ribbon."

I do not know how much else the sister has done who helped this family into a larger life, but I have happened to find out about several things, all of them small in money outlay, perhaps, but rich in thoughtfulness and persistence, and a mine of wealth in love and sympathy.

Who shall measure the results?

Sisters, aim at nothing and you will be sure to hit it. Focus your work upon a point, and keep everlastingly at it if you wish to succeed.

THERE seems no better way to aid the cause of temperance and carry out the work of your society than by placing on the streets of our cities and towns. By so doing you furnish water not only to man, but to horse and dog as well. ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUES furnished gratis upon application, and SPECIAL PRICES given to all branches of temperance work.

The large spruce and pine forest skirting Delta, Pa., was set afire by a careless youth who tossed a lighted cigaret into a pile of dry brush. Timber valued at $25,000 was destroyed and for a time the town was threatened.

Astoria, Ill., has voted out saloons and immediately contracted for 50,000 hard bricks for additional sidewalks. The solid improvements in Astoria have always been made in anti-saloon years.

A Chautauqua for Congregational clergymen and laymen of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and adjacent states will be established near New Buffalo, Ind. President King of Oberlin college will head the assembly.

Thomas H. Coggins, an old resident of Chetopa, Kans., is dead. He willed his property, valued at $10,000, to the Prohibition party. It is said this is the first time in the history of the country when an estate has been willed to a political party.

The celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the Immaculate Total Abstinence Society of Irwin, Pa., was the greatest event in the history of the town. The day was a general holiday, citizens of all denominations giving a helping hand to make the affair a success.

Sixty-nine years of work for poor children is the record of the New York Home for the Friendless. During the past year 172 children have been admitted to the home; 9,611 children have been taught and cared for in the twelve industrial schools and 1,971 youngsters have attended the nine kindergartens.

The clerk and treasurer and all but one of the aldermen recently elected in Greenville, Ill., are no-license men. The license candidate for city attorney was elected by one vote and the vote for mayor was a tie. On drawing lots the license candidate drew the office. The election for mayor and attorney is to be contested.

A new law of Pennsylvania authorizes a court to commit a person addicted habitually to the use of intoxicating drinks or drugs to a hospital or asylum for one year or less, on petition of two relatives or friends of the afflicted person. Payment must be made or security given to the authorities for the cost of his board, care and treatment.

The child labor bill, known as the Marshall law, went into effect throughout South Carolina, May 1. Under the provisions of this law no child under ten years of age can legally work in any cotton mill. An exception is made where the labor of children under this age is absolutely necessary to the support of a widowed mother or helpless father.

Despite the fact that the requirements for teachers' positions in the Philippines are exceedingly exacting, the qualifications are to be still further raised. After Sept. 1 of this year, all teachers who are to be sent to the Philippines will be placed under civil service rules. Examinations will be held throughout the United States this summer for the purpose of creating an eligible teachers' list numbering 200.

The prohibitionists of the city of Boston have endorsed the plan of Mr. Fred. E. Britten to have preaching services Sunday afternoons in Tremont Temple. A strong committee on preliminary organization has been appointed. Pledges are being secured to meet the necessary expenses. Mr. Britten expects to hold his first service the last Sunday in May and to continue indefinitely after that.

Mt. Sterling, Ill., voted out saloons this spring for the first time in fourteen years. The school children took an effective part in the campaign. Mrs. N. M. Rigg, who superintends the Junior League of the M. E. church, had badges printed bearing the words "No Saloons." She offered to give a badge to each child who would wear one. Three hundred and twenty-five were printed but were not enough to supply the demand.

No more cider, sweet or hard, can be sold in the commonwealth of Massachusetts without a license. The superior court has decided that sweet cider is as much under the ban as whisky. The compilers of the revised statutes of Massachusetts thought they would make the second section of the liquor law more intelligible, so they inserted a comma here and there. One of these commas has caused the trouble for the cider makers and users.

Rev. F. H. Argo, the young rector of an Episcopal church at Rocklidge, Pa., has shown what one determined man can do in driving out gamblers. Some pool room men who had been forced to leave Philadelphia established quarters near Mr. Argo's church. He called upon them but was denied admission. He then told the gamblers it would be better for them to go away quietly, for he should keep after them until every one was convicted. After a consultation the gamblers notified the clergyman they would leave at once and they and their belongings disappeared.

The International Reform Bureau, of which Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts is superintendent, expects soon to buy a building, either a small one to cost $8,500, on which about half has been conditionally subscribed, or a large one to cost $100,000, on which $20,000 has been subscribed conditional on all being reliably pledged. In the plan of the larger building there would be included a hall, a printing establishment, a hotel where reformers permanently or temporarily in Washington could "get together," in addition to offices and a school of civics, chiefly a correspondence school and bureau of information.

The plans and program for the Emerson Memorial School which is to be held in Boston and Concord in July are nearly perfected. The school will open on Monday, July 13, immediately after the close of the National Educational Convention in Boston, and continue three weeks. There will be thirty lectures, covering the various aspects of Emerson's life and work. The morning lectures will be given in Concord and the evening lectures in Boston. Two afternoons will be devoted to memories of Emerson by men and women who were personal friends of the great thinker, and there will be throughout the period of the school special Sunday services, with sermons and addresses by eminent lovers of Emerson.

"A SECRET."

How to Preserve Youth and Beauty.

"Use well the forces of to-day;
To-morrow they depart
To join a force invisible,
Wrapt up in Nature's heart.

ONE great secret of youth and beauty for the young woman or the mother is the proper understanding of her womanly system and well-being. Every woman, young or old, should know herself and her physical make up. A good way to arrive at this knowledge is to get a good doctor book, such for instance, as "The People's Common Sense Medical Adviser," by R. V. Pierce, M. D., which can readily be procured by sending twenty-one cents in one-cent stamps for paper-bound volume, or thirty-one cents for cloth-bound copy, addressing Dr. Pierce, at Buffalo, N. Y.

The womanly system is a delicate machine which can only be compared to the intricate mechanism of a beautiful watch which will keep in good running order only with good care and the proper oiling at the right time, so that the delicate mechanism may not be worn out. Very many times young women get old or run down before their time through ignorance and the improper handling of this human mechanism. Mental depresssion, a confused head, backache, headache, and many symptoms of derangement of the womanly system can be avoided by a proper understanding of what to do, in those trying times that come to all women.

CUPID'S PLACE.

Cupid has no place in a girl's heart if she is nervous and irritable, feels dragged down, worn out for no reason that she can think of. In such cases the body is not sound. The nervousness and other symptoms are telegraphed all over the body by the nerves, which is the telegraphic system of the human body, because the weak spot demands attention. The weak back, dizzy spells and black circles about the eyes are only symptoms. Go to the source of the trouble and correct the irregularity. The drains on the womanly system and the other symptoms disappear. This can be done easily and intelligently.

The correctness of this advice is amply proven by the experience of many thousands of women—a large number of whom have written of their experiences. So sure of it is the World's Dispensary Medical Association, the proprietors of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, that they offer $500 reward for women who cannot be cured of Leucorrhea, Female Weakness, Prolapsus or Falling of the Womb. All they ask is a fair and reasonable trial of their means of cure. Their financial responsibility is well known to every newspaper publisher and druggist in the United States. This wonderful remedy therefore stands absolutely alone as the only one possessed of such remarkable curative properties as would warrant its makers in publishing such a marvellous offer as is above made in the utmost good faith. It is a medicine which has stood and numbers its cures by the thousands. It is a perfectly safe tonic in any condition of the system, being entirely vegetable.

HOW TO ASSIST YOUR GIRLS TO WOMANHOOD.

"The change from maidenhood to womanhood is one that involves the whole body—it manifests itself in the voice and the nervous condition," says Dr. Pierce. "It should be natural and like gradually falling asleep. Owing to present modes of living, however, the nervous brain energy of young girls is forced—the necessary nutrition for tissues, blood and nerves is wanting, and consequently the young girl fades like a flower in some bad atmosphere. Tight lacing is another cause for this condition. The strain at this time upon the blood-forming structures may be too great. Disorders of the functions peculiarly feminine are nearly always dependent upon the defective nutrition. Hygenic measures are most important. Fresh air and sunshine are more than ever necessary—then I have found in all such cases that my 'Favorite Prescription' is just the vegetable tonic for the female system at this time."

"I cannot express my thanks for the benefit I have received from Dr. Pierce's medicines," writes Mrs. Julius Wehrly, of Cambridge, Dorchester County, Md. "Took your medicines as directed and they did me a world of good. I took 'Favorite Prescription' and feel that a perfect cure has been effected. Your medicine did all for me that I could wish. I feel like thanking you a thousand times for the good you have done me, and for the kind and fatherly letters which you wrote. I shall always speak a good word for your medicines whenever I can."

THE HARM ALCOHOL DOES.

All other compounds intended for women only are made with alcohol, or alcohol is a large component—this alcohol injures the nerves. The little red blood corpuscles are shrunken by alcohol. Therefore they do harm.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription was the first exclusively woman's tonic on the market—it has sold more largely in the past third of a century than any other medicine for women. Do not let the druggist persuade you to try some compound that has not had the test of so many years' success. Every woman should be careful that the liver is active and the poisons are not allowed to clog up the system—get rid of these poisons by taking a vegetable laxative occasionally—such as Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. They do not gripe and will not harm the most delicate system.

"That depends upon what you may still have to do. I am entirely at your service for the next half hour. Please do anything that you may still have on your list," said Mrs. Langley kindly.

They had reached the outskirts of the town when Mrs. Langley, in the midst of some remark of Hugh's suddenly pulled the checkstring.

"Oh, Mr. Brotherton, excuse me! The postoffice reminded me of Bob's stamps. I am so sorry to trouble you, but would you mind—Oh, thanks; that is good of you," putting her purse into his hand; "five shillings worth, please."

Was it possible that the young man left the carriage reluctantly? Whether it was or not, he had no sooner disappeared within the postoffice than Mrs. Langley, leaning forward, slid along the fastening of his bag, opened it, lifted a few papers, and closed it again. Then she leaned back in her corner, pale and a little breathless. The papers had concealed a bottle of whisky. Hugh, who was waiting to be served, saw what happened between the papers and magazines in the window. When he returned, with apologies for the unavoidable delay, the lady thanked him warmly, and at once led him back to the point at which she had broken into his account of the plans he had in his mind for the benefit of the lads who frequented his mission-room. She listened with the closest interest and attention, and all the time was crying within herself:

"What does it mean? What in the wide world does it mean? You, of all men, a humbug and a hypocrite? I'll never, never, never believe it!"

Hugh was still speaking when Thomas stopped at his rooms.

"Are we at your place already? How provoking! Do come and finish telling me about it as soon as you can."

"I will, as soon as I get things into train," promised Hugh, taking up his bag. "By the way, you would never guess what I have here," and opening it, he drew, aside the papers sufficiently to afford a peep. "Now, today I might have been seen coming out of a wine merchant's office. I didn't half like having to go in, but I heard nurse say that she wanted some whisky for medicinal purposes—outward application of some kind."

Mrs. Langley was joyfully conscious of a sudden loosening of the tension of the muscles about her heart.

"How kind of you; but next time I advise you to let the nurse get her own whisky—if whisky she must have. You are much too confiding, Mr. Brotherton. A suspicious person, seeing you do a thing like that, might easily make a scandal."

Her tone was so unaffectedly kind that Hugh was more than half persuaded that he had been mistaken as to her action in the carriage. Subsequently, he became convinced of it. Still, it was safer to have explained away any possible suspicion, and he did not regret having done so, although nurse must inevitably have the whisky.

That same afternoon he went to Mrs. Langley with joyful news, entering her drawing room with an eager, boyish flush upon his face. Not an hour since he had learned that, as the definite result of his address in the mine, two of the odd dozen had promised to sign the pledge.

"That's the sort of encouragement that really helps a man," said Hugh, with something very like tears shining in his eyes.

"How glad I am! How glad I am!" repeated Mrs. Langley, all the more earnestly because of her pain of the doubt that had so lately tortured her.

"I am so glad—so very glad!" she repeated softly. "Mr. Brotherton, I must come and see those pledges taken."

"I hope you will. You don't know what a help and encouragement your sympathy is to me," said Hugh.

He meant it too, and returning humbly to his rooms, he repented in metaphorical sackcloth and ashes, of his miserable falsehoods and duplicity. He would yet be worthy of all the goodness and favor shown to him. Please God he would. Merciful heavens! What an escape he had had!

The Sale of Liquor in Yellowstone Park.

James Fullerton, Correspondent.

RED LODGE, Mont., June 1.—In the fall of 1901, some friends, on whom I could rely, coming from the Yellowstone National Park, informed me that liquor was sold at all the park hotels as freely as in city saloons. As I knew that the game was being killed I considered it time that the matter was laid before the President, who had, as I understood, been ready to unsheath his sword in behalf of morality and a strict enforcement of the law. I wrote him, suggesting that he investigate. The assistant secretary of the interior, Mr. Ryan, replied that he would look into the matter and if he found it as I had stated would apply the proper remedies. Nearly a year passed and I had letters from friends telling me of the continued slaughter of the game and the flagrant violation of the park rules in selling liquor. They further stated that the park was no longer run in the interest of the people, but solely by and for the Yellowstone National Park Transportation Company. I consulted influential friends in California and Colorado who told me to investigate and they would support me in any way I might need. I therefore took my camera and made a trip round the park, making the following discoveries from personal investigation and by questioning the employes of the Yellowstone Park Transportation Company and the soldiers:

Among the rules governing the park is this: "Rule 9. No drinking saloons or barrooms shall be permitted within the limits of the park." In open violation of this rule there are many places where liquor is sold, one of which is here illustrated. For fear that the company should claim that they sold temperance drinks, I took officers, soldiers, drivers and tourists up to the bar, treating at every bar in the park, and personally tasted the liquor that they drank from the same bottle. I am ready to swear that it was whisky, and that the prices of the different drinks were posted on the wall near the bar, as shown in the picture. There was no attempt at concealment, except at the Titto Station where they had a veritable blind pig.

Not only is this selling of intoxicating liquors a breach of the rules of the park, as ordered by the Secretary of the Interior, but it renders the trip a most perilous one to the tourist. Many miles of that road are cut out of the mountain side and overhang dangerous precipices where a driver needs all his faculties clear, for the least mistake, as a pull on the wrong rein, would easily hurl the entire load to the bottom. Such an accident occurred between Gardner and Mammoth Hot Springs, when thirteen people narrowly escaped death, many being more or less seriously injured and one young lady probably crippled for life. Accidents are liable to occur from breakages or other causes beyond human control, but there is no reason that such risks should be increased a hundredfold by allowing the drivers to obtain all the liquor they wish at every station. Then again, the danger of parties hiring a boat and a guide for fishing; if that guide is not sober the tourist, saying nothing of the inconvenience of being in a boat with a drunken man, runs untold risks.

The Company is willing to accommodate all comers with unlimited whisky if they have the price, but it distinctly declines to accommodate tourists of other transportation companies who wish to use their telegraph system, of which the government has seen fit to give them exclusive privilege, and should certainly compel them to send promptly every message offered them.

The bar at the Cottage Hotel, which has been running as a canteen and gambling hell close to the fort all winter, was closed while the President was in the park, and only cigars sold. As soon as he left it was reopened for the sale of liquor, so I am informed, and I believe it to be true.

Ex-Senator Carter is a stock holder in the Yellowstone Park Company and at the same time owns or controls eighteen or twenty of the newspapers of Montana, of both shades of politics. Thus it is possible for any attempt to clean out this augean stable to be made futile by the apparent weight of public opinion turned against it, whereas, in reality, it is the opinion of one man, Ex-Senator Carter, the political wire-puller of Montana. These papers, controlled by him, refuse to publish articles exposing this fraud and corruption.

The Government has been called on repeatedly by letter and through the newspapers, over the signature of the correspondent, but owing to this deception has not acted. Our army has been and is disgraced in the eyes of our own people and foreigners who visit the park, and it is clearly up to all respectable citizens who have the honor of our country and army at heart, to sign petitions to Congress that will compel those in authority to do their duty and expel those guilty of the breaches of the rules of the park. The superintendent who allows it should be promptly dismissed from the service, if he does not get severer punishment.

Iowa Work and Workers.

Mrs. Dunham in the Field.—Saloonkeepers Protected.

Clara P. White, Correspondent.

VOLGA, Ia., June 1.—Mrs. Carrie K. Godfrey, our state treasurer, joined the W. C. T. U. of Minnesota in 1877, and served as lecturer and organizer for several years. Since her residence in Iowa she has been state superintendent of Evangelistic Work; also of Institute Work, and county and district president. She has held the office of state treasurer for five years, and has the loving confidence of our white ribboners all over the state.

MRS. CARRIE K. GODFREY.

Our president, Mrs. Dunham, is now in the Third District, where she will continue her helpful work for about eighteen days. She spoke on "Patriotism" at Pleasanton for the G. A. R. on Memorial Day, and twice Sunday, the 31st, on "Temperance." From here she goes to Humeston, where Rev. A. J. Wheeler secured thirty names for a union, effecting a W. C. T. U. organization. She will assist at the district convention at Weldon, June 3 and 4, after which she will attend institutes and conventions, and visit new and weak unions in different parts of the state for an indefinite length of time.

The efforts of patriotic men and women in Marshalltown resulted in 800 ballots cast for a clean city government and 1200 against it. The city council has passed an ordinance subjecting a minor to a fine of not less than fifteen nor more than fifty dollars for entering a saloon except on business. This is done, of course, to protect the saloonkeepers. The law forbids their selling to minors; but under this ordinance they may sell to them and make them drunk, and the parents cannot prosecute until they have settled this fine. Truly, Iowa is raising a crop of anarchists.

Evangelist J. W. Pierce has organized a union at Gravity; also an L. T. L. at that place and at Lorimer, and gained eighteen new members for the Martha Johnson union in a rural district near Mt. Ayr. This union is just a year old, has sixty-four members, about half of its membership being young girls. It has held four medal contests, and has placed literature in every home within its reach.

Missouri Valley, Woodbine and Little Sioux report publication of Sabbath observance articles in local papers. The preaching of Sabbath observance sermons in Waterloo April 19 resulted in such a strong opposition to baseball playing on Sunday that it is believed the practice has been abandoned. Waterloo union has decided to hold frequent temperance meetings to create and strengthen public sentiment in this direction. One of the ministers of the city boldly took as his text on a recent occasion: "The Moral Status of Waterloo," making a powerful showing, by means of blackboard illustrations, of the evils then existing in that place. Since then the law against slot machines and other bad devices is being enforced.

Mrs. Anna M. Palmer has commenced a missionary tour in the middle west and on the Pacific coast, which will continue for several months. She has organized a union at Winthrop since my last report. She also conducted a parlor meeting in Cedar Falls, where the attendance was composed of non-partisan and national sympathizers. She was invited to explain the difference between the two organizations, which she did in her own gentle manner, the "Lord being her helper." Seventeen women gave in their names for a loyal union. One week later the district president, Mrs. Ferris, met with them and a union of twenty-one members was effected.

Mrs. Sarah Cotton, of Cedar Falls, was appointed a committee to secure subscribers to our National organ, THE UNION SIGNAL.

Nebraska Doctors Disagree.

"Smoker" Versus Lecture, Is It a Prophecy.?

Mrs. Dora V. Wheelock, Correspondent.

SUPERIOR, Neb., June 1.—At a recent meeting of the Nebraska Medical Society a paper was read by Dr. Inez Philbrick, of Lincoln, on "The Social Side of Pediatrics." The paper charged that many physicians counteract the influence of scientific temperance teaching in the public school by their private and public use of alcoholic beverages. Several physicians took exception to her statement, declaring it to be untrue as to the excessive use of liquor by doctors. A lively discussion followed in which Dr. Philbrick had many supporters, while a large number opposed her statements. An unsuccessful effort was made to have the paper amended before being placed upon the records of the association.

In the evening a "smoker" was held in the dining room of the hotel for the men, while their wives and the women members of the profession attended a lecture. Is this item a significant prophecy of future conditions regarding the sexes?

Saloons Driven Out of Tennessee.

Organizers at Work—Governor Frazier's Veto.

Mrs. M. E. Gould, Correspondent.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., June 1.—Tennessee is adding stars to her crown constantly through the efforts of two or three energetic workers among our organizers. Memphis has recently enjoyed a visit from Belle Kearney, who organized a new union of about twenty members. There have been three other unions organized that began with a large membership—Dyersburg, Paris and Camden, each with from twenty to twenty-five members.

MRS. S. M. HOLMAN.

Carrie Lee Carter keeps steadily at work and always wins. Wherever she goes she is greatly admired both as a speaker and organizer. We also have a new organizer in the person of Miss A. Daniel, a lovely, talented Christian young woman, whom we have engaged to go into the field at once. She is a native-born Tennesseean and is a fine elocutionist, having both natural ability and the best of training. Tennessee is to be congratulated on securing the services of Miss Daniel.

Our state corresponding secretary, Mrs. S. J. Dosser, has been obliged to lay aside her pen for a while on account of poor health. It is very much feared that our work may suffer for lack of her efficient direction. All Tennessee white ribboners are praying for her restoration to health and usefulness. In the meantime our state president, Mrs. S. M. Holman, is doing double duty while the secretary is incapacitated.

Since the grand work in our legislature, mention of which was made in a previous letter, between twenty-five and fifty towns have surrendered their charters and incorporated under the four-mile law to get rid of the saloons. Recently there were only twelve places in the whole state where liquor could be sold or given away, and the next step will be to drive them out of these places. The legislature passed some good laws that will help in enforcing the prohibitory law.

There was some talk of passing the dispensary bill over the governor's veto; but it was so hopeless when the time arrived, though a special time was set for its consideration, it was not even called up. So many letters of thanks poured in to Governor Frazier because of that veto message he must have needed two or three additional secretaries. It is said by those who are judges that the message is one of the finest documents on record, and also that Governor Frazier is one of the finest governors Tennessee has ever had.

The Largest Union in the United States.

Six Hundred Legioners—A Successful Worker.

Lucy S. Blanchard, Correspondent.

LOS ANGELES, Calif., May 31.—The Los Angeles W. C. T. U. claims the largest membership of any union in the United States. This is one of fourteen unions in the city of Los Angeles and has five hundred paid-up active members and seventy-five honoraries. If there is a larger union than this in the country it is hoped that it will be reported in the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL. It also has under its charge six L. T. L.s with a total enrollment of six hundred members. Can any union report more?

MRS. LUCY S. BLANCHARD.

MRS. S. D. WARNER.

The Los Angeles W. C. T. U. was organized in 1892. There has been a constant growth each year, adding to the membership. One of the chief elements of this wonderful success has been the splendid harmony which has ever characterized the work of the members. The growth in numbers has been due to increasing activity. Speakers have been engaged and at public meetings cards were passed for the names of members. Their most successful platform worker has been Major George A. Hilton, who has added many names to the roll. One hundred names were obtained through a membership contest.

Mrs. S. D. Warner, our W. C. T. U. missionary, however, carries off the honors for being the most successful worker in the West and no doubt in the whole country. Within three months Mrs. Warner secured three hundred members for this union, of which she is herself a member. She devotes much of her time to the temperance cause, going from house to house carrying literature, presenting our cause, getting signatures to the pledge and securing new members. She says if more women were consecrated to this work they would find the field was ripe to the harvest. She seems led by the Holy Spirit and has many strange and wonderful incidents to relate.

Recently Mrs. Warner called upon a young married couple who used wine upon the table. She tried to show the lady the danger of this custom, but without seeming success. The next day she received a note from the wife inviting her to call again. At that time Mrs. Warner met the lady's husband, and again insisted upon the danger attending the use of alcoholic drinks. Before she went away, both the husband and wife were thoroughly converted to our cause, and signed the pledge. The husband, to prove his faith, invited the ladies to the rear of the house where he proceeded to pour out his remaining stock of liquors. His last box of cigars was placed upon a pile of rubbish and soon it was a heap of ashes.

Michigan's Annual Convention.

Editorial Correspondence.

ADRIAN, Mich., May 28.—Prompted by a desire to view a state convention at close range, the editor slipped away from office duties long enough to participate in Michigan's annual meeting, held this year in the beautiful "Maple City," whose hospitable homes were opened wide to the delegates.

It was an interesting convention from start to finish, its strongest characteristic being the prompt dispatch with which the program was carried out under the chairmanship of our dean in the department of Parliamentary Law, Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, who was re-elected state president. The state organization is in fine condition. Fourteen hundred members have been gained during the year, six districts coming in on Benefit Night, and the treasurer reported a balance of $2,000 in hand, a most unusual state of affairs with the majority of state unions, but in Michigan apparently accepted as a very ordinary "affair of state." The reports of the departments were many and varied, all characterized by a note of hopefulness. That of the Medal Contest was ably demonstrated on Thursday evening by a contest for a diamond medal, the seven contestants coming from various parts of the state. The large audience, fine music, and intense interest manifested could not fail to be gratifying to the state superintendent, Mrs. Sara L. Jeffers, of California, who presided.

One of the events of the convention was a trip to the State Industrial School for Girls, located a mile from the city. The inmates, between three and four hundred in number, went through a semi-military drill on the lawn with the precision of veterans, while the full band, also of girls, gave a program of music for the entertainment of the guests. A Y of 270 members has been organized among these wards of the state, homeless girls between the ages of ten and twenty-one, and the influences thrown about them by the superintendent, Mrs. Sickles, and her fine staff of assistants, cannot fail to turn many wayward feet into paths of future usefulness.

The convention closes Friday evening with a lecture by Mrs. Ella A. Boole, state president of New York W. C. T. U., who has also participated in the program of the last day.

It has been a great pleasure to clasp hands with the leaders of our work in the Wolverine state, and the desk toiler's labor will be lightened for many weeks by the memory of the gracious reception accorded her, and the more substantial token of good will—a generous club of new subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL.

To put life and enthusiasm in your temperance work, you should read of victories gained on the skirmish lines of our great white ribbon army, which are chronicled each week in THE UNION SIGNAL. An intelligent comprehension of the great reforms of the day must include a knowledge of W. C. T. U. achievements. THE UNION SIGNAL from now until November 26 for 50 cents. Subscribe at once.

Various Activities In Missouri.

Many Medals Awarded—A Curio Social.

Lena M. Sargent, Correspondent.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., May 25.—The quarterly temperance rally of the Springfield Sunday School Union was held Sunday afternoon, May 10, at Stone chapel, Drury college. There was a large attendance and an excellent program. A chalk talk by our state president, Mrs. Belle Kimball, of Kirkwood, was an interesting feature of the program.

MRS. BELLE C. KIMBALL.

A reception was given at the home of Mrs. W. H. Wade, of Springfield, Saturday afternoon, May 9, in honor of Mrs. Kimball. A very enjoyable afternoon was spent by a large number of guests. Mrs. Kimball spoke at the First Cumberland Presbterian church, Sunday night. She spent two days in Springfield, after attending the convention of the Twentieth district at Marshfield.

The Holden W. C. T. U. held a musical and oratorical medal contest in the First Presbyterian church recently. Miss Ethel McMical won the medal in the musical contest and Master Charlie Cronk in the oratorical. Miss Christine Tinling, of London, England, spoke for this union April 6. Holden held a Curio social at the home of Mrs. M. E. Golladay. Articles were exhibited from Great Britain, Germany, China, Japan, Corea, India, Ceylon, the Philippines, South America and from nearly every state in the Union.

The Andrew county W. C. T. U. convention was held April 29 and 30 at Empire Prairie. The delegates enjoyed (?) a ride of seven miles, after leaving the railroad, through a blinding rain storm, which completely drowned out the first night's meeting. The next morning the ground was covered with snow, but this did not cool the ardor of the white-ribboners, and they repaired to the church and held a very successful meeting. A bounteous lunch, such as only a rural W. C. T. U. can furnish, was served in the church at noon. The papers read were inspiring. Miss Berthe Bowers was the life of the convention, and delighted a large audience at night. Mrs. Dr. Bailey, of Savannah, helped greatly in the meeting. She also gave a fine recitation. The officers elected were: President, Mrs. L. Munson, Empire Prairie; corresponding and recording secretary, Mrs. M. E. Bonham, Empire Prairie; treasurer, Mrs. Lillie Bedford, Savannah.

Miss Berthe Bowers, of Trenton, one of our most popular state lecturers and organizers, was in the Fifth district all of the month of April. She spoke at the following places in Andrew county: Casby, Helena, Rush, Rea, Whitesville, Fillmore, Oak Grove, Empire and Rosendale. At Rosendale she organized a new union with eight members; president, Mrs. E. Pettijohn. Miss Bowers is a charming speaker, delighting her audiences everywhere, and doing most effective work. She is most heartily commended by all who have had her assistance.

The W. C. T. U. medals have just been awarded to pupils of the various schools of Springfield. About five thousand temperance essays were written by the pupils of the ward schools of the city. Eight committees of three members each were appointed to make the awards. The papers were excellent, and have elicited much praise; a large number possessing a high degree of merit. Heretofore one silver medal has been awarded annually to the best in each grade. This year a gold medal was offered for the best essay in each grade, and a silver medal for the second best, making eight gold and eight silver medals, for the white schools, and almost as many more for the colored schools. The gold medals were given this year by Mrs. Fannie Crenshaw, and the silver ones by the Springfield unions. The sixteen prize-winners delivered their essays at the High School auditorium, in the presence of a large audience. Some of the essays will be published, and a large number will be placed on exhibition in the Educational Department of the St. Louis exposition. The medal offered to the Drury Academy students will be presented at the close of the school. Much interest has been manifested by teachers and pupils in the contests, and the work done reflects much credit on all.

Prof. B. S. King, principal of the Douglas school (colored), of Springfield, has observed every fourth Friday afternoon the past year as temperance day. A program of music, recitations, papers and scientific experiments was given, and all the teachers and pupils were much interested. The presentation of medals to the colored school pupils will take place next Monday night, the awards having been made about two weeks ago.

The Scent of a Rose.

By Cecilia M. Young.

CLARA Bryce and her sweet, sunny-haired little niece stood before a solitary white rose blooming in its immaculate glory in the great conservatory. As the tiny fingers were eagerly stretched towards the prize, Clara took Marie's hand to hurry the child away, for what if she should take it into her head to want the flower. The only one left of a host of peerless beauties that had faded and gone!

"Auntie, I want boo'ful f'ower!"

Just as she expected. The blue depths of the baby eyes were growing misty.

With a sigh and a hasty movement Clara leaned over, broke the graceful stalk and placed it in the eager hand. At the same moment the carriage drove up to the door.

"Marie will go with me, to-day," said Miss Bryce to the nurse who came for her charge.

The woman stared, for this was a great concession on the part of her young mistress. The servants, however, had learned to make allowances for Miss Bryce's eccentricities. Clearly, though, there was a change in Miss Clara since the coming of this child.

Marie sparkled with delight as the coachman lifted her to the high seat beside her fine auntie, and soon they were on their way to the park.

As they stopped to water the horses at a fountain, an automobile suddenly came whirling round the corner steered by a showily dressed young woman. The machine had gone beyond her control, and if Miss Bryce's coachman had not dexterously turned the horses aside, there would have been a frightful collision. Instead, the mad vehicle went crashing into the fountain, throwing the woman upon a soft grassplot. A policeman helped her up, revealing the saddest of all spectacles—an intoxicated woman. Bred as Clara Bryce had been, she naturally shrank from such an object with repulsion and ordered the driver on, but just then little Marie leaned forward and with a pitying glance for the wretched being before her, held out to her the gleaming white rose.

The shock of the accident and the sudden vision of the radiant child seemed to lift the pall from the woman's clouded brain, for at this proffered sympathy she took the rose and stood looking at it in a dazed way, then suddenly and eagerly she drank in the delicious odor. The flower shook in her hand, for a long buried scene suddenly arose before here, borne on the sweet fragrance of the innocent days of girlhood. How she loved this flower when it grew in the garden at home. Then another picture shifted into view—that of a still, pallid face, a weary head—her gentle mother's—resting upon its pillow of white roses.

Thoroughly aroused, the wretched girl burst into a flood of tears—tears which played strange havoc coursing down her painted cheeks.

"Poor lady, don't cry!" beseeched Marie. "What is the matter?"

"Once I was as lovely as that rose—just as innocent and pure." The woman seemed to be speaking to herself; then approaching the carriage she said brokenly: "Thank you, little one!"

All the sympathy in the childish bosom swelling at the forlorn being before her, Marie quickly leaned over and impulsively kissed the woman's pencilled brow.

One could see how the sinful one shrank from the touch of innocence, as if aware of the chasm that separated her from this child. In the movement to free herself, the rose fell from her hand into a muddy pool, almost under the carriage wheels. Hastily picking up the flower, soiled and unsightly, she held it out sadly, saying softly to the little girl, "See! I am like that rose, but once I was just like you. That was when the rose was fresh and beautiful; then I fell—as the rose did—and now," she said turning away, and with a tone of desperation in her voice, "and now I do not care where I fall."

Little Marie listened to the delirious words, thinking only that the woman was grieved because she had dropped the rose.

Before Clara could restrain her, the child had clambered out over the step. In another instant she had seized the rose and going over to the fountain had dipped the soiled flower into the water, making it fresh and white again.

"Look!" she cried, joyfully, holding it before the troubled eyes. "It is boo'ful as new. Now, don't let it fall again," she continued, quaintly, as she placed the rose securely in the woman's gem-bedecked hand.

Clara Bryce had been a speechless observer of this strange scene, and at its close she did what became a nine-days' wonder in the social circle in which she moved. She invited the forlorn woman to take the place beside her and then ordered the coachman to drive to the address given—a second-rate hotel in a down-town district.

Every day thereafter during the following two weeks, at a certain hour, Miss Bryce's sumptuous carriage drew up at this hotel, and Clara and little Marie, with a single white rose in her dainty hand, alighted and entered the hotel for a half hour.

Two years afterwards, on a beautiful June day, a sweet, attractive young woman, pale as the white rose on her breast, but with nothing else to indicate that she was the young woman of the automobile accident, stood on the platform of a down-town mission and suggested a vote of thanksgiving to their benefactress, Clara Bryce, who had founded the "Marie Mission," in the name of her little niece.

Then Marie came forward and presented to the new temperance society a banner upon which was embroidered only a single white rose.

ONE Y'S EXPERIMENT.

BY META E. B. THORNE.

ALICE, if we could interest those children in the Flower Mission, would it not do them good, as well as help on one of our noblest departments of work?

"I am always supposed to understand who 'those children' are, as you can scarcely speak five consecutive sentences without talking of that L. T. L. of yours."

"Say our, please. I was thinking that the Y girls might be glad to help us by contributing enough thrifty, potted plants so that we could put one or two into every dwelling of these poor little tenement house children. And a flower in the home—oh, what an inspiration it would be! They do have such hard times, poor little things, to be pure and sweet in such dismal and degrading surroundings."

"Some of them, no doubt, might care for a window-box, if we would give them the seeds of Kenilworth ivy and dwarf sweet peas and nasturtiums and mignonette. I'll furnish a dollar's worth of seeds myself, if you like, Lillian."

"Oh, you dear Alice! What a good idea that is! And we can ask the Y's this very evening to do their part."

Thus, the movement was started. Of course the comrades of Lillian and Alice, like all our own earnest Y's, full of enthusiasm, gladly did their part to supply all the geraniums and other easily grown plants which our energetic L. T. L. superintendents could make use of.

Now, after the lapse of nearly two years, let us follow our friends into some of the homes thus brightened.

"Good afternoon, Mrs. O'Malley. How are you and the children to-day?"

"Good afternoon to yees, Miss Arnold, and Miss Burney, too. It's glad I am, indade, to see both yer swate faces. The children are well, and ye'll be glad to know that Jimsey and Maggie 'll have been goin' to school this three wakes now. Says O'Malley, says he, 'It's arnin' good wages I am these days, since I let the drink alone, and the children shall have their larnin', so they shall.' An' I've got me parlor agin, my dear young ladies, jest as I did whin I was first married, and we're as happy as the burrds and as bright as the sunshine," and she threw open the door of a room, cosily and neatly furnished; its two windows full of blossoming plants.

"It's thim flowers did it, Miss Arnold. O'Malley said that they looked so sad-like and gravin' at him whiniver he had the dhrink on him that at first it made him mad, and oncet he was goin' to throw that swate rose out o' the windy. But he said that thin it looked right up at him and it seemed as if he seen his mother's face, jist as she kissed him and pinned a swate red rose on his coat and said, 'Be a good bye, Jimsey, and niver forget your mother whin you cross the dark say.'"

Less garrulous than Mrs. O'Malley was Mrs. Blair, a gentle, sad-faced woman dressed in black, who laid aside her sewing to welcome her visitors into a neat, pretty room. Such a contrast to their first visit, as Lillian recalled it, and the dirt and disorder that reigned, out of which peered a face haggard and despairing, and giving evidence, by its wild fierce eyes, of the use of some narcotic poison.

"Yes, Millie is doing nicely at school," the mother replied to their inquiries, "and I have all the sewing I can do. I am well paid, too, since you young ladies took so much trouble to find friends for me."

Lillian could not help an involuntary glance at the window where between two small pots, each holding graceful spires of white hyacinth, stood a pot of profusely blooming sweet peas. The pale face was flushed and the eyes suffused as Mrs. Blair noted the glance.

"Ah, Miss Lillian, you know what those flowers mean to me, when my precious little Elsie lay dead through my neglect, because my brain was stupified by morphine. Then you came home with Millie from your meeting, with your hands full of those lovely white sweet peas. You dressed my baby for the grave and strewed the flowers all round her and spoke sweet words of sympathy and hope. You gave Millie the hyacinths and showed her how, by their springing life out of the dead bulb hid in its grave in the soil, they were emblematic of immortality. With all a child's pure, eager faith she brought that precious word to me. Hope seemed dead in my heart since—bereft of my husband, and discouraged by poverty and ill-health—I had given way to a terrible habit, which, because it offered brief respite from my distress, was fast enslaving me. God sent to me, even me, a message of hope by the mouth of my own child. Yes, God sent it!" she repeated reverently. "You were his minister, Miss Lillian, and those pure, lovely flowers were symbols of His thought for me."

For a moment there was silence as a grateful "Thank God!" went up from each heart. Then in almost a whisper Mrs. Blair spoke again: "Yes, thank God that He sent aid to me and also that He helped me to pass it on. Perhaps you heard of that young brakeman who lived on the next floor, and who was killed two weeks or more ago—brought home dead to his poor young wife and her six weeks' old babe. It seemed to me I could understand her sorrow better than any one else, though I could not say very much. These plants were only budded then, but my white geranium was loaded with great clusters of bloom, so I carried it up and set it on her table, and broke off one of the clusters and laid it on the pillow beside the dead white face, that she was staring at in speechless agony. She looked at it a moment, then turned and looked at me. She saw the tears running down my face, and then she burst out crying, and leaning her head on my shoulder she wept for the first time since the awful shock. Then when she could speak she said, 'O, the white, white flowers. They grow up out of the mud and dirt, but they are white and pure. And oh, Mrs. Blair, thank God that, though Frank's work took him down among many that were rough and profane and bad, he kept white and pure. That awful accident happened because another sinned. They say the switch-tender had been drinking and so he turned the switch wrong; but Frank never touched liquor. He was good and true. He loved and honored God, and oh, I know he is happy though I am all alone;' and then she began to cry again, but softly, while I was so glad and thankful that God had let me carry those flowers to her for Him!"

There was an echo of her gratitude in the hearts of her visitors as they took their departure.

At the foot of the stairs appeared two radiant faces, Louise and Tillie Lieder. "O, teacher, come and see our flowers before we take them to the hospital! Do come and see them."

Of course they went in where the mother met them with smiles and tones of gladness, which spoke volumes in spite of broken English. Two windows were fairly running over with flowers, white and scarlet geraniums, roses, petunias and mignonnette, thriving as flowers do when cared for by those who love them.

"Aren't they lovely, teacher? Won't they make the sick folks glad? Make 'em 'most well? And oh, teacher, I'm going to be in the hospital some day, and so is Tillie."

Then in answer to the looks of questioning the child continued: "Dr. Johns says we can learn to take care of sick folks and wear a white cap and apron like Miss Lane! Yes, be a nurse and make sick folks well."

And so the happy voices went on while the mother added only: "Yah, yah! Me tink goot, make sick peoples vell! Die blumen—die flower, dey goot, like, like—die sonnenschein. Yah, yah, sehr goot!"

FLOWER MISSION GRACE.

By Frances Bennett Callaway.

A VIOLET.

READERS of THE UNION SIGNAL who remember a sketch printed last year entitled, "Bee's Flower Mission," may be interested to know the sequel of the story.

We began our work by sending one box of flowers to some children down town, on the East Side in New York, and with each box we sent a note of loving greeting, for we mean always to send loving flowers. We gradually increased the number, and before the close of the season we sent from four to eleven boxes a week.

Such messages of gratitude were returned that we began to look with fresh interest upon our gardens and fields overflowing with fragrance and bloom and to consider how we could send more of them to the little children down there in the heat and stoniness of the city who have no refreshment of flowers or trees or grass about their homes. Surely when God made so many flowers, He meant them to go all round among His children.

We found by experience that the white field daisies and garden pansies were the best to send, because it was the easiest to get enough of them to divide among several hundred children. Of course we sent other flowers, too, always taking pains to let them stand several hours, if possible, to fill their stems with water. This is such a help in keeping them fresh.

White lilac blossoms and lilies of the valley made a lovely box, and crimson and white peonies, with their long stems and glossy leaves, were fine to pack. We sent roses carefully wrapped in cotton with bunches of the fragrant old-fashioned garden pinks, mignonette, violets, ferns, geranium blossoms and wintergreen. When there was room we put in branches of glossy chesnut, and oak leaves, with pine boughs, carrying with them the spicy odor of the woods. Our dear little Oualee brought pink clover "that the city children might know what the cows did eat."

The boys with nasturtiums and goldenrod brought empty birds' nests, but of these they had to give an honorable account, for L. T. L.'s do not approve of robbing mother-birds. Sweet peas, asters, zinnias and golden glow were sent to brighten dark places. Besides garden flowers, we sent thirty different varieties of wild flowers. Some of these we labelled, and when we could, we wrote out the bits of stories that belonged with them.

A stalk from a currant bush loaded with brilliant red fruit accompanied one lot of flowers; a bunch of catnip for sick babies was put in with another; and occasionally apples, pears, maple sugar or picture books have added cheer to our boxes.

At the close of the season word came that the children of this village sent away more bouquets than all the other towns in the county put together. While we were humbly glad, we had no reason to be proud, for the number sent, two thousand, was not large.

With our uprising we had many downsittings and were often cast down, though never in despair. In one of these times of perplexity I went to Miss Gordon and she said:

"Frances, the Lord has all kinds of grace, and I believe He has flower-mission grace."

We have every reason to believe that Miss Gordon was right, for the grace and loving kindness of our dear Lord has been with us every step of the way.

One of our difficulties was to find a suitable place where we could meet and pack our flowers. Finally one W. C. T. U. woman with a heart of gold gave us the use of her back porch. Elizabeth Gordon met with us there, and I remember it wasn't any time before she was conducting an L. T. L. meeting out on the back woodpile. The charm and grace with which our beloved Miss Gordon presided over these children, perched around her, would have made angels smile. When our hostess heard what was going on, she at once invited all into her best room and gave them the use of her organ. Several new members joined that day.

Friends interested in our flower mission work have this year built a cottage, where Miss Gordon is to have her home when in town, and here the L. T. L. Flower Mission are to have a room fitted up permanently for them.

Another serious difficulty has been the lack of money to carry on our work. Our sister Y's have been good to help us, as have also been the business men in the village, besides many other friends, but if our work shall continue, we feel it ought not to be a burden to any one.

This summer two of our members expect to go away to study book-binding. Upon their return, they will teach other flower children, and in time we hope to start a book-binding plant. Friends have promised us their patronage, and when once fairly started we trust that our treasury if not overflowing, will at least, contain money enough to supply our needs.

We have five station girls with white satin badges who look after the work and keep an account of the bouquets in their notebooks. They discover where flowers are most plentiful in gardens, fields or woods, distribute seeds among younger children, and bring in baskets of flowers on Flower Mission day. One of these station girls, Edith, our business manager, sees that the work goes on regularly every week. She looks after the collecting of flowers and knows how they should be packed. In the absence of the superintendent, she can address the boxes and attend to the press notices every week. After the boxes are packed, Edith puts on a gingham apron and sweeps up every leaf and sprig and blossom so that no one would ever know a Flower Mission had been in sight. Edith has a salary of twenty-five cents a week, and she earns every penny of it! It is to the faithfulness of Edith and our flower-station girls that we owe the success of our work.

There is a good deal of fun and frolic in the work, but it is not always easy, as one small scrap of a girl, Marguerite, can testify, carrying boxes almost as large as herself on a day when the wind in this little hillside village blows like a hurricane and almost blows away the boxes, Marguerite, and her sailor cap together. The girl in the country rising at daylight and going out in the rain to gather flowers before breakfast, that they may be sent to the station in time, knows that it is not all play, as do the faithful children who have worked from early morning until late afternoon gathering and tying the flowers. One night some of the girls worked until nine o'clock, and then, as the expressman had gone home, they themselves carried their boxes to the station.

Last summer we sent supplies of flowers to Pastor Wilds' Flower Mission, 134 Broome Street, New York every Friday, which were distributed every Saturday morning. We earnestly request that other flower missions in the neighborhood of New York will remember this new flower station and supply them richly with the Saturday mornings' flowers, for the need is very great.

Last year there was much complaint that the flowers when received were withered. One worker writes that she was obliged to pay express charges on half the boxes sent to her. Such carelessness and neglect are ruinous to any flower mission work. With a little pains, the flowers might be sent fresh and fragrant and when proper tags are put on express companies carry boxes free. Another friend writes:

A GROUP OF FLOWER CHILDREN.

"We were greatly troubled because so many of the blossoms came with almost no stems, and it seems to me they should always be cut with the longest stems possible."

These are errors easily corrected, with a little love, a little care, and by remembering that the gift of the flowers is to Christ.

A few weeks ago our girls carried flowers to five prayer meetings, where they were received with such surprise, pleasure and gratitude that we mean to continue the experiment all summer.

Sitting there in the light with the bright faces of the children and flowers around us, we know that the story of eternal love is true, and we were drawn nearer to the Heart that is Strength and to the Life that is Bloom and Flower.

Castile, N. Y.

But the love that is expressed
Makes it seem a pathway blest
To our feet;
And the troubles that we share
Seem the easier to bear.

"Smile upon your neighbors' care,
As you greet.
Rough and stony are our ways,
Dark and dreary are our days;
But another's love and praise
Make them sweet."

Chapter XIV.

ONCE again in the seclusion of his own room, Hugh Brotherton looked the facts of his life sternly in the face, compelling himself to strip those facts of picturesque adornments, and to admit their essential ugliness. It was he—Hugh Brotherton—who had done this, that, and the other ignoble nay, despicable deed. He repeated his falls again and again to himself for purposes of humiliation, yet not all this severe treatment availed to kill the conviction that the real Hugh Brotherton was immeasureably better than his deeds—at any rate, better than those less reputable deeds to which he had lately stooped. Grandad, Dr. Mann, youthful presumption and circumstances were largely responsible for those same deeds; but in the main, Hugh Brotherton still loved the highest, and strove to attain thereto, though with each fall he might have sunk to a lower depth. Still it was useless to shut his eyes to the light in which others would probably view the facts, should they unfortunately become known. Enoch, for instance. Hugh shuddered at the mental picture of the old man's outraged and indignant face. Mrs. Langley—what would she not say? Dr. Mann, Mr. and Mrs. Boyd, Miss Glyn. Hugh groaned aloud. Verily, he was guilty; but surely not so guilty as they would inevitably conclude should the truth leak out. Therefore, hateful as was falsehood to him, the truth must be buried with his past weakness. For the future he must see to it, please God, that there should be no more slips.

The next morning he walked over to a neighboring village with an eight-ounce bottle of the whisky, which he delivered into the hands of the nurse in whose services Pitsmoor had a third share.

She seemed greatly surprised.

"Is this because of what I did the other day? Oh, Mr. Brotherton, it is good of you; but I am so sorry you troubled about it. The doctor sent me some methylated spirit that did quite as well."

"It was no trouble at all," said Hugh, with his sunny smile. "I am delighted to be of any use. There is more in the bottle should you happen to need it."

Then, feeling that he had guarded against possible contingencies, he went on with a lightened heart in search of the two reclaimed members of the odd dozen. Although they were not in any way distinguished units of that dwindling band, he was quite as much pleased with their capture as they had expected him to be. Moreover they held staunchly to their resolution, in spite of much adverse criticism from their former mates. Still, since it was obviously undesirable to put their convictions to too severe a test, Hugh proceeded at once to the Vicarage to consult Mr. Boyd as to the date of the meeting. For Pitsmoor naturally expected of the converts that their pledges should be publicly given.

Mr. Boyd received the news with considerable interest.

"Smith and Cobban," he repeated with some surprise. "Do they belong to the odd dozen? I shouldn't have thought it. They are in my Bible-class, and seemingly nice lads both."

"They have never been confessedly among the odd dozen," said Hugh. "I think that is just it."

"I see. What you said about your friend touched them both?

"It seems so. Cobban said that he knew that afternoon that he would have to come out, on one side or the other. It appears that up to that time neither of the lads could see any reason why they should abstain, yet neither liked to own, in the face of orthodox opinion, that he did not. So they took their half-pints on the sly, and said nothing about it."

"A thoroughly unsatisfactory state of things, but not so very unnatural after all in Pitsmoor," remarked Mr. Boyd. "Still, they had better have joined themselves to the odd dozen. I am glad that you got hold of them. Now, I have often wanted to ask you something. Speaking of that friend of yours, did you ever tackle him on the subject of his position?"

"After a fashion, but not seriously. No, I can't say that I ever did."

"Then, if I were you, I should. When all due allowance is made for him, and I personally am prepared to make a good deal, one can't help feeling that the man is in the way to become a finished scoundrel."

"I am sorry to say that there lives no greater scoundrel than your grandfather has been in his time." The words were echoing in Hugh's brain as he lifted a pallid face.

"I know. I realize it more and more. Something must be done," he said firmly.

"I can't help feeling so. I know the difficulty of appealing, with any hope of success, to a man of that type; but we give a man like Sellers no rest, and to my mind—and I am sure also to yours—the case of Sellers is not half so black."

"I am quite sure it is not," said Hugh.

Mrs. Boyd's kind, young heart ached for the trouble in his face, and Rose had to wink the tears from her eyes.

"Something shall be done," said Hugh desperately, as he rose to go. "Will you all pray for him?"

"That is the trouble. There is no doubt about it, poor chap," said the vicar. "I am afraid it is someone who stands too near to him to be easily influenced. Otherwise Brotherton never would have let him alone."

After that evening they saw nothing of Hugh until the night of the temperance meeting. The news of the intended renunciation had spread throughout the village, and the parish room was more densely packed than usual. When Mrs. Langley arrived every seat seemed to be full; but Hugh, who had been on the lookout for her, found a vacant place beside Miss Glyn, and together they watched him passing from bench to bench, with a warm word and a welcoming grasp of the hand for everyone. He was a little pale, but looked happier than he had looked the other night, Rose noticed gladly. Was it, perhaps, ever so little, because morning, noon and night she had prayed that he might be comforted as well as that his friend might be reclaimed?

She turned her attention to the platform as the meeting began, and was one of the few who appreciated her brother-in-law's opening address.

"It was so square," she afterwards said. "It sounded as though he had walked all round his subject, and studied it thoroughly from every point of view, before making up his mind in which particular aspect he should lay most stress."

Yet, with all her appreciation, the vicar did not move and fire her heart as did Hugh. At her side Mrs. Langley listened intently and with a kindly face. Hugh's earnest and touching appeal was addressed to the unpledged, and as he resumed his seat Rose turned impulsively to the friend at her side.

"I have never signed a pledge. I will go up and do it now, if you will go with me and sign too."

"I sign? What nonsense! Certainly I shall not," she said sharply.

Yet, when Hugh, who had marked the whispered colloquy, came down the room to entreat his friends, as a personal favor to himself, to take their courage in both hands, and "show these poor, cowardly chaps the way" (for, in spite of jeers and nudges from their exultant mates, neither Smith nor Cobban had yet stirred from his seat), she laughed nervously, wavered, and, suddenly rising, followed him to the platform.

There was tremendous applause when, after slowly reading through the pledge, the tall, proud woman—so distinguished in her grace and beauty from the stolid country lasses who half filled the room—took the pen in her hand, and, with evident purpose and deliberation, signed her full name. Rose, who in her agitation followed tremulously, made a blot at the beginning and a smudge at the end. She felt abashed at her clumsiness, but her apologetic eyes met Hugh's, and she stepped back to Mrs. Langley's side blushing. The two young men whom Hugh had won had meantime slouched up, grinning distressfully, and amidst breathless silence they laboriously traced their names on the lines pointed out by their captor. As the last to sign laid down his pen, Enoch burst into a strain of thanksgiving. For the first time in their lives Mrs. Langley and Rose Glyn felt themselves rejoiced over, and prayed for, as brands snatched from the burning. Mrs. Langley barely suppressed a titter, but Enoch prayed on unseeing, and the laugh ended in a sigh.

By the experienced it was admitted that this had been one of Mr. Brotherton's most successful meetings, and Hugh's face shone with pleasure as he stood at the door vigorously shaking hands with everyone who passed out.

"Bless tha, dear lad! God bless tha!" said Enoch fervently. "The Lord Himself sent tha to us in oor need."

Hugh shook his head.

"Don't think too much of me, Enoch. Only God Himself knows what a poor thing I am."

"Well, well; happen it's best for yourself to think so—and the safest," said the old man affectionately, as he went his way. Surely the Lord had removed Miss Milner for His own good purposes in working out the parochial weal.

Hugh went to supper at the Vicarage, where he was drawn much against his will into an argument with Mr. Boyd respecting the principle in which his practice of total abstinence was based. Hugh, as was well known, believed the use of alcohol to be not only dangerous to the morals, but injurious to the body, and, for both reasons, wrong. Mr. Boyd for the first time confessed himself willing to believe that in some cases its use might be beneficial, and therefore right. In abstaining he sacrificed what he believed to be his own personal benefit and enjoyment for the sake of the considerable proportion of his fellow creatures for whom no other course was safe.

"Consequently, our practice is the same, and no doubt—the world being what it is—will continue to be the same; but in order to meet we have traveled by different roads."

"Still you have not proved to my satisfaction that you, personally, would be the better for the use of alcohol," said Hugh, who was secretly nettled by the consciousness of being one of those for whom the vicar was willing to sacrifice himself.

"Nor, for that matter, have you proved to mine that you are the better for you abstinence," retorted Mr. Boyd. Whereat even Rose laughed a little.

"To a certain extent, Mann and you are agreed," remarked Hugh, evading a reply.

"To a certain extent, yes; but Mann does not recognize any obligation to abstain, and I do. Seeing that we are never likely to attain to an ideal state of society, I am afraid that I always shall. Still I respect Mann's independent attitude. Were there no reason at all why I should not take my glass of beer I hope that I should have the courage to drink it in the face of Enoch's disapproval; but, upon my word, I am not at all sure that I would."

"Miss Gyln, does the vicar always mean all that he says?" asked Hugh, turning to Rose.

"I should be sorry to think so," she said, laughing, "but he may be forgiven for meaning it this time. Enoch is rather terrible, you know."

"And with respect to his alcoholic proclivities?"

"Oh, yes; he meant what he said, although he was speaking partly for my benefit," said Rose, mischievously. "Chris cannot endure principles that are cut and dried ready for use, you know."

"Like mine," suggested Hugh gloomily.

He had left the meeting in the state of exhultation natural to his years and to the excitement of conscious success, but notwithstanding that the vicar heartily added his disclaimer to that of Rose, he went home restless and dissatisfied. It was one thing to be borne along on the tide of Enoch's enthusiasm, and another to find oneself breasting the wave of amused, if friendly, criticism. And after all, Hugh asked himself, was he quite sure that his critics were not right? Putting the question of example aside, would he not rather be a man who by strenuous effort had acquired a wise self-restraint than content himself with a despised position among the rank and file of those for whom promotion to a higher level was, for personal reasons, impossible. An hour passed by, and still he sat with his unread book before him, debating the point. True, he had hitherto failed, but as yet he would not believe that for him thraldom was not only possible but inevitable; that he, Hugh Brotherton, could deliberately will to do right and yet have no power to resist doing wrong. God had not so cast him off. God knew his unworthiness and, knowing it, had yet used him as a means of bursting his brethren's bonds. What further proof could he ask of His mercy and favor? He thought over the matter a little longer. Enoch would grieve over the least deviation from the rule of abstinence, but, after all, what did Enoch know of the intricacies of such questions? Even less than he knew of the demands of natures more complex than his own. Enoch, good old soul, tired his muscles day by day, and slept the sleep of the laboring man when his day's work was done. What did he know of an overwrought brain and jarred nerves that cried out in vain for rest? Nothing—absolutely nothing! At this moment Hugh was prepared to go even farther than his vicar. There were, there must be, details of conduct concerning which a man's own conscience was his surest guide. After all it was not alcohol, but his own criminal weakness that had been the cause of poor old grandad's downfall. When all was said for the other side, Mann and the vicar were probably right. Moderation must necessarily be a finer, because it was a more difficult, thing than total abstinence. Surely doubly fine is the case of one handicapped by hereditary tendencies! Hugh liked that thought, and dallied with it until, quite suddenly, he gave up the unequal struggle in which ever since his return home he had been engaged. Conscious of something that held him back, yet refusing to yield to it, he hastily extinguished his lamp, and, turning into his bedroom next door, locked himself in for the night.

FLOWERS IN THE CITY.

By Pastor John T. Wilds.

WHEN midsummer comes and the fields are filled with the life of the flowers; when daisies bloom and make the hillside so full of words from God, the city is just as barren as in the wintertime. Save here and there in parks and in florists' windows, there are no beauties blooming that most of us can see. At night we have to look at the stars and make them our flowers. True, they are far off, but they bring God near.

We of the city's streets are so hungry for closer touches of what God makes, and men and children, and mothers and babies, need these evangels of His love. The great multitude about me is in need of the life that is so rich unto those where trees and flowers and grass grow.

"Please, mister, just one." "Oh, how many you have, and I do love flowers!" "Just one, only one; see, give to this sick child." "Oh, can't I have one, just one, for my mother? Please, please!"

Thus they cry on every hand as I meet them on the crowded streets of the East Side of New York upon my return from the fields. However large the bunch may be, and whatever promises I may make to myself concerning it, I usually reach my study wellnigh, if not quite, flowerless.

They lay hold on me, plead piteously and pull for the daisies which farmers despise. I have seen a child pick up a faded flower in the street with a smile of love, kiss it, hold it to her lips, then press it to her heart, hoping to give it life and sad that it is wounded, bruised and dying away from home. I have seen the child gather from the garbage can, where the refuse of careful pickings has been cast out, and rejoice to get a single leaf or petal. I have found flowers in their homes tended, watered, kept in the sunlight with a nurse's care, and kept, though dead, until others came.

Round about me where I live, are thousands of children. On a bright day the sidewalks and streets are crowded. They swarm like bees after a shower when the sun peeps out from the cloud. They are always in the merry glee of play. Their laughter and shouts make the walls resound with life.

Time and again I stand at my little iron gate with a few flowers in my hand. No word spoken, no sign made, I stand with the flowers, looking at them, loving them, wondering about them, and as though some magic had summoned them, I am surrounded by our human flowers, the children. It is a crowd now, and they are clambering, pushing, beseeching. Just one blossom! I invariably give first to the smallest and those who seem to be the poorest and weakest. If one is sickly, that child is sure to receive an extra one. If one is crowded back by those who are stronger, she is called and made glad. Even when all the flowers are gone and only a few stems and broken blossoms remain, there are those who ask for them. It hurts me to give such, for only the best should be given to these children.

When a box of daisies comes I get within the railing about the church and hand one flower to the first child who arrives. That child dashes away to bring those of her home and her friends—for each girl and boy has a special following. Then begin the rush and the push and the appealing. One day, with a song to call the many, and then a flower to each to call a greater company, in thirty minutes over twenty-five hundred persons were counted. What were the gifts in my hands among so many? Nor did the Master multiply them that day.

It is difficult to distribute in such crowds. It requires patience, protection of body, skill, love, and several policemen. Some flowers may fall into cruel hands and some may be torn in the grasping of others, but good of vast richness is accomplished in the simple touch of the beautiful. Faded and glued to his coat in its death, the young man wears them—"pansies for thought." The first thought of the beautiful and God, the first holy turning about from the earth unto God and His love, do not die when the flower fades. More than once simply a single flower has made the workingman and woman, the boy and girl stronger and gladder, the hard drive ing a little easier; more than once it has spoken long after in a sweeter and more tender life. All seed does not come up; all messengers are not received; but the seed-thought of a flower and the message of the flowers produced most encouraging results.

Possibly the indoor work is more profitable than that of the streets. At the Saturday and Sabbath services, when the flowers are given, we always have a time of silent thought about God's beauty and love. Sometimes we look at the flowers and in the stillness get them to speak to us. It is nice to have a good-sized school so still that the clock's ticking is loud while we hear what the flowers say—and they always say something. Some, thinking the ear is better to hear through than the eye, hold them to the ear and listen intently; others press them to the lips with the love-kiss, hold them carefully and look at them and try to hear. One tot of a boy, who in his rage tore up his pansy, possibly because it would not speak, promised his flower he would be gentle and kind to it, and the flower seemed to tell him he must be gentle to all those about him. Cornelius took the lesson, and this day the little fellow, who for so long was hard to keep still, is one of the very best and tenderest of the many children.

It is not always easy to hear the voice of the flowers but when once learned, it is delightful for us to look and think and then tell what it says.

From the school the flowers are taken home, and when I pay my visits, it becomes an easy matter to direct thoughts to God. At one home, the mother, now in the Homeland, was hopelessly ill; the father was kept from home by work, and the eldest child, a cheerful girl of twelve, was left as housekeeper, cook, and care-taker of three children, as well as nurse for her mother. Four bouquets were found faded, but still in water, on the mantle of the sick-room, where the mother could look at them. Other places in the room were not free from dust, but the mantle was. When I entered there was shining through the poor window a ray of the last beam of day lighting up the mantle and the flowers toward which the suffering mother's eyes were turned. Just then the child took the pitcher of flowers and placed it before her mother.

A few moments before a company of children had begged me for just one flower. The crowd increased as I approached the door.

"Please, please, just one; only one!" was their appeal.

"I am taking them to a sick woman; would you rather have them than let her enjoy them?" I asked.

There was silence, then every voice said, "No!" That was real self-denial.

We went into the woods one day and the master of the woods told us that not a flower should be gathered. Oh, it was hard. There were so many flowers, and we could only look.

A great policeman brought to me a little boy with his hands full. The flowers were withered.

"I did not pull them, Pastor, I found them," he bravely said, and then he led us to where he had picked them up. The policeman attempted to turn away, but stopped then turned again. There was a tear in his eye.

"I was once a lad myself, sir, and loved flowers like your lad. I would like to give them leave to pull all, but I dassent," he said.

Albert laid them back, for I told him to avoid the appearance of evil. That was resignation.

If anyone thinks there is no work in distributing or sending flowers, he is mistaken. It means work—hard, delightful, profitable. No good work is easy. God's work requires care. Love has to go and come with every blossom, and tenderness and kindness must be in voice and face and hand if real good be done.

The day the flowers come is the day God's blessing is very rich to me, and it is the day I have to tell God I need more grace and deepening of love in my heart moment by moment. Flowers in themselves do so much good, but we who hold and hand them out may spoil much of that good.

Some delightfully kind girls in Castile, New York, kept me hard at work last summer in a most charming and refreshing way. I have felt that with every flower came their love and tenderest prayers. I am sure it is making them braver and truer to so lovingly sacrifice their fields for our flowerless homes. Sometimes it seems that the whole valley must be bare, they send so many flowers. When the children thank me, I tell them, "Not I, but God and the good people of Castile."

New York City.

A Children's Day Bouquet—A Primary Exercise.

By Jessie Ewing Stokes.

SELECT ten little children, boys and girls; give to each the flower he loves best, or which seems most appropriate; arrange in semi-circle, and let each child step forward two or three steps as he speaks. They need not be in regular order, but rather arranged according to size, the smaller ones in front. Each carries the flower he represents:

1. THE VIOLET.

"The violet sweet, from 'neath your feet,
I cover grassy swards with bloom;
With joy the rich and poor do greet
My coming at the first of spring."

2. THE DAISY.

"Fringed white daisy, heart of gold,
Emblem of innocence, we're told;
Nestle I close to your heart to-day,
Pure may it be as I alway."

3. THE PANSY.

"Nodding little pansy, I,
Sometimes color of the sky,
Brown, and gold, and yellow, too,
I try to look my best for you.
All the colors you can trace
In a pansy's velvet face;
Friend alike to child and man,
I'll give all the joy I can."

4. THE ROSE.

"Here is a little pink rosebud,
Rosy and roguish and fair;
Of all the flowers you can mention,
With the rose there is none can compare.
When joy abounds, gladly I come;
I solace the grieving one;
Queen of the garden of flowers am I,— Hark to the rose as she passes by."

5. THE GERANIUM.

"Geranium, I, with rich, red bloom,
Fill the air with sweet perfume,
Blossom alike for rich and poor,
Bringing gladness about their door."

6. CARNATION PINK.

"With spicy breath and fragrance rare
Carnation pinks perfume the air;
They give to each a friendly smile,
And glorify the world the while."

7. THE HONEYSUCKLE.

"Honeysuckle sweet am I,
Hark to me as I pass by;
With my tendrils reaching out,
Porch and wall I climb about,
Making sweet the days of June,
Which, alas! must pass too soon."

8. THE SWEET PEA.

"Oh, I am the dainty sweet pea,
Whose blossoms you all love to see;
My colors I vary,
A long time I tarry,
That the world full of brightness may be."

9. THE LILY.

"The fair, sweet lily, with drooping head,
Owes all her beauty to her lowly bed;
So we, although there's many a snare,
Can rise to beauty passing fair,—
With heart of gold, and pure, white face,
May we of sin ne'er bear a trace."

10. THE NASTURTIUM.

"Golden nasturtium, child of the sun,
Gay are my blossoms when summer is done.
High o'er your porch I'll climb,
Blossoming fair,
Or, amid rocks and slime,
Rich blooms I'll bear,—
Golden nasturtium, child of the sun,
Gay are my blossoms when summer is done."

All then form a group in their own childish way, holding high their flowers. All speak:

"Fairer than these blossoms lowly,
Bloom the children sweet and holy;
As we bloom so fresh and fair,
Each with each God's goodness share;
Let us praise him as we may
On this gladsome Children's Day.
Let us beauty give to life,
Lighten sorrow, lessen strife,—
Buds of God's own garden, we Help the world to better be."

All may then drop their flowers in a basket provided for the purpose, and the Sunday-school superintendent or committee on decoration can distribute them among the sick and poor.—The S. S. Times.

"The Desert Shall Blossom as The Rose."

THE Flower Mission has, through its gracious ministry, earned the right to appropriate as fulfilled prophecy and veritable history the words of the prophet.

Any desert place is a legitimate field for a flower missionary, it matters not whether it is a gardenless, treeless tenement district or a cheerless, blighted life. Very literally and practically, however, has been its interpretation of the words in one branch of its work. Through its efforts whole neighborhoods have been transformed; vines have been made to cover, with their green drapery, unsightly dwellings; sun-baked, garbage-strewn yards have developed into garden plots; disreputable-looking windows have been glorified by potted plants, improvised hanging baskets and window gardens; and when real estate was positively unavailable, a roof garden has bloomed like an oasis in a Sahara of dingy roofs.

It has made its beneficent way into those waste places of pain and monotony—the sick beds of the homes and hospitals. Flowers are never so human and sympathetic as in the presence of suffering. No many-volumed, learned commentary on God's Word can at times give as clear and eloquent interpretation of His loving messages as a spray of blossoms fresh from His creative hand. "Consider the lilies," said Christ, as He taught a lesson of faith in Him who so carefully fashioned them, perfect in form and exquisite in texture. The warm, vivid colors of the flower robes lighten the gloom of the sick room and speak a message of hope to the weary, defeated soul. Their memory-freighted fragrance tells the invalid of undying, all-pervasive love.

Into those moral wildernesses—the jails and reformatories—the beautiful, silent messengers have gone, and hearts dull and dead to preached word have responded to the tactful eloquence of fragrant blossom. In the rich soil of memory the seed has fallen, and blossoms of repentance and forgiveness and new hope have sprung up and made a place of gladness within the dreary walls.

Nowhere does the enterprise flourish so luxuriantly as in the crowded cities where the children most do congregate. Those returns come not alone in the momentary joy of the possession of new treasures, but in new conceptions of the world in which they live, new aspirations and ambitions which the sweetness and the beauty of the flowers inspire.

Most truly has it been a twofold ministry which the Flower Mission has performed, and the recipient has not been more enriched than the giver. No dweller in suburb or country has come to a real appreciation of her floral possessions until she has seen them through the eyes of a shut-in, until she has been privileged to catch the look of radiant happiness on a pale face as she laid her choicest rose upon a hospital pillow; until she has witnessed the rapture of a throng of flowerless little ones in the desert places of a great city as she filled their hands with her fragrant blossoms.

"Day unto day uttereth speech," says the poet, and in no way does God so perfectly reveal Himself to His children as through His flower creations; but to the dwellers in our hyper-civilized cities this revelation rarely comes. Our beloved organization proves its divine origin and inspiration in the furtherance of a movement which thus links the beautiful God-created world, in which every flower, shrub and tree is constantly declaring His glory, with the dreary, artificial, man-made world which finds it difficult to realize Him.

Self-Indulgence as an Angel of Light.

IT is an injustice to a child to put it in a hole termed Sunday school, which on a beautiful, bright morning must be lighted by electricity, and here deliberately stifle its own thoughts and aspirations and try to mold its mind into some preconceived form.

Think of a man who claims the high distinction of writing "Reverend" before his name, giving utterance to a statement like the foregoing! One would think the average Sunday school a chamber of torture instead of a chariot of light; and yet this is what a minister is reported to have said from a Cincinnati pulpit—or was it a hall platform? After rubbing one's eyes in sheer amazement at such a topsy-turvy picture, one is hardly surprised at what follows:

I am of the opinion that after a man has worked hard all the week he is keeping the Sabbath in a holy manner by finding rest and recreation in attending baseball games or other varieties of play. Such recreation should be encouraged and would, it seems to me, often be found more beneficial than the sermons.

Were these words merely the isolated utterance of a catch-the-crowd sensationalist they would not deserve notice; but as a straw indicates the direction of a stream, they really indicate a widespread tendency of modern life. It is self-indulgence posing as an angel of light. It is blessing with a text what should be condemned as unholy. Under the guise of a declaration of independence against supposed puritanic restrictions and unreasonable prohibitions, there is an effort made to raise selfish ease and pleasure into a kind of cult. As a philosophy this bold apology of self-indulgence is a revival of epicureanism; as a reaction from intense physical strain and activity it is a clamor for a "good time"; and, as an outgrowth of spiritual declension it places itself before God. The abounding material prosperity of the day, the decay of reverence, the lack of family government, the dissent against all forms of authority—all these things have their influence in throwing about self-indulgence, as a philosophy of life, a glamor of sophistry heretofore unknown.

The true antithisis is not between a gay and innocent naturalism and a gloomy asceticism, as the high priests of the new cult would have us believe—for the one is as difficult to find as the other—but it lies between a soft and subtle worldliness masquerading under the guise of proper self-expression, and the noble, Christian ideals of character-building, duty, self-sacrifice and blessed submission to the will of God. There is not now, nor never can be, a compromise between the deeds of the flesh and the fruits of the Spirit.

By all means simplify the issue between God and the prince of the world by removing any lingering, unreasonable austerity from the path of righteousness, but let us not blur the outlines of the path itself.

What true Christian does not know, by blessed experience, that the happiness and peace that spring up in the path of duty and a good conscience infinitely surpass all that the world can offer?

Why Women Drink.

A FEW years ago the discussion of such a question as this would have startled society. Today the growing prevalence of the drinking habit among certain classes of women makes the question sadly pertinent. Why do our women drink, and who is to be held responsible for this evil which threatens so many homes?

Facts warrant the statement that the women victims of the drink habit are largely found in two extremes of society. They are of the rich, whose wealth of mind and heart have not kept pace with wealth of purse, whose poverty of healthy ambition and purpose leads them to turn to artificial exhilaration for their pleasure; or they may be found in the opposite extreme of society—the girl who has nothing but toil and hardship, through the fault of another, who seeks forgetfulness of a hopeless future of drudgery in the excitement of strong drink. No normal, healthy woman—finding every hour nature's own stimulant in love of home, husband and children, or in the joy of some of the world's real work, caring for the weak and weary or spurring on the discouraged—dreams of needing drink or is desirous of knowing the experiences which it gives.

For these empty lives, filled with morbid cravings, this has not proved a safe world. The demand it has made upon woman in the matter of strict purity and chastity of life and temperance and refinement of habit have been far greater than the protection from its contamination which it has afforded her. Who, nine times out of ten, offers the first glass of liquor to the woman who learns to drink? Rarely will it be found to be another woman. Neither has man been at pains to conceal from her his own selfish indulgence of appetite nor to provide an environment which makes her temptation difficult. Truly the time has come when men must face the long ignored question, "Am I my sister's keeper?'

Justice alone requires its answer in the bringing about of social conditions that shall secure to all classes of women the opportunity to live a full, free, true life which will lessen the temptation to evil. One other act of justice is demanded, that man himself live up to that standard of purity and abstinence which from time immemorial has been used in the measuring and judging of woman's character.

National Prohibition in Peru.

LET no one imagine that the South American republics are wholly dead to the supreme moral issues of our time. Peru is just now experiencing a notable moral awakening. It is a national revolt against drunkenness.

Intemperance on the part of high and low, rich and poor, was seen to have become the ruination of the people. Peru, it was found, was consuming more alcohol per capita than any other nation in the world. President Romana, surveying the condition of his people, took the alarm. He saw that something must be done; something radical and effective. Nor did he shrink from becoming a leader in a national reform movement. Following his lead the people in positions of authority began to take the pledge. The movement spread until the reform became national. The beneficial effects of the new sobriety presently became so marked that nobody could help observing it.

But more than this: President Romana was not slow to see that for the multitudes, moral influence must have the reinforcement of the civic protection. It would be, so he reasoned, a crime on the part of the government to leave the people at such a time as this, all exposed to the ruthless and organized forces of temptation on the part of numberless distilleries and liquor shops. Accordingly, the distilleries were seized and all saloons ordered closed.

Naturally the enforcement of the new regime occasioned some rioting, but the president appears to have proved himself equal to the emergency. If the government had a right to make this new law for the common welfare of the republic, it had a right, and it was its logical and clear duty, to enforce it, and this, if need be, by calling into requisition the entire military force.

The law went into effect last April. For the present, at any rate, the temperance movement is general, and the sweeping prohibition movement altogether radical and national.

Chicago Board of Education and Saloons.

THE Chicago board of education does not own or run any saloons; but it does the next thing to it. It owns and leases the land on which many saloons are kept—ten of them in one block, and some of these are of a particularly disgraceful sort.

A Board of Education in the liquor business does not look well. The spectacle is not edifying. As a piece of object-teaching it is bad. It looks foolish for the school authorities of a city to show themselves to the public as undermining and tearing down with one hand while trying to build up with the other. It reveals a moral obtuseness, a lack of conscience in business matters which cannot but have a debasing influence on the moral sense of the community. If the churches, the ministers and other religious organizations would duly protest against so flagrant a complicity with vice and crime it would not long be endured.

Doubtless hardly a member of the Board of Education would like to be known as being in the saloon business. Let good men and women find some way to speak their minds.

Responsibility of Property Owners. The Chicago papers are saying that if a list of the names of those who own and lease property now being used for vicious and criminal purposes, were published there would presently be something of a social earthquake. Not a few eminently respectable persons, and some eminently respectable educational and other institutions, might be startled on beholding their names in the infamous list. It would, indeed, look to them somewhat like "a section of the day of judgment." Well, even so, it might be a wholesome means of grace to them. It would at any rate be a wholesome thing for the honest moral sense of the community. Who are these men and women who are, more or less unthinkingly, putting themselves in league with vice and crime?

Liquor in the National Park. The illegal sale of liquor in our National Park, the magnificent Yellowstone, as set forth in a correspondence on page 2, calls for the prompt consideration of the American people. The park is government property; the rules governing its control positively prohibit the sale of liquors, and if, as is charged, a regular traffic in the same is conducted for private profit by those temporarily in charge, the situation calls for a full and impartial investigation by Congress.

SERMONS FROM CITY PULPITS.

Lucy Webb Hayes and Her Times.

By John Merritte Driver, D. D.

THE Herod at the capitol, whose first name was Rutherford, was a man of God and mingled his rejoicings with those of the wise men and women who had heralded the tidings of a crusade against the rum fiend, and actually accompanied them down to the new Bethlehem, not to hurt but to help the child of providence.

Herodias, his wife, whose first name was Lucy, was likewise a woman after God's own heart, full of faith and good works, and from the palace sent forth messages of cheer and congratulation. Nor did Herod and Herodias, the good, not the wicked, stop with "words, the money of fools," or even these better linguals:

"Words that weep and tears that speak,"

but the governor bade the leader of the new holy dispensation occupy his own great temple free of charge, for every manner of assembly, and Herodias became one of the Marys, helping with purse and prayer and presence.

Then came the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with its inspiring motto, "For God and Home and Native Land." It was near another Christmas, 1874, and Lucy Webb Hayes was one of the first white ribboners. Three years later she became the First Lady of the Republic.

And now came the crucial test. No one but herself and her God will ever know how much she dared and endured and suffered. All eyes were dazzled with the magnificence of delights conjured by Mrs. Grant, her predecessor in the White House, during whose brilliant reign tankards were continually a-groan and goblets were unceasingly a-glisten. The semi-barbaric splendor of the slave epoch at Washington, when wit and beauty and eloquence and duelling and luxurious living and intemperance ran riot in a furious and maddening swirl, was succeeded by the tinsel and gold, the pomp and magnificence, of the military, with the greatest captain-general of the century, and perhaps of all the centuries, the center of social life, and no gathering, least of all at the White House, complete without the bowl that possibly cheers but always and inevitably inebriates and demonizes.

Before this elect woman reached Washington, a drunken and libidinous press began to sneer and wonder if we were now to have "a lemonade administration." She was repeatedly reminded that all her lovely and illustrious predecessors, from Martha Washington down, had graciously bowed to and that although she personally believed that there is "a devil in every berry of the grape," she must remember that the White House was Columbia's home, not hers, and that it was to be the home and center of all that is gay and vivacious, captivating and enchanting, according to the ideals of fashionable society, and not the haunt of silly and fanatical temperance prudes and puritans; that she was a custodian, under orders from historic and predetermined society, and nothing more. Long-haired men and short-haired women, the parvenus of social life in every American city and community, began to shout: "Pharisee! Pharisee! Pharisee!"

Meanwhile European and Asiatic capitols caught the infection. On both sides of the Atlantic Mrs. Hayes was caricatured in the pictorial press, slandered in the secular press, misrepresented in a large part of the religious press, deprecated, harpooned, and berated by the gadfly penny-liners, held up to ridicule and salacious assault by the professional satirist and humorist, the saloon thug and the brewery bum, and in the private circle was made to feel the chill and isolation of society's high and haughty disdain. * * * *

Entering the White House the French chef introduced himself, and, with many bows and gestures and genuflexions, said to her: "Madame! There are 20,000 kinds of wine. Will milady make out her wine list?"

"Ah," she replied with a merry, yet warning twinkle, in her bright eyes, "20,000 kinds of wine, did you say?"

"Yes, milady; please make out your wine list, at least for your private use."

Then rising, with a majesty worthy of the loftiest creations of romance and poesy, she said: "Then, sir, 20,000 kinds of wine shall be banished from my table and sideboard!"

Heaven registered the vow, angels applauded it, and God helped her to be true to it.

Blessed be the memory of Lucy Webb Hayes! True to her widowed mother, true to her children and her illustrious husband, true to society, church and state, true to the high divinity of her own exalted womanhood, true to the great and blessed God whose worthy daughter she was ever striving to be—what loftier eulogy can man or angel utter? And sweet and hallowing thought ever to be kept in remembrance: it was the religion of our crucified Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, that rounded out her character into more than Corinthian grace and loveliness and made her, next to the now crowned and glorified Saint Frances, the foremost and most inspiring woman of her generation. * * * *

Could finite ears of clay hear and apprehend the voices of immortal spirits, this morning every individual within these walls would hear her voice, and I can well believe the voices of your Saint Frances and the great translated white ribbon sisterhood of the skies, calling from heaven and saying: "O women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union! O brothers, allies who have so often cheered and comforted and strengthened us in the direst of our straits and struggles! O ye who love the stars and stripes of your country, and the cross of your crucified but now risen and triumphant Lord and Redeemer! Do, dare, and give for God and Home and Native Land, and, as doors of opportunity open, for God and Home and Every Land, until maltery and brewery and distillery and legalized saloon shall be no more; until the great red dragon of intemperance and demonism shall be beheaded, and all the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ."

Finish her work, and thus prove to the world your appreciation of her. No other woman will ever have to fight so fierce a battle again as Lucy Webb Hayes was fighting five and twenty years ago.

Monthly Bible Reading.

Like a Tree.

By Rev. Frances E. Townsley.

Psalm I: 3: "He shall be like a tree." The godly, blessed one, is thus. Not a tree, only "like" one, though a man or woman still. All growth is not that of a tree. See the morning glory, or the trailing honeysuckle. Some growths are more suggestive of spread than power, of territory than toproot. Vines struggle, naturally. They are not straight up and down; a tree is.

As a tree the Christ-soul is planted, rooted and grounded. Some people are very movable—here today, there tomorrow; now firm as a rock on questions of honor or principle; later some person or influence has transplanted them, with deceptive promises of greater usefulness. The tree is not so easy to transplant as the vine.

God's trees are set in good localities: "By the rivers of water." Their roots strike down deep into the divine sources of energy, refreshing and life. Notice that "rivers" is a plural word; there are many. The one I need is not the one you require. I may in my spiritual depression need the river of hope. One with a very irritable disposition needs the river of peace. There is another so busy that he can get no time to pray, to think, to aid the pastor, to cherish his own household. A day comes when he goes to bed ill.

"Doctor, can't I go to the store today?"

"No; lie still."

"Doctor, you must get me out of this. I'm in a hurry to go to business again."

The busy mother is laid aside, the tired, care-worn one who has robbed herself of soul-food, praying hours, quiet thought, and she lies there saying:

"I must get up! It's the worst time of year for me to be sick."

But after a time the sick one sits out in the June sunshine, and the pastor hears the whispered word, "I feel sweeter and holier than I did. I've seen the eternals. I have learned to commune with God." Some day the pastor preaches on "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him."

Ah! The soul has struck root at the riverside of meditation.

God's trees are fruit trees. There is great variety in fruit. Over the Divine Householder's orchard read, "Variety in perfection." There are stages in development of fruitage. Where you lack, another has attained. Where one is royal in character, another is a gaunt, meagre beggar. Where we have been turned towards the sun and ripened, another's fruitage may be gnarly and sour.

The variety in fruit is ever apparent. You may not paint a landscape, but you can seize a watering-pot and refresh one. You may not write a poem, but you may live one. Possibly you who can not preach can faithfully exemplify the truth which others explain.

Some fruits ripen in early summer, others in late autumn. Was Abraham's faith the ripest when he said, in Egypt, of Sarah, "She is my sister"? Nay; it was another man who climbed, with his only son of promise, the historic mountain and said, in answer to the inquiry of that son, "God will provide a lamb."

The mellowness of Moses' character is not so apparent when he cries, "Hear now, ye rebels," as when he climbs to view the Promised Land which he may not enter, and turns to lie down in an unknown sepulcher where

"The angels of God upturn the sod,
And lay the dead man there."

A stem is not an apple, but it is necessary to an apple and it may be a perfect stem. A leaf is not a plum, but plums do not grow on leafless boughs. Buds are not packed in barrels to ship, but bud and blossom and leaf are necessary to desirable fruit.

Some people bear fruit, but O, it's so hard to get at. Beloved, God's trees are fruit-bearers, but some lives are simply wild gooseberry bushes, and how they scratch!

Growing goes on in the dark. There are hours when work is impossible, when prayer seems effort and Bible study a burden. What can you do then? Stay in God's orchard, and be still.

The dark is as necessary to growth as is the daylight. It was a dark day for the early church when Stephen, the eloquent and devout, was stoned, but out of that day came Paul and the epistles of weighty meaning and when properly translated and interpreted, of world-wide value.

"He shall bring forth his fruit in his season."

Yes, harvest comes after June has passed by. One of the surprises of the next life will be some specimens of fruitage developed in us. The harvest festival is sure, so sure that faces from the morning land gleam out upon us in visions of the night; that voices we call human in our daily intercourse do ofttimes thrill us as with the triumph of the divine.

Be patient, heart, some day, thank God, we shall be transplanted to the country of perpetual beauty and unending fruitfulness.

Red-Letter Day.
June 9, Flower Mission Day.
BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF MISS JENNIE CASSEDAY.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR SISTERS:—I am glad to learn that every union is now offered the opportunity to appear by name in THE UNION SIGNAL, together with the name of its president. This is the latest offer of the publishers of our paper. But, better still, I am glad to know the chief part of this offer, viz., that any one can have THE UNION SIGNAL from now until November 26 for fifty cents. Certainly this will take away all excuse for failure to take our official organ on account of the price. This is a great opportunity. How many unions in the United States will see to it that every member takes THE UNION SIGNAL at its offer? I am sure Mrs. Stevens, the editor-in-chief, would be much delighted on her return from the World's Convention to see a long list of unions in which every member is a subscriber. I most earnestly urge the officers to present this matter to their unions, and, if necessary, to appoint a bright, wide-awake solicitor or to make personal appeals. Think of the impetus it would give to our work were all of our members reading THE UNION SIGNAL each week!

I only wish I were eloquent enough to persuade every woman whose name stands on our membership roll to subscribe and to become a constant reader of National plans and purposes. She would grow into a breadth of knowledge heretofore unknown, and would learn to prize the information, the intellectual nourishment as essential to her own best work and the permanent growth of our organization. Who will lend a steady hand in this enterprise? I imagine that thousands will reply and that we will speedily see the enrollment of almost innumerable unions in which every single member takes THE UNION SIGNAL.

Another thing I have often thought to speak of: When you answer advertisements in our paper do you give it credit? Have you ever thought that people rate the value of a paper as an advertising medium by the number who, when ordering, name that particular paper? Are women more careless about this than men? Every paper depends largely upon its advertisements for its financial prosperity. Let us help our own official organ by such reference whenever we answer any of its advertisements. I did not expect to take up so much space by this mention of the new offer, but really what would or could build up our work more rapidly than to have careful readers of the word as found in THE UNION SIGNAL, and doers of the same?

Flower Mission Day is near at hand when the beautiful ministry of flowers can be brought to our jails, prisons, hospitals and the sick and afflicted everywhere. The Reiley union of Evanston is to hold a service at Rose Hill in memory of Frances E. Willard, Jessie Brown Hilton and other loved ones who rest in that beautiful place.

These are the days, too, of W. C. T. U. institutes, Chautauquas, fairs and outdoor meetings, and Red Letter Days must not be forgotten, for they are numerous. Mrs. Tomlinson has followed her leaflet in which she gives a sketch of Mrs. Stevens by another one giving a most appreciative biography of Miss Gordon, partly quoted from Miss Willard's own words. I am sure these will be of great aid to the unions in preparing their programs. Remember they are to be had of the W. T. P. A., 184 La Salle street, Chicago. And let us all remember to "say something good" and to say it often.

Yours in white ribbon bonds,

SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Organizers.

DEAR Everybody Interested in the coming and going of the organizer:—Abandoning my last year's plan of fishing mostly in familiar waters I have traversed the continent since our Main(e) meeting, notwithstanding the fact that about that time my plans for a far western trip were suddenly broken in the middle and it took most of November to reorganize. From Thanksgiving to Christmas Marshalltown district, Iowa, was the scene of severe labor and enforced rest therefrom, about "arf and arf." Ere the new year dawned I was en route for Arizona where I spent a truly delightful month. Climate, scenery, people—all were kind to me. Not an umbrella or rubber required till just the last; weather perfect for meetings.

You don't care how many times I spoke nor names I gathered, and the data for such information lie buried in my trunk at the station. I took but one play day, driving forty miles across the desert to view the ruins of Casa Grande and dig in the mounds near the "Great House" for prehistoric remains.

At Mesa eighty women came to our mothers' meeting, and as many to the reception at Phoenix. Tempe parties invited me to return for union meetings on Sunday. Here we organized a fine Y. As the state Y secretary, Mrs. Etta B. Johnson, is there to mother it I expect good things therefrom. At Flagstaff excellent arrangements were made by a busy lawyer of the city, and a W. C. T. U. started. L. T. L.'s were organized at Casa Grande and Congress, one of the two mining camps visited. At Tucson the Y was reorganized. I spoke in the schools at nearly every place, including the Indian school at Phoenix, Normal school at Tempe and University of Arizona at Tucson.

I had no thrilling, hairbreadth escapes except when the bus turned sharp angles on the steep mountain side at Jerome, where it seems no wagon can keep its equilibrium or horse his footing, and when a special train had to be sent from Phoenix to Maricopa to bring me in time for the reception in my honor. (Incidentally that train brought to the capital the southern legislators also in time for the opening of the territorial legislature.)

A week in Los Angeles, the Beautiful, cold and wet most of the time, where I found old and new friends, attended a fruit lunch, saw just a bit of the W. C. T. U. work of the city and county; was taken into the home of Mrs. Hester T. Griffith, a house whose door stands open to any homeless or erring man or woman, and I judge is never without such guests; then having just dipped into the flower heart of southern California I turned northward for ten days' work in Oregon.

The weather was too good for the natives, who wished for rain that they might feel better, but it suited me nicely. In Portland I visited a college chum and revelled in the sight of the great snow peaks which rear their heads above the horizon. These are the glory of this northern coast, transforming the scene, however desolate and stumpy, into grandeur and inspiration.

For nine weeks thereafter I traveled in west Washington; nine counties, forty-six unions visited, beside four unorganized places. I never worked so nearly incessantly in my life. Gave 187 addresses of various kinds, including eighty-three in schools. There was little chance for organization. At South Tacoma and at Pleasant Ridge W. C. T. U.'s; at Montesano a Y; at Pe Ell and Minca L. T. L.'s are formed. Some practical reorganization was effected, however.

Not a day has been lost from sickness, neither a meeting suspended for rain though many have suffered therefrom. The Washingtonian likes rain, but he likes it fine and thin, and he prefers his fireside, like any other man, when it descends in sheets.

The finest sight I've looked upon in Washington was 1400 students assembled in the fine auditorium of the Seattle high school to listen to me. Enough applause of eye and mouth and hand was received that forenoon from the 2,000 pupils to whom I spoke to atone for all the "wooden" people to whom I have had to speak.

What good people I've met! What good things I've had to eat! How smoothly the plans have worked! I wish I could always find such system and harmony among the unions as in the hustling land of west Washington.

After a breathing spell in pleasant Tacoma, entertained by old friends and new, helped back into working order by the skill and kindness of that loyal white ribboner osteopath, Mrs. N. J. Crooke, and the county president, Mrs. Alice R. Ridout, I have set my face eastward. Briefly I visited Portland and Goldendale on the way to Idaho, where I expect to spend the coming month in work.

Yours in our holy cause,

LOUISE E. HOLLISTER.

SNAP, PUSH AND GO

Is What One Should Get From Food.

A young St. Louis lady learned a food lesson she won't forget. She says: "I suffered from indigestion for nearly 10 years and although I tried all kinds of foods for breakfast I could not eat any of them until one day I discovered Grape-Nuts and now I wonder how I ever did without it.

"I am a stenographer in a business office and need all the energy possible but I formerly spent the greater part of every morning wishing I had gone without breakfast for I was continually reminded of it by the uncomfortable distressed state of my stomach. How much ability I lost through this I could not tell you but now all is different for I eat some fruit and a saucer of Grape-Nuts and work hard all the morning and never think about my stomach until lunch time comes

"I feel the good effects of Grape-Nuts in a sharpened brain, better memory and increased thinking capacity. The only difficulty I have about it is that I never want to limit myself to the required amount for I love it so." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is a reason why Grape-Nuts sharpens the brain.

It's fun to make new and delicious desserts by the recipe book found in each package of Grape-Nuts.

Parliamentary Difficulties.

Conducted by

Mrs. A. S. Benjamin

AS has been heretofore stated, and perhaps more than once, parliamentary difficulties seem to go in waves, a sort of epidemic that sweeps over sometimes only a section and sometimes the whole land. Just these days the trouble is "elections," and not only unions but clubs and missionary societies are, as one woman put it "all wrought up." These questions have been somewhat considered in "Difficulties," and those who keep a scrap-book will do well to refer to August, 1902.

Ques.—When the Constitution does not touch upon the matter, should election of officers be conducted by nominating a meeting ahead, or by balloting the day of election?

(b) If nominating by ballot is the better way and no one receives a majority, just how should the chair proceed?

Ans.—When the constitution fails to prescribe the manner in which candidates shall be nominated, there is nothing to hinder doing it in any way that may be voted. If that instrument does not mention nominations, there need not be nominations, but the chair may state as follows: "This is the ballot for president and any member having a majority of the votes will be elected."

I believe in nominating by ballot, as it gives every member an opportunity to express her unbiased preference, and some name may be mentioned that might not have occurred to the body and yet when mentioned a majority would agree was the best person for the office.

(b) If on the nomination no one has a majority, then what? Ans.—Why, the names would then all be before the society and they would proceed to elect. If one woman had every vote on the nominating ballot she would not be elected. A nomination is one thing and an election quite another. That is, when we sometimes vote that the secretary (or some other designated person) cast the ballot of the body, it must always be remembered that when the motion is made that the ballot be cast a single objection will prevent. A member without obtaining the floor, simply says, "I object." That settles it. Ballots must again be distributed and a ballot taken.

When the tellers report the ballot (which should be handed to the presiding officer on a slip of paper) the chair should state it this way: "Whole number of votes cast, 44; necessary to an election, 23, of which Mrs. A. has 35; Mesdames O., C. and W., 2 each; Mrs. I and Mrs. R., one each. The chair declares Mrs. A. duly elected president of the Lend-a-Hand Club for the ensuing year."

Ques.—Will you please state which is the higher in rank, to postpone indefinitely or to amend?

Ans.—The motions are equal in rank. A motion to amend cannot be entertained when the motion for indefinite postponement is before the house nor can the motion to postpone indefinitely be entertained when an amendment is before the body. After a motion has been amended but not voted upon as amended, an indefinite postponement is in order.

Ques.—Suppose there is a motion to refer to a committee and a member moves to amend by adding: "Said committee to report at one o'clock p. m." The president and all the members know that the convention will not be in session at that hour, but will be at their luncheon, nevertheless this woman insists that her motion must be entertained, what course should the chair take?

Ans.—She should first courteously remind the member that the body will not then be in session, and if the woman continues to insist, the amendment should be ruled out of order, because it is evident that the "insister" is opposed to the motion and so is trying to defeat it in this manner, or, because opposed, is trying to make the matter ridiculous.

A Study.

Ques.—When is an amendment in order?

Ans.—As soon as the motion is stated by the chair (if amendable).

Ques.—Can only the original motion be amended?

Ans.—Some of the subsidiary motions may be amended.

Ques.—Name those that cannot be.

Ans.—To table; the previous question; to postpone indefinitely.

Ques.—Name those that can be amended.

Ans.—To postpone to a certain time; to commit or recommit, to amend.

Ques.—In how many ways may a motion be amended?

Ans.—Five: by adding or inserting; by striking out; by striking out and inserting; by substituting; by dividing the question.

Ques.—How many amendments to the motion may the chair entertain?

Ans.—One; and then she may entertain an amendment to the amendment.

Ques.—Suppose these should be voted down, could other amendments be made just as before?

Ans.—Certainly.

Ques.—Suppose the amendment to the amendment be lost? Could a member at once offer another amendment to the amendent?

Ans.—Why not? There is no amendment before the body. Certainly, she could.

Ques.—After a motion to amend, how does the president take the vote?

Ans.—All in favor of the amendment say aye; opposed no. The ayes have it, or the amendment is carried, or the motion is amended. All in favor of the motion as amended (or of adopting the motion as amended) say aye; opposed no. The motion prevails and the motion as amended is carried.

Ques.—Suppose there is an amendment to the amendment, how then does the chair proceed?

Ans. Precisely as above. All in favor of the amendment say aye; opposed, no. The ayes have it. All in favor of adopting the amendment as amended say aye. the ayes have it; the amendment is adopted. All in favor of adopting the motion as amended say aye; opposed, no. The ayes have it and the motion as amended is adopted.

(The above is according to "Robert's Rules" and not strictly according to "this chair.")

Ques.—Which is the higher in rank, the amendment or the amendment to the amendment?

Ans.—The amendment to the amendment, as all that has just been explained clearly shows. It takes precedence and must first be voted upon.

Ques.—Cannot the motion to table be amended by adding "subject to call?"

Ans.—It cannot. According to some standard authors, the motion to table might include "subject to call." For instance: "I move that the question be laid on the table, subject to call," but Robert says in exactly these words, "A motion to lay on the table cannot be limited in any way." Virtually, a tabled motion is always subject to call (that is after there has been any intervening business), any member being at liberty to move that it be taken from the table.

Ques.—Suppose one who really does not know, asks why we ever amend a motion (I mean what is the object?), what is the correct answer?

Ans.—To change it.

The above contains every question from those who have been clamoring for an "Amendment Study." The subject is very far from being exhausted, but enough has been given to show how one would conduct a "study" on amendments.

The sales of SUN PASTE Stove Polish and RISING SUN Stove Polish are constantly increasing. These goods are absolutely safe for use in the hands of anyone.

The use of inflammable stove polishes made by irresponsible and unscruplous manufacturers has resulted in frightful burning accidents. The victims of these dangerous polishes have in some cases died of the burns after horrible suffering and in other cases have been disfigured for life as a result of the explosion of the inflammable materials contained in the polishes. The high character and reputation of the house of Morse Brothers and the well known reliability of the goods they manufacture give a solid basis for the confidence of a world of housekeepers who are using RISING SUN Stove Polish and SUN PASTE Stove Polish. No accident can result from their application to the stove under any circumstances. This is a recommendation which commends itself to all consumers.

Last year's sales showed a large increase over the previous year, and the sales for the first three months of this year have been very much larger than the sales for the corresponding period last year. This continual increase in business is due to the high quality of the goods manufactured by Morse Brothers and also to the very neat and attractive style of packages which they put up. The packages are large and handsome in appearance. The familiar trade-mark of the RISING SUN has become a household word everywhere the English language is spoken. Long experience, enormous facilities and special processes of manufacture have combined to build up the deserved popularity of the RISING SUN Stove Polish and SUN PASTE Stove Polish.

HINTS ON HOME NURSING

By GERTRUDE KELLOGG,

Former Supt. of the Training School for Nurses. Frances E. Willard National Temperance Hospital.

General Care of Contagious Cases.

NOT many years ago it was a question whether or not diphtheria, scarlet fever and like diseases were contagious, but they have been finally and definitely proved as such. The infectious material is known to be a definite micro-organism, and the danger of contagion lies in the fact that the organism from the afflicted individual may be transmitted to a healthy person. In diphtheria the organism usually lodges in the throat or on the tonsils. If the soil is favorable it multiplies and produces the local evidences of inflammation, redness, swelling and an exudate.

In rooms where contagious cases are to be nursed it is very essential to remove carpets and all unnecessary articles. The room should be kept immaculately clean and fresh by wiping the floors daily and dusting with a damp cloth. The floors should not be swept, as the dust containing the germs is simply stirred up without being removed, and is liable to be carried elsewhere. A fireplace in the room is of advantage not only for ventilating, but for burning all refuse matter.

Select a metal bedstead with a wire spring frame, not too wide, and of medium height. Such a bedstead can be washed with carbolic solution and kept clean and sweet (never use bichloride solution for iron as it corrodes the metal), and the patient cared for with greater comfort and ease. The bed should be accessible from either side. The best and most sanitary mattress is one of hair, being porous and easily ventilated.

The covering should be light but warm, consisting of an upper and a lower cover, a draw sheet, blankets and some form of light cotton spread, dimity being preferable. A heavy counterpane should never be used, as being a nonconductor it interferes with the ventilation of the bed, besides being uncomfortable for the patient. It is of the greatest importance for the cleanliness and comfort of the patient that the linen be changed often.

In making the bed tuck in the top, bottom and sides of the lower sheet; next cover entirely with a draw sheet of rubber cloth securely fastened with safety pins to the mattress on either side (table oilcloth may be used for the same purpose); fold both hems of the draw sheet together, tuck in smoothly on both sides. The two hemmed ends should be at the bottom, as there should never be a seam under the patient's back. The upper sheet and blanket come next, and finally the light counterpane.

To change the bed the lower and draw sheets are loosened at top, sides and bottom; roll the patient gently to the opposite side (if very weak he should be supported by a second person); fold one side along the whole length close to the patient's back. The fresh sheet is then folded lengthwise alternately backward and forward for half its length and placed on the side of the bed from which the soiled ones have been removed, well tucked in as before; move to the opposite side and turn the patient back into the fresh part. The soiled sheets and the folds of the fresh ones are then drawn through and the latter are tucked down smoothly. In changing the upper clothing the fresh sheet and blanket are first spread over, then the soiled ones are slipped away from beneath. In this way the entire bedding can be changed without exposing any part of the patient.

GENERAL TREATMENT.—Contagious cases should invariably be isolated and the clothing of patient and bedclothes should not be allowed to go to the general wash. The dishes, knives, forks, etc., should be washed in the room, or should be boiled thoroughly before putting with the other table utensils. The members of the family should be kept from the patient, and a separate room with good ventilation should be secured.

Two sheets wrung out of a 2 per cent carbolic acid solution should be hung by means of a draw string on either side of the door, and be kept constantly moist. This can be effectively done by means of a whisk broom. Thus perfect isolation is obtained by preventing the escape of the germ-laden dust.

If the person caring for the patient will remember two simple directions she will avoid the greatest danger of contagion: Not to let the patient breathe or cough into her face, and not to touch herself with her hands that have been in contact with the patient until they have been thoroughly washed.

In diphtheria local applications to the outside of the throat are frequently made, either in the way of cold cloths, which must be changed every hour, or hot fomentations, which relieve the pain and take down the swelling. The patient should be kept quiet in bed and everything should be done to keep up his strength.

Nourishment at regular intervals is of the utmost importance. Great care and tact must be exercised in persuading the patient to swallow the liquid.

Realizing the importance of elimination, it is of the utmost necessity that the pores should be kept open. Plenty of water to drink tends to carry off the poison of the disease. A daily bath of hot water and soap should be given between the blankets; also sponging for the reduction of temperature.

DISINFECTION OF PATIENT AND ROOM: Before leaving the room a cleansing bath of hot water and soap should be given (including washing of the hair), followed by a thorough sponging with carbolic acid solution not stronger than two or three per cent, or bichloride solution 1-4,000. The patient is then wrapped in clean sheets and taken to another room.

To disinfect the room the soiled clothing, towels, napkins, bedding, etc., should be immediately immersed in carbolic acid solution for several hours, then wrung out, boiled and washed in the usual way. Articles such as mattresses, woolens, etc., which cannot be washed are left in the disinfectant fumes and afterwards hung in the sun for a number of days. If the case has been a malignant one these articles should be burned.

Bureau drawers should be opened and the furniture arranged so that the fumes can penetrate all parts.

Formaline is now universally used for this purpose. It is a forty-percent solution of formaldehyde gas in water. In a ten-per cent solution it is an efficient disinfectant. A method which gives good results is to hang sheets in the room and sprinkle or spray them with formaline. For each one thousand cubic feet of space in the room twenty to thirty ounces of formaline should be used, all cracks and crevices of windows and doors having been previously stuffed with cotton or strips of old rags to prevent the escape of the gas. The old method of fumigating with sulphur exercises very little power on germs when used in this way.

HAMBURG, May 23.—Prussia's immoderate consumption of alcohol has moved Dr. Studt, minister of education; Gen. von Podbielski, minister of agriculture; Herr Moller, minister of commerce, and Count Posadowsky-Wehner, minister of the interior, to join in issuing a general ordinance directing all government officials to co-operate with the temperance societies in combating the evil of drunkenness.

Special instructions have been issued for the starting of workingmen's clubs where good food and wholesome popular literature may be obtained, but where alcohol is barred. The erection of numerous drinking fountains has been ordered. The general sale of fresh fruits and non-alcoholic drinks in railway stations and on the public highways will be encouraged. Systematic exposition of the evils of alcohol will be provided in the schools. These are the most advanced measures yet adopted by any German state for dealing with drunkenness. They are welcomed by temperance workers as promising great improvement.

EXPERT TESTIMONY.

Coffee Tried and Found Guilty.

No one who has studied its effects on the human body can deny that coffee is a strong drug and liable to cause all kinds of ills, while Postum is a food drink and a powerful rebuilder that will correct the ills caused by coffee when used steadily in place of coffee.

An expert who has studied the subject says: "I have studied the value of foods and the manufacture of food products from personal investigation and wish to bear testimony to the wonderful qualities of Postum Cereal Coffee. I was an excessive coffee drinker, although I knew it to be a slow poison. First it affected my nerves and then my heart but when I once tried Postum I found it easy to give up the coffee, confirmed coffee fiend though I was.

"Postum satisfied my craving for coffee and since drinking Postum steadily in place of the coffee all my troubles have disappeared and I am again healthy and strong.

"I know that even where coffee is not taken to excess it has bad effects on the constitution in some form or other and I am convinced by my investigation that the only thing to do if health and happiness are of any value to one is to quit coffee and drink Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Salads.

AMERICAN adoption of the salad as an every day dish, although of comparatively recent date, is popular and assured. Well may it be, for it has both healthfulness and appetizing qualities to recommend it, not to mention economy in the use of odd bits of food left over from meals.

Vegetables, raw and cooked, eggs, cooked meats, fish, and fruits are employed in endless combination to produce this dish. There are a few general rules to be observed. The thorough cleansing of green vegetables to be served uncooked, deserves the supervision of the mistress if the maid is not trustworthy, for the germs of disease lurk in the dust-laden and insect-inhabited crevices between the leaves.

Everything used, ingredients, dressing, and mixing bowl, must be thoroughly chilled before the salad is put together, the dressing to be added just before serving time. Do not use much sweetening in salad dressings except those made especially for fruit. The acid of the salad is beneficial in toning up the system through its action on the liver, and a taste for it should be cultivated. The sweetened dressings used on meat and fish salads illustrate a culinary misfit—the use of a good thing in the wrong place.

Cooked or raw vegetables are combined with meat and fish in proportions varying to suit the taste or the exigencies of the larder—from one-half to an equal quantity. If celery is out of season, choice cabbage and a seasoning of celery salt take its place.

When you can, cut your meat with the scissors. See that your fruit and vegetables are cut with a sharp knife, and not too fine, which would produce a pasty mess and ruin the dish.

Never cut, but tear lettuce leaves. Nests of lettuce are used most to line the salad bowl, or individual plate, and the inner heart-leaves of the head-lettuce leave nothing to be desired. The decorations for a salad course give a wide scope to artistic cleverness. Small peppers, olives, pimolas, vegetables stamped out in small fancy shapes, lobster claws, egg-slices, and the green parsley and nasturtium are all used, besides any novelty which individual ingenuity hits upon as appropriate to any special kind or occasion. Salads may be served in a great variety of ways.

Cucumbers cut lengthwise and hollowed out make boatlike receptacles for salad, the resemblance being strengthened, after filling, by masts of celery. Cups of turnip, beet, apple, or tomato, hollowed out, are often used, also the skin of oranges or the shell of a lobster. In the summer, a sufficiently heavy dish for luncheon is provided by serving a salad in a border of boiled rice. A fruit salad is good with rice.

Bird's-nest salad: Mix with seasoned cream cheese a quantity of chopped walnut meats. With the smooth side of the butter paddles make them into small balls. Serve four to a portion, in a nest of shredded lettuce, with mayonnaise. With vegetable coloring they may be colored a pale green if desired.

Cabbage salad: Chop half a small head of red cabbage, let is stand ten minutes in water poured over boiling hot, squeeze dry, add half as much chopped ham as cabbage, season with celery salt, fill into green pepper shells, and put a spoonful of mayonnaise on each.

Oyster salad: Cook for a few moments a pint of oysters in their liquor; drain and cover with this dressing: Beat well two eggs; add to them one-fourth cup each of milk and vinegar, one-half teaspoon each of mustard, celery-salt and salt, a dash of cayenne, and two tablespoonfuls of butter; cook in double boiler until thick. Pour over the oysters and when cold set on ice. Serve on a bed of watercress after mixing with a scant pint of diced celery.

Asparagus salad: If the canned vegetable is used first wash it well. Slice on the lettuce the yolks of hard-boiled eggs; cover with asparagus tips, next chopped egg whites, and then a spoonful of green peas. Serve in a ring of mayonnaise.

Fruit Salads.

Waldorf salad is made of equal parts of diced apple and celery. Chopped nut meats are often added to suit the taste. The salad must not be prepared until near serving time, as the fruit discolors quickly.

Cherry salad is something of a novelty and is well worth trying. Seed the fruit carefully, keeping the shape as far as possible, and fill the cavity with hazelnut meats. Pile upon lettuce leaves.

Watercress and apples: Wash well a pint of cress and lay in cold water to crisp. Arrange on serving dish, sprinkle with chopped egg and cover with sliced sour apple. Serve with duck.

There is practically no end to the combinations which may be made. The mayonnaise dressing is taken for granted with the fruit salad, and the following will be found excellent:

Mayonnaise: Into a cold bowl break the yolk of one egg. Beat lightly, with a pinch of salt; then add very slowly, drop by drop, six tablespoons of oil. Now add slowly one tablespoonful of lemon juice and stir in six tablespoonfuls of whipped cream.

Dressing without oil: Beat up two eggs; add one-half teaspoon salt and one tablespoon each of mixed mustard and sugar. Beat well and add a piece of butter the size of an egg, melted, and three tablespoons of vinegar. Stir over boiling water until smooth, and before serving add whipped cream to taste.

A dressing made with bacon gravy is very nice for a vegetable salad. If desired the gravy may be strained, but the crisp bits of bacon are an addition. Try this: Dice one-fourth of a pound of fat ham or bacon, and fry brown. Take from the range; add sharp vinegar in the proportion of one-third vinegar to two-thirds fat. Pour over a salad already seasoned with salt and pepper.

Boiled dressing: Cook for a moment one teaspoon of flour in one tablespoon of butter; add half a teaspoon each of sugar, salt and mustard and one-fourth saltspoon of cayenne. Pour on slowly one-half cup of vinegar at the boiling point, then one well-beaten egg. Beat all the time while stirring in the egg. Cook one minute, and cool. Thin with cream. Slightly sour cream does as well as sweet. For potato salad make it a trifle thinner. It is a particularly nice dressing for chopped cabbage.

A salad sauce: Add to three tablespoonfuls of mayonnaise half a teaspoonful of paprika, one chopped cucumber pickle, and a teaspoon of grated horseradish. Serve with cold or hot meats.

CONSUMPTION

Among the New Books

It is a good sign of the times when the press slackens its speed to the slow rythm of verse. The startling romance, the absorbing novel, the socialistic theory, the commercial scheme, must again make room for the long neglected muse of poesy. Once more her devotees seek the quiet nook, the lighted hearth, the secluded spot, and revel in earth's brightest dreams. The tastfully bound volume of VERSES, by Bertha Gerneaux Woods, is welcome not only for the reason that its author has been long and favorably known to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL through her rare contributions, but because of the real worth of that charming variety of themes, bright, joyous and pathetic, of which the nature-rhymes are perhaps the most successfully rendered. One of the sweetest poems in the book and one which it is difficult to read with undimmed eyes, is called, "God's Little Girl."

And reached our arms in the April days;
We thought to keep her and hold her here,
And our little girl was called the dear.

One pleasant eve, when the sun had dipped
Out of our sight and the stars had slipped
Silently back to their wonted ways,
She turned her face with a wistful gaze

Up to the blue of the arching skies.
We knew by the look in her pretty eyes
And the smile that brightened her small face so,
It was time for God's little girl to go.

A kiss we dropped on her curly head.
"Sweet little heart, good-bye," we said.
Then, unafraid, though the way was dim,
God's little girl went back to Him.

"Good-bye" is a tender heart-message that will re-echo in many hearts,

The true lyric tone sounds through these sweet harmonies and lingers in the memory with a haunting insistance. We bespeak for the dainty volume a wide circulation among true lovers of poetry. (Washington, D. C., The Neal Publishing Company.)

To those who enjoy a bit of soul analysis even unto the degree of an exquisite sympathy, the books of Alice Brown come not too often. Excepting Mary Wilkins there is perhaps no one who can so successfully portray the tragic intensity of the life motif of the New England character as does Alice Brown. Her delicate touch and fine perception show a skilled psychological workmanship. In her latest book, THE MANNERINGS, Miss Brown has chosen a fresh scene and a style more powerful and emotional than that of her earlier works. The story centers in or near a charming country house, remote from towns; the commercial interests of a great city are in the background. The descriptions of this free, unconventional country life have much beauty and variety, while her characters are attractive and vigorously drawn. The plot, which involves a double love story, is ingenious and unhackneyed. The problem-character is Katharine Mannering, who agonizes with Brice, her husband, and with Elinor, her friend, over her own right to be free from her marriage bond of twenty years, taking upon herself much of the responsibility for the moral weakness of her husband. Elinor is an inspiration, and with Dick, one votes "Grannie," "a dear" and hopes with him that the incorrigible Lorraine will "let her settle down." In fact, each one of the little character group is worth knowing. Miss Brown is a nature lover and, above all, a lover of womankind, and in its beautiful New England setting she has caused to be enacted a drama of universal import. (Boston: Little. Brown & Co. $1.50.)

THE JOYFUL LIFE, by Margaret E. Sangster, is one of the sweetest, most helpful books that has ever come from her consecrated pen. Twelve brief, friendly, homely talks are filled with kindly practical suggestions and he who reads can not fail to find his heart brighter and his burden lighter.

"We are all wayfarers," says this sympathetic friend, "and our manners on the road have much to do with our happiness and our usefulness."

Mrs. Sangster has, in this two hundred page volume, shown us many ways by which we may walk "lightly incumbered with luggage," and more than one means by which we may lessen our weariness. Her aim has been to teach us how to take care of realities and to slight the unimportant in life. In such themes as "Moulding Influences," "The Vacation Month," "Christmas Holly," "When Mother is Blue," and "Reverence" are blended the sunlight, and flowers of earth, as the poet sees them.

Mrs. Sangster is one of the sadly few writers who never lifts her pen save to carry to needy, longing souls a heavenly message, a message that falls upon the heart like a benediction and reechoes in the solitude of after hours.

This dainty volume, clad in lavender and pink, adorned with an excellent photograph of the author, makes an attractive gift book for all the year round. (New York: American Tract Society.)

In THE CAPTAIN, Churchill Williams seems to have repeated the success of his former story of city politics, "J. Devlin—Boss." The present story is perhaps an advance upon his first effort, and its excellent literary style will do much to establish the author's standing as an American novelist. It is a romance of the time of the civil war and the struggle is viewed from the standpoint of the Southerner, the difficulties in choosing sides for or against the Union being most vividly and sympathetically portrayed. The great figure of the Captain, who is at once recognized as General Grant, dominates the story and is a fine portrait of the unique leader. The political events leading up to the war and the battle scenes themselves are drawn in a masterful way. There are four illustrations by Arthur I. Keller, and the volume is attractively bound in red cloth, decorative cover (Boston: Lothrop Publishing Company. $1.50.)

JUSTA HAMLIN'S VOCATION, from the pen of Mrs. Janette Hill Knox, is an interesting account of the life of a minister's wife. The theme is one of interest and the field is a fruitful one. The bright side of the life of "one who serves" in this capacity is shown, and the difficulties attendant on the way are also made plain. Some of these difficulties are amusing and some are pitifully pathetic. The chapters on "Ministers' Wives," "Ministers' Children," "The Temperance Question," and "The Woman Question," are of especial interest. One of the brightest things in the book is an article supposed to be written by a little girl of ten on "Why I Should Not Like to Live in China." The story is of interest and will be helpful to those who also find their vocation in faithful doing of every-day duties. (New York: The Abbey Press, $1.25.)

Domestic Science—A Prophecy.

John Brisben Walker, editor of the Cosmopolitan, says the kitchen of the future is to be governed by the laws of chemistry. In the May issue he says:

"The mistress of the home of 1925 will be a chemist. She will be a trained scientist. She will regard her kitchen as a laboratory in which a thousand wonderful experiments will be tried. The idea that the kitchen is a place of drudgery, where only those enter who are forced by circumstances, will have disappeared; and there will remain only wonder that anyone could ever have been ignorant enough of the marvelous processes of science to have taken so little interest in the subject.

"The kitchen itself will disappear from the basement and from the home forever. In its place, adjoining the dining-room, so that the transit from the fire to the table may occupy but a second's time, will be the "household laboratory." The mistress of the house and her daughters will find no more interesting period of the day than that which is spent in the well-lighted, well-ventilated, cleanly and comfortably arranged room given up to the constant surprises which science offers to those who will study with interest her wonders in the realm of combinations of food materials, and the transformations brought about by varying degrees of heat."

Moody Wants Saloons Out.

Secretary of the Navy Gives Notice That Street Opposite Puget Sound Navy Yard Must Be Reformed.

TACOMA, Wash., May 25.—Secretary of the Navy Moody Saturday informed the city officials of Bremerton that the saloons on Front street in that town must be abolished or the department would reduce the work at the Puget sound navy yard to the minimum. Front street faces the navy yard, and its saloons and gambling houses have heretofore been an open temptation to sailors and workmen. The department took the matter up several months ago, giving the city officials the warning which Secretary Moody now promulgates. The saloon licenses were rescinded, but later a majority of the council authorized their continuance.

Agrees To Close Saloons.

Seattle, Wash., May 28.—After a conference this afternoon between the special committee of the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle the mayor and councilmen of Bremerton and Commandant Bleacker of the navy yard the following telegram was sent to Secretary Moody of the navy department:

Secretary of the Navy, Washington: We, the mayor and all the members of the city council of Bremerton, do hereby agree that no licenses shall be issued for any saloon on streets leading from the town wharf in Bremerton to the east gate of the navy yard and that if the navy department requests no licenses shall be issued for any saloon in the town of Bremerton during our term of office.

Prohibition in Brazos County, Texas.

BRYAN, Texas, May 15.—Some of the local ministers are enrolling the names of all who favor prohibition. A petition will be circulated in a few days and presented to the commissioners court asking them to order an election. The fight in this county is expected to be one of the hottest that has yet been fought in the state. Both sides claim to hold the winning hand.

How Shall We Solve the Problem of the Drink Evil?

By Bishop C. H. Fowler, D. D., LL. D., of the M. E. Church.

IN his report of July 22, 1865, of the United States armies, Lieutenant-General Grant showed his appreciation of the greatness and character of the enemy he had to conquer. He said: "From an early period in the rebellion I had been impressed with the idea that active and continuous operations of all the troops that could be brought into the field regardless of season and weather were necessary to a speedy termination of the war. . . . I therefore determined, first, to use the greatest number of troops practicable against the armed force of the enemy. . . . Second, to hammer continuously against the armed force of the enemy and his resources until by mere attrition, if in no other way, there should be nothing left to him but an equal submission with the loyal section of our common country to the constitution and laws of the land." This was the unvarying purpose of all his great battles and campaigns.

Our fathers bequeathed to us two vast evils. Slavery, bondage over men's bodies, and intemperance, a worse bondage over men's souls and bodies. As a people, we inherited the problems of ridding ourselves of these evils. The first was solved by the civil war. We now confront the second.

The nineteenth century will ever be known in history as the age of the destruction of slavery. The twentieth century must earn the distinction of the age of the destruction of the drink evil. Slavery went down before the active use of all troops available regardless of season or weather, before the continuous hammering, that wore away, even by attrition, if by nothing else, all the hostile forces.

The drink evil in like manner must go down before the active use of all available forces without reference to creed or church, in every arm of the service, before the continuous hammering of these united and massed forces, from the powerful newspapers on the one wing to Prohibitionists on the other.

As the last fifty years is distinguished in the world of thought by the scientific conception of evolution, so the next fifty years will probably be distinguished in the world of action by the practical working of co-operation and combination. Commercial combinations to-day prophesy religious combinations to-morrow. Already the Lord's sheep thrive in any pasture and some on the common. This means the sending of controversies to narrower streams, and the chartering of the great churches and unions and benevolent association for common explorations and enterprises on the high seas. Whatever the co-operating churches and unions and benevolent associations ask will come to pass. Their united word will go.

There is no lack of argument or motive for this united action against the drink evil. This is the Supreme Criminal of all Time. There is not a single crime that this hideous beast does not carry in its pouch. Murder seems a horrid thing. Let that word ring out on the startled air and our blood curdles. But murder is one of the mildest aberrations from good citizenship that characterize this monster. The tortures of the Dark Ages were mere amusements compared with terrors and horrors that this evil inflicts upon its victims. Who can understand the thumbscrews of the mind? Think of the wheels that pull apart the joints of the soul! What abysses of agony are found in the racks of the spirit! The old external tortures soon found their limit in the benumbed nerve and fainting heart. But the hells that burn in the breast of him who is dying of delirium tremens defy all description. Uncap hell. Look upon the great army a hundred thousand strong marching into these torments every year in free America!

These are only the picket line of the great host; the real uncounted army of the tortured crowd after this advance line. Paupers, lunatics, idiots of all ages and both sexes, mounting into hundreds of thousands of each class. It is impossible to estimate the crimes and woes of the drink evil.

I must call one witness. It is the truest American friend—the American home. Alcohol desolates the home. When the home sinks our private and public virtues go down with it. Think of the dread and horror that comes to the broken-hearted wife as the comforts are reduced to necessities. As necessary articles vanish, going out for rum. As the house falls into ruin and is abandoned for a hovel in the alley that no one else wants. As all her old companions lose track of her and disappear. As she watches her hungry and dying children, and receives only curses and blows from him whose name she took in the bright morning, now long gone. This horrid picture is repeated by the hundreds of thousands in this land of plenty. All this is the curse of the drink evil.

The sources of this stream of woe must be fairly seen and stopped. They are few and easily uncovered. The first is our social nature. We must have companionship. A young man, a stranger in a city, finds all the homes shut and all the saloons open. This begets the beginning of the evil. Then the habit of treating shoves multitudes into the maelstroms. Many homes are repellant, so the man is without motive for returning or staying there. He drifts into the rapids. Some are pushed to drink by failure in life, sorrows that haunt them. Some go over the dam because their work wearies them and they seek stimulant and temporary energy. Others slip out of elegant homes where the tempter caught them. Some are led to the slaughter by the hand of a trusted physician. Multitudes of youth leap forward into the current, thinking that it shows smartness and independence. Thus the army of victims is recruited.

The forces to be marshaled against this evil embrace all workers for human good. The churches must be held to high accountability. They are, indeed, more constant in their temperance teaching and practice than any other forces in society. But it must be admitted that if all the churches presented a unity of teaching against the evil, and a solid line of total abstinence, there would hardly be left any room for saloons and drinking places. Put by the side of the churches the press of the country and public opinion would make the sale of alcohol impossible. This is the final authority—public opinion. Whoever shapes public opinion makes the laws, fixes the pursuits and dictates the amusements. The pulpit and the press aroused and united would cure 90 per cent of this evil in one year. It is a great thing to have the great papers sound the alarm and turn the public attention to this evil and demand some remedy.

Let all women join in a holy crusade, calling on God and pleading with men. Then something will happen. The great temperance organizations can nearly all be counted upon to move to the front when the hour of conflict is set. The valiant hosts of prohibitionists are already on the picket line, fighting with stoical courage, waiting for the hosts to come to their support.

There remain two things to be done. The first one is to rescue these victims as far as possible. Alcoholism is first a sin when the man is acquiring the craving; then it is a disease needing medical treatment. The drunkard needs and wants a new start, Give him this, and you have saved him in nine-tenths of the cases.

The second thing is to prevent the spreading of the disease by teaching the children in the homes and in the public schools the dangers and terrors of this drink evil. Prevent the coming generation from acquiring the craving and liberate the slaves now in bondage and you have done much toward making this world like an Eden. All this can be done in time with the massing of all the forces.

Publishers' Notes.

Special Summer Offer.

The Union Signal from the time your subscription is received until November 26 for fifty cents. This is our special offer, and deserves the earnest attention of every W. C. T. U. woman. Immediate subscription will insure your getting the report of the World's Convention, which meets in Geneva, Switzerland, June 9. This special offer also includes the enlarged and profusely illustrated Convention Number, which will make the Cincinnati convention of November 13-18 a reality to those who cannot attend it. Many timely articles and special issues of The Union Signal will appear during the summer.

In connection with this offer we are inaugurating a Roll of Honor. Upon the Roll will be placed the names, with the name of the president, of every union in the United States whose subscription list for The Union Signal is equal to its membership. All unions entitled to a place on the Roll should report the fact promptly. We hope for a long list to greet our editor-in-chief, Mrs. Stevens, when she returns to America July first. Which union will stand first? Will it be yours? Will your state, your district, your county be represented?

The Crusader Monthly.

A very pleasant surprise is in store for the subscribers of The Crusader Monthly (formerly the Young Crusader) as a result of the changes which commence with the June issue. While the magazine will continue to be the organ of the L. T. L. and contain the Required Readings, Legion reports, etc., it will be enlarged and greatly improved.

Departments of photography, nature study, exchange and bright, interesting stories will be regular features of this attractive illustrated magazine for young people.

If you wish your young friends to see a copy of The Crusader Monthly send us a list of names and we will take pleasure in mailing sample copies to each one.

All L. T. L. superintendents are especially urged to forward a list of their members that sample copies may be forwarded to each. Although The Crusader Monthly is to be enlarged and improved the subscription price will remain at 25 cents per year.

Health Studies.

A constituency entirely apart from our own would find valuable and essential knowledge and instruction in the new leaflet "Studies in the Problem of Food," from the pen of Dr. Louise C. Purington, but to our own family of white-ribboners it is absolutely necessary. "Relation of Food to Character," "Food Value," "Its Adaptations and Requirements," "Breakfast Foods," and "What Shall We Drink," are a few of the many things about which we all should know, and Dr. Purington is able skillfully to tell us. Send 5 cents for this leaflet or, better still, for you and your friends 10 copies will be sent for 20 cents.

Dr. Purington's "Nerve Dissipation, Causes and Cure" should be in the hands of every man or woman who suffers from our national disease "Americanitis," which translated means "living at high pressure," and who in our ranks is not a sufferer from that disease? Surely those who make things "go" know the symptoms. A mere reading of the leaflets is restful, and its instructions carried out, sure cure. This leaflet is 2 cents for one copy, or 10 copies for 15 cents.

"The Spiritual Athlete," the third new leaflet, by Dr. Purington, is on a somewhat different order, but is helpful and contains new thoughts and up to date ideas that we, as well as the writer, want to be posted on. One copy 2 cents. Ten copies 10 cents.

Do Everything.

"Do Everything," by Frances E. Willard, a handbook for all white-ribboners, gives a history of temperance work, with invaluable directions for leading a public meeting, carrying on a local union, conducting a convention, organizing a W. C. T. U., with forms of pledge and petitions, and "the summing up of the whole matter." Workers cannot afford to do without this practical helper for all occasions along temperance lines. Price 35 cents.

Encouraging News From Kansas.

Excellent Institute Work.—"Rest Rooms" a Popular Feature.—Successful Anti-Cigaret Crusade in Ottawa High School.—State Convention in Kansas City, Kan.—Hot Fight in Topeka.

L. P. Smith, Correspondent

OTTAWA, KAN., June 8.—Our institute season is just closing for the year. In nearly all the organized counties the unions have gathered for the needful instruction by the experienced leaders, Rev. Eugenia F. St. John, Mms. James E. T. Scott, S. H. Wallace, Carrie Flatter and O. P. Bray. Rev. Mary Sibbitt, Rev. L. E. Dodge, Mrs. J. L. Kinmore and Mrs. Grinstead are still in the field. Franklin county was fortunate in securing Rev. Robert Grierson of Glasgow, Scotland, a missionary from China, to discuss missions and the opium and liquor habit at its institute held June 2 and 3 at Wellsville.

The Iola W. C. T. U. maintains a well-equipped rest room at an expense of $50 per month. This union, assisted by the Y's, is doing a good work. Women from the Iola W. C. T. U. were elected delegates to the primaries. It is needless to say that Iola "went dry."

The time is not far distant when rest rooms for women will be provided in every county seat in Kansas. Mitchell county has fitted up such a room in its handsome new courthouse in Beloit. The W. C. T. U. in Beloit has sent a large petition signed by "the best people in town" to the school board, praying them to hire no teacher for the ensuing year who attends balls or card parties. Kansas does not employ teachers who use tobacco or intoxicants.

A great deal of work has been done in the public schools in getting boys to sign the anti-cigaret pledge. Kansas City unions have been active in this work, and have met with gratifying success. All of the boys graduated last week from the Ottawa high school are free from the tobacco habit. Thomas Simpson, a young colored boy, was among the number. He was the first boy of the race to be graduated by this school in thirty years although there have been one or more colored girls each year.

The annual state convention will be held in Kansas City, Kansas, instead of Wichita, as first announced. The white-ribboners of the state are anticipating the coming of Mrs. Stevens, and Anna Gordon at that time with great pleasure.

The struggle between the law-enforcement forces and the violaters of the prohibitory and gambling laws is still on in our capital city. Just now the fight is with the drug-store joints. There can be no doubt as to the final victory of the executors of the law. Topeka will drive the outlaws out, for the people have spoken.

The Cause Prospers in Virginia.

Mrs. M. W. Newton Organizes Many New Unions.—Conventions Enthusiastic and Well Attended.

Mrs. Howard M. Hoge, Correspondent.

LINCOLN, VA., June 1.—Gloucester county, where the state organizer, Mrs. M. W. Newton, has been doing such effective work, has gone "dry" by a good majority. Only one precinct voted for whisky. Mrs. Newton has organized at Yorktown, and is now working in York county, which has never before had a W. C. T. U. worker. She has also recently organized in the Jamestown district near the site of the Jamestown settlement.

Mrs. E. B. Clement, state treasurer, has returned home after seven weeks of field work. She strengthened many unions, adding members and aiding all to go forward in systematic work. She also organized four new unions and reorganized a few others; conducted an institute at Buena Vista, and a county convention and institute combined at Rustburg.

The state president spent a week in Warren, Rappahannock and Clark counties early in May. Warren county was organized, and the unions hope hereafter to hold quarterly conventions. The convention in Rappahannock county had been well worked up by the entertaining union, Flint Hill. It was well attended and an inspiring and encouraging occasion. Visits were also made to Washington, Sperrysville, and Woodville. The progress of the work in this county during the three years there have been unions there is very marked. In Clark county a convention and institute combined was held at Boyce with the union organized by Miss Elizabeth Gordon. Members of the Elizabeth Gordon L. T. L. and the Berryville L. T. L. were active participants in the exercises of the day.

Richmond East End union has just celebrated its eighth aniversary by a social at the home of its president, Mrs. Bickers. The chief attraction of the evening was an address by Judge Mann, author of the Mann bill that was passed last winter curtailing the power of the liquor traffic in the state.

Temperance Revival in Illinois.

W. C. T. U. Will Enforce Law.—Gratifying Awakening of Interest.

Mary E. Hopper, Correspondent.

CHICAGO, June 9.—The Cook County institute, which embraces Chicago and many suburbs, will be held June 12 in Willard Hall. It will be a meeting of considerable interest as matters of civic as well as general interest to the work will be discussed. There seems to be a great awakening in the matter of enforcement of law, the very air being full of it. The W. C. T. U. proposes to see that the liquor business is carried on—if at all—according to the law, and are taking measures to that effect.

Another encouraging thing is the interest manifested in temperance work among the Chicago churches and young people's societies. Literature is being asked for, speakers are in demand, and the Sunday schools are being pledged, all of which indicates a growing sentiment against the saloon. This interest is not confined to the city, but it is noticeable all over the state, and contrasted with that which existed even five years ago must convince the most pessimistic that we are continually gaining victories.

Notable Efforts and Results in Nebraska.

Great Purity and Temperance Revival in Omaha.—Many Pledges Signed and New Members Added to the Union.—Mrs. Dora V. Wheelock's Active Work.—A Successful Bazaar.

Medora D. Nickell, Correspondent.

BEATRICE, June 8.—Since my last letter much has happened to further temperance and righteousness. A late number of "The Union Worker" was devoted to S. T. I., the superintendent of this exceedingly important department, Mrs. Elizabeth Stewart, editing the subject matter which included a letter from Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, and many excellent articles and reports. This forms a valuable reference paper for teachers and superintendents. As a working basis it could not be excelled.

MRS. DORA V. WHEELOCK.

Omaha has held a purity and temperance revival, engaging Mrs.. Mary E. Teats, National evangelist, as leader. The results more than justify the work. The meetings, nineteen in number, (for there were besides the regular addresses, talks to schools, jail, factory girls, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and Woman's Club), resulted in a total of 400 pledge signers, and fifty-three new members added to the Omaha union. Eighty-five White Cross pledges were signed at the Y. M. C. A. meeting. The Omaha union is sending THE UNION SIGNAL, New Voice, American Mother, and School Physiology Journal, to ministers, principals of schools, Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and the fire department. It has organized a circulating library, and appropriated certain amounts to each superintendent for her work. This all speaks for progress.

Our state president, Mrs. Dora V. Wheelock, is a very energetic leader. In three weeks she "visited thirteen towns, met with six unions, organized five new unions, and a W. C. T. U. in the Soldiers' Home at Milford, gained forty-eight new members and four honoraries, spoke twenty-three times, attended a county institute, held semi-annual executive meeting, and spent one and a half days at the Bazar." Since this is just a "slice," you can imagine the results of a well-rounded year's labors. The Bazar referred to was held in Lincoln for the benefit of the state work. Donations of fancy and useful affairs of exquisite workmanship were sent from the unions and commanded excellent prices. It was a very enjoyable affair and added a good sum to the treasury.

The recent unprecedented high water and continuous rain have given just a breathing space before Chautauquas begin. Meantime local contest work progresses, and a friendly strife is on for the winning of the county and local membership banners, offered by the state.

Convention in Bermuda.

Minnie Steele, Correspondent.

HAMILTON, Bermuda, May 25.—The fifth annual convention of the Bermuda W. C. T. U. was held at St. George's on Friday, April 17. Mrs. Christie, colonial vice-president, presided. The convention, on the whole, was a success. Although some of the unions reported a lack of interest and falling off in membership, yet the corresponding secretary was glad that she could report the first unions (two in number) organized among our colored sisters, representatives from these unions being present. The business was interspersed with bright songs by the St. George's L. T. L.'s and short addresses by our gentlemen visitors. Short, original papers, all bearing on our work and full of helpful suggestions, were given by several ladies of the different unions.

The evening session took the form of a public meeting. Strong temperance addresses were given by the Revs. A. Christie, Wm. Ryan, J. Mader and Mr. R. S. Robertson, principal of Warwick Academy. Many regretted the unavoidable absence of Mrs. Jessie Horne and Mr. Matson Frith. The Bermuda W. C. T. U. is grateful for the ready help and sympathy given by Mrs. Jessie Horne, of the Lucy Hayes union, New York, during her short stay among us. Our gratitude is also due to Mrs. Housman, of Bradley Beach, New Jersey, for her kindly help in our work. It was mainly through her influence that the unions were organized among our colored sisters. Much of the success of the convention was due to Mrs. Christie, who so ably presided in the unavoidable absence of Mrs. Burrows, colonial president. The following officers were elected for the present year: Mrs. Sarah Ingham, president, Devonshire; Miss Carolie Smith, corresponding secretary, Paget (West); Mrs. George D. Boyle, recording secretary, St. George's; Mrs. Gordon Outerbridge, treasurer, Somerset Bridge.

Happy Workers in the Keystone State.

Congratulations over Peace and Arbitration.—Grant County Active.—Semi-Annual Convention in Wayne County.

H. Frances Jones, Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., June 8.—We are very fortunate in having a fine corps of state superintendents. From Mrs. Parry comes encouraging news of the day: "The late Rev. George Dana Boardman, the eminent Baptist divine, has left a lasting memorial to the cause of peace by establishing a perpetual lectureship in the University of Pennsylvania to be known as 'The Boardman Foundation of Christian Ethics'

MRS. M. S. PARRY.

"The question so often asked: What is the W. C. T. U. doing anyhow? is answered in a very tangible way in Greene county, where for twenty-five years they have successfully remonstrated against license and where no one has the temerity to petition for the open saloon. If all our sisters of the Keystone state realized that their names counted for as much as men's names they would surely do much more remonstrating. For instance, not long ago the writer heard her lawyer say: 'Your Honor, here are thirty-six petitioners for license in a village and thirty-eight men against—only a majority of two; but, your Honor, there are 108 names of women as remonstrants. Some of these are wives of petitioners and of these some have taken the Keeley cure, most are worthless, and these women support their families and pay the taxes. They deserve to be heard.'

"We never were more active and never did better work in Greene county than now, and we are increasing constantly in numbers and growing in popularity. The ministers help us in all possible ways. Our evangelistic temperance work, conducted for ten days by George H. Vibbert, was a rare uplift. Our anti-license campaign was an eyeopener to saloon people and liberal education to us. We are now extending the work into a campaign of law enforcement. We ask our county commissioner to help. We are working hard for Scientific Temperance and its twin sister Non-Alcoholic Medication."

Delaware county with its energetic president, Mrs. Russell, and her stirring staff of splendid workers held a fine semi-annual convention recently in Media. The program was of unusual interest, all departments showing an advance. Mrs. Mary Lovell, World's and National superintendent of Mercy, and Miss Elizabeth Lloyd, state superintendent of S. T. I., gave addresses. Rev. Wilbur Crafts was the evening speaker. All were benefited and encouraged by the sessions. A very successful series of meetings followed, in which Mrs. Cora E. Seberry, of Brooklyn, N. Y., was the speaker. She made a "profound impression" on her hearers. In one instance two moderate drinkers went home and emptied out their beer and wine.

Southern California Annual Convention.—A Successful and Helpful Meeting.—Notable Purity Conference in Los Angeles.

Lou M. Young, Correspondent.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., June 6.—The W. C. T. U. of Southern California held its annual convention in San Diego, May 18-22. The delegates were most cordially welcomed and royally entertained. The first M. E. church was a bower of flowers. Credential report showed 100 voting members present. The reports of state officers were very encouraging, showing that good work has been done by the rank and file. There are one hundred unions with paid up membership of 2,730. Our Ransom Industrial Home is in a prosperous condition, and about to begin its new building.

MRS. HESTER GRIFFITH.

MRS. EMMA CASH.

MRS. L. M. YOUNG.

On welcome night excellent addresses were given by Mayor Frary, members of the state and city boards of education and of the ministerial union. The church choirs of the city provided beautiful music each evening. A feature introduced for the first time was a "round table." The audience was divided into seven classes and instructed by their respective superintendents of departments, fifteen minutes to each. The visitors as well as "our own" declared they had never before realized what our departments stood for.

Officers were elected as follows: President, Mrs. Emma Cash; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Lou M. Young; recording secretary, Mrs. Charity E. Way; treasurer, Mrs. Sophia Ward Plimpton.

On Thursday evening there was a fine gold medal contest. Mrs. Loring of San Diego was winner.

Our president's annual address was greatly appreciated, giving a resume of her past year's successful labors, and many suggestions and a hopeful outlook for the future.

We are very happy in having captured our National superintendent, Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, to whom we are indebted for a beautiful address and many helpful suggestions and labors. The papers: "She hath done what she could" by Mrs. C. A. Hunnicutt and "The Modern Saloon' by Mrs. I. Webber deserve special mention. The new financial plan recommended last year that each local union pledge two cents per week per member, besides dues for carrying on our work, was lost, but another meaning about the same thing was adopted.

Los Angeles county carried off the banner for largest gain in membership. Pasadena got the banner for raising the most money for Ransom Home. Our aim is to make all of our territory prohibition. It will not be long till that is accomplished.

A purity conference of two days was held in Temperance Temple, Los Angeles, under the leadership of our federation president, Mrs. Hester T. Griffith, comprising fourteen unions in our city.

Some of the many interesting papers were as follows: Bible reading on Christ's teaching on the social evil, by Mrs. U. S. Averill; "Danger Signals," by State President Emma Cash; "The Responsibility of Motherhood in the Light of Present Day Opportunities," was splendidly treated by Mrs. C. P. Wheat.

Mrs. Andrew Stewart made a plea for teaching physiology in the schools. The child to be instructed regarding all the body as well as part of it. "Will enfranchisement of the women tend to purify politics?" was the subject of Mrs. Kate G. Galpin. Mr. Clifford Hand spoke on the good work accomplished by the "Knights of Purity" in the city Y. M. C. A.

It is to be hoped that every one of these organizations may take up this order in connection with their other lines of education.

Successful Convention in Washington. Excellen. Work by Mrs. Munns.

Margaret B. Platt, Correspondent.

COLUMBIA, WASH., June 3.—A very successful annual convention was held in King county May 19 to 20, at Renton. The first evening an interesting platform meeting was participated in by a large number of the members. The second evening a gold medal contest; large audience, much interest, good program, medal awarded to Mr. S. Fishman of Seattle.

MRS. MARGARET MUNNS.

Thursday afternoon Mrs. Munns and myself went to Tacoma, where on Friday I had the privilege of presenting temperance work in Sunday schools. The trip was one that paid well in aroused interest among Sunday school workers. We also made a tour of Whatcom county and attended the county convention. A diamond medal contest was recently held. Mrs. Munns lately held four medal contests in Chehalis county. Two of the classes have since visited adjacent points and repeated their contest with good success. Mrs. G. H. Smith, formerly of South Dakota, has undertaken to do some organizing work among the Scandinavian population.

Mrs. Munns, our state corresponding secretary, is of Scotch-English parentage. Her father, Rev. Mr. Cairns, now in his eightieth year, is pastor of the Baptist Church at Fremont, Wash. Her mother, also eighty years old, is a veteran white-ribboner, who always found time to attend the W. C. T. U. meetings. Her brother, George Robert Cairns, is an evangelist of international repute.

Mrs. Munns entered into active W. C. T. U. work in 1898, and was very efficient in preparatory work for the National Convention at Seattle. She is a skillful planner and an indefatigable worker—one of the kind who brings things to pass. As corresponding secretary she is invaluable, a successful organizer and beloved by the women of her state.

No Saloons Allowed in Pollock—Educational Work There.—An Indefatigable Worker.

Lury Gould Baldwin, Correspondent.

BALDWIN, LA., June 8.—Mrs. Winnie F. White, of Pollock, was recently elected president of the Third district. She is also recording secretary for the Pollock union, numbering thirty members and eighteen honoraries, which, with the Anti-Saloon League, wields a power for good in the community. The union publishes a paper, devoted to the principles of temperance and morality, and prints the lessons for the L. T. L. The vice-president of the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. W. L. Hunter, is the editor. No saloons are allowed in the town, but eternal vigilance is necessary if decency, law and order prevail.

MRS. WINNIE WHITE.

The Pollock union, through its lookout committee, finds the sick and needy each week. The L. T. L. carries the blessed message of the flowers to the afflicted, and, more substantial aid to those who are needy. A public meeting is held monthly, the L. T. L. and the Y assisting. The meetings are enlivened by songs and recitations and some are reached who otherwise would not hear the gospel of temperance.

Recently Mrs. White secured a club of ten subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL, which brings the subscription list of the union up to fourteen. Mrs. White is also interested in work with the children and in the L. T. L. She is teaching them the lessons of kindness and mercy to all of God's creatures.

Our state organizer, Mrs. N. E. Oliver, is to be commended for her ability to overcome obstacles and successfully hold her meetings under difficulties. Her itinerary has extended into the First district. She spoke to the public schools at Mandeville and Covington and held meetings at night. Mrs. Oliver filled an appointment at Slidell, where at one time there was a union and now goes on to other points.

Local unions please take notice: The W. C. T. U. contest books, medals, non-alcoholic medication leaflets and literature in French and Italian can be had of C. C. Morse, No. 429 Carondelet street, New Orleans.

Indian Territory Statehood Convention.

Lila Carlin Moore, Correspondent.

RATON, N. M., June 6.—Thursday, May 21st, I had the privilege of attending the Separate Statehood Convention of the five civilized tribes of Indians in Eufaula, I. T. It was a body of fine men thoroly interested in the work before them. They declared opposition to any measure that would bring them into statehood as a part of Oklahoma.

The encouraging feature to the temperance "host" was this section of a recommendation they declared in favor of: "The general council of each nation shall instruct its delegates to incorporate in the constitution a provision prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the boundaries of the state to be formed out of Indian Territory."

In another (Clause 6) we find the following: "We further recommend that the general council of each nation address a memorial to the various religious and temperance organizations of the United States requesting them to assist the Indians of the five civilized tribes in their effort to prevent the annexation of the Indian Territory to Oklahoma, and to secure a state government for Indian Territory under a constitution which will protect the Indian from the baleful influences of intoxicating liquors."

Minnesota State Superintendents Meet.

Scientific Temperance and Sunday School Work Chiefly Discussed. August Meeting at Como Park, St. Paul.

Mary E. Hoover, Correpondent.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 8.—The quarterly meeting of state W. C. T. U. superintendents was held May 14 at the home of the state corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. F. Hendrix, Minneapolis. The president of the board of superintendents, Mrs. A. B. Upham, presided over the meeting. The following state superintendents were present: Franchise, Mrs. A. B. Upham; Scientific Temperance Instruction, Mrs. M. J. Kelly, both of St. Paul; Work among Railroad Men, Mrs. Eva Shepherd, Janesville; Sunday School work, Mrs. Eva Waterman, Elk River; Work among Woodsmen, Mrs. Effie A. Burgan; Press, Mrs. M. E. Hoover; Purity in Literature and Art, Mrs. E. A. Russell; Lecture Bureau, Mrs. H. M. Powell; Literature and UNION SIGNAL, Mrs. E. F. Hendrix, all of Minneapolis.

MRS. A. B. UPHAM.

Mrs. Kelly presented her department, giving its history and progress made. The indifference of the W. C. T. U. women throughout the country as to the enforcement of the law was given as the cause of such backward steps as the repeal of prohibition in Vermont.

Excellent work was reported as having been done in St. Paul, twenty-eight schools having been supplied with Mrs. Hunt's "Journal" by the Hamline and Somerset W. C. T. U.'s and the Catholic sisters of St. Paul, the latter expressing keen appreciation of the "Journal." Mrs. Burgan reported much interest in Scientific Temperance manifested by the womans' clubs of Minneapolis and vicinity. Mrs. Waterman presented Sunday School Work in a most practical way. Local superintendents were instructed to secure secretaries in the churches of their districts, and unions were urged to appoint superintendents. Mrs. E. A. Russell spoke briefly; also Mrs. Powell and others. Mrs. Eva Shepherd, Secretary of the board, was introduced. The meeting in August will be held in Como Park, St. Paul, by invitation of State President Mrs. Scovell.

YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH.

Conducted by Mrs. Clara Parrish-Wright, General Secretary.

A Word for Medal Contests.

My Dear Young Women:—I frequently receive letters from leaders in other departments in our "many-sided" organization, asking me to recommend, or push, their work among the Y's. The last of these is from Mrs. A. E. Carman, World's superintendent of medal contests. I assure you I can most conscientiously speak a good word for this educative factor in our great movement. Mrs. Carman believes that it is the easiest way to make money to carry on the other lines of our work, and the best and most legitimate way, inasmuch as it emphasizes so emphatically the very point we should strive always to make, viz: that the saloon is the greatest enemy of the home, the church, and the state.

Mrs. Carman gives as another reason why we should be more aggressive along this line that Miss Smart so heartily approves of it, and is going to have it adapted and adopted in Japan. Let me quote a paragraph from a recent number of the Contest Journal;

"A letter received from Kara Smart, our resident missionary in Tokyo, informs me that she will have selections from our books translated into the Japanese language, and through the Y's will have this work introduced in the public schools. The Y's think this a practical work. Miss Smart writes that the expense of the medals will have to be met by her, as an admission fee is not so generally accepted there as in this country. How it would encourage her if, after a financially successful contest has been held, the union would send her the price of a medal to help her in this work, or to the World's superintendent, who will forward the medal."

I hope you will all heed the call to help in this way, dear comrades, and so not only aid Miss Smart but create more sentiment in your own communities, and open the way to increase your local financial "budget."

You will not feel proud of Miss Thomas' report, which appears herewith. Can we not do more for this fund too?

Clara Parrish-Wright.

My Dear World-wide Y Comrades:—Our secretary has asked me to send you a special message from the Flowery Kingdom, and for some days I have been wondering what to say to you.

While in the land of flowers I am in the midst of the greatest immorality, uncleanliness of body, and degradation of soul, and my heart yearns to relieve, even in a slight degree, some of the misery and helplessness I see on every hand.

Never until I reached these shores had I realized the rich blessings, the wonderful advantages, and the marvelous possibilities that are the birthright of every young woman born in the Occident as compared with those which come, under the best conditions attainable, to the young women of the Orient. And yet I often wonder if we would do as well as they do with the opportunities they have, had our lot fallen among their environments.

Dear sister Y's, a great burden rests upon us, to aid to the utmost these little sisters of the Orient. I firmly believe that "to the measure of our capacity we are as responsible for the fate of the world as Jesus was."

There are many, many things you can and may do to help over here, though you may not be able to come yourselves. The young women of Japan need to feel that you are interested in them, that you desire to help them, and that they have your sisterly love and sympathy. They need also financial aid in order to secure much needed helps and literature.

Most of all do they need that you should live lives of absolute purity and goodness. They are great imitators. Very closely are they watching and criticising the lives of the men and women of other countries, especially those of the West. As a part of that West, you, whose example they will follow in large measure, may help to bless them in their lives. Through their efforts to measure up to your higher standard of living they will in time better their own surroundings and arise to a nobler womanhood.

During the past months I have had an ever-increasing realization of my own unworthiness coupled with the knowledge that "where one man reads his Bible the thousands read you and me," "and perhaps their only view may be what of Him they see in you and me." For this reason, and because of your influence over others, in this land, I plead with you to "grow at any cost." Be willing to blunder and stumble times without number, but do not dare to disobey the Word that speaks in your flesh. Fear not failure and ridicule, but fear to be false to your divine instincts, your noblest impulses.

Because my heart goes out with an unutterable yearning for the benighted souls of those who know not Christ I entreat you to make better use of your possibilities, and to measure up to the full stature of a glorious and perfect young womanhood in Christ Jesus. Through His strength and grace may we give unto the world our best.

Earnestly and lovingly, your sister Y,

Kara G. Smart.

New Department Created.

A church young people's society (Methodist Protestant) created a department of "Christian Citizenship" as a result of our Florence Hammond's speech before the National Convention in Washington last month. We quote from the Washington Star of May 9:

"Miss Florence Hammond of Baltimore gave an outline of temperance work to be pursued by the Christian Endeavor Societies, and suggested various plans to further the temperance cause. In the course of her remarks she paid a glowing tribute to the late Frances Willard, which was warmly applauded by the audience. At the close of Miss Hammond's remarks the convention decided upon the creation of a department of Christian citizenship, and the nominating committee was instructed to select someone to fill the position of superintendent of the new department."

The Holy Spirit began working among the members of the Y. W. C. T. U. of Livingstone College thru the instrumentality of Mrs. A. C. V. Tucker, who has charge of the girls. It was a pentecostal shower which spread like wild fire all over the school and resulted in the conversion of sixty souls—twenty-six girls and thirty-four boys. The like has never before been known in the institution. The regular Easter picnic was converted into an Easter revival meeting. The pledge is being freely offered, and white ribbons are floating all over the school.—W. C. T. U. "Tidings."

Gleanings.

Richmond (Va.) Y is now ahead on amount sent to Mrs. Wells for Miss Smart's work $10.

Miss Eva Hardie, our secretary for India, is at home on furlough. She is a Canadian girl.

Mrs. Dollie Dick Burgess, our Iowa state secretary, is a busy teacher, but she will do field work in June.

The "Willard" Y's of Port Elizabeth, South Africa, hold an annual "doll show." This year they cleared $250.

Mrs. Belle C. Kimball, president of Missouri, organized a Y at Webster Grove May 15 with twelve members. They will take up flower mission and social work.

East Washington has now altogether seven new Y's. Considering the fact that it is her first year, Mrs. L. E. Meckling, state secretary, is doing most excellent work.

Georgetown (Del.) Y since the county convention in April has gained twenty-five new members. They have given $5 for the soldiers' and sailors' Rest Room at Fort Delaware.

A local Christian Endeavor society and the "Neal Dow" Y of Baltimore held a "co-operative temperance meeting" May 15. Dr. C. H. Mead, of "Silver Lake Quartette" fame, was the speaker.

The Farmington (Del.) Y has "graduated" into a W., and a new Y has been organized at Magnolia. Miss Janie Wilson, state secretary, reports a great revival of interest thruout the entire state.

On Y night at the state convention of the Thurman W. C. T. U. of North Carolina there will be a college oratorical contest. What could be better? The convention will be held at Statesville June 19 to 23.

Miss Anna Quinby, of Ohio, one of the young women who are rapidly "coming to the front," is touring West Virginia, where she "expects to organize several Y's." The first one was formed at Elkins on May 27.

As a result of a Baltimore Christian Endeavor temperance meeting, presided over by Miss Florence Hammond, ten persons signed Y membership cards. They will either form a union in that church or join various unions.

Tennessee has two new Y's; one at Tullahuma, organized by Mrs. Mary Jewett Telford, and one at Winchester, organized by the state secretary, Mrs. Elma Moore Rutledge. Mrs. Rutledge asked every W. C. T. U. in the state to hold a parlor meeting on April 14, and invite young women.

Mrs. Minnie E. Kirtland, former state corresponding secretary of Texas, was elected Y secretary at the recent state convention. We are doubly glad to welcome to the ranks of "leaders of young women" one who has had such a training, and predict that there will be a "forward movement" in the "Lone Star" state now.

The "Rhena Mosher" Y, of Texarkana, Texas, organized in January, now numbers over sixty members. One of the unique features of this Y is that all the superintendents of departments are young men. They are very systematic in their work, and the president says they begin to see results already in the development of the young people.

The Clarksville (Ohio) Y's were well represented at the late midyear county convention. The local superintendent of physical culture, Miss Alice Magee, gave a drill in Delsarte in the afternoon and evening sessions. In the evening their president, Miss Alice L. Greene, won the grand gold medal at the Grand Gold Medal Contest held. Her selection was "Pictures from Life," by John G. Woolley.

Richmond Y has recently held a rummage sale to raise money for the work, the success of the sale enabling them to send $10 for the World's Y Missionary Fund, $10 to the Y bed in the Temperance Hospital, Chicago, $25 for the State Anti-Saloon League, $5 for a mountain mission in the state of Virginia for the poorer class of white girls. On June 16 they will have a moonlight social, thus closing the socials for the season.

Miss Harriet Montgomery, Nebraska's secretary, will be in the field all of June. In the beginning of her trip she organized a Y at Spring Rande with fifteen members. We shall expect to hear of many more. The banner is almost sure to remain in the West next year, and it will not be surprising if one of the states very near Kansas wins it. Iowa and Nebraska, Colorado and Missouri, all stand an excellent chance now.

Miss Belle Kearney has been "capturing things" in Pennsylvania. Recently she organized, at Cross Fork, a Y of forty active and twelve honorary members. Later she addressed the student body of Keystone Academy, Factoryville, and secured thirty young women and twenty-five young men as signers to the total-abstinence pledge, besides twenty young men who took the pledge against tobacco. At noon of the same day, after Miss Kearney's train had gone, Mrs. Jennie S. Roe, county president, met them again and organized them into a Y.

ETHICS IN MARBLE.

By Evalyn Hill Connor.

ON the eminence of Capitol Hill, Washington, D. C., opposite the imposing Capitol building, is the colossal Congressional Library, the largest structure of its kind in the world. In all its grandeur and beauty of architecture this superb building, the creation solely of American genius, is a monument to the skill, liberality and magnanimity of our great republic.

As the visitor stands in the shadow of this edifice, he is awe-struck at the achievements of which the American people are capable, and he wonders, if their bent be turned in the right direction, what the future has in store; for in the material massiveness before him he interprets an almost allegorical meaning. With so fitting a home for all literature, he realizes that education is not alone in books, but that the contemplation of any noble work of art sharpens the aesthetic perception and is a divine inspiration.

The Congressional Library's gilded dome, like that of Saint Peter's, can be seen from every part of the city, and to the reflective mind it appears as a symbol of the intellectual light shed upon all mankind.

Exclusive of grounds, this structure has cost the nation over six million dollars, but this amount of money is nothing in comparison with the labor expended, nor is the labor anything compared with the brain power that conceived so beautiful a creation, whose origin must have been the outcome of some enthusiastic wave of patriotism.

The style of architecture is Italian Renaissance. The building, of New Hampshire granite, forms an oblong square enclosing four courts and a rotunda, and covers three and three-quarters acres of ground. The keystones of the second-story windows are ornamented with ethnological heads, the first instance of an attempt to make this kind of science contribute to architectural decoration.

Up the broad granite stairway the visitor enters the vestibule through one of three massive bronze doors, covered with a rich ornamental sculpture design in relief, and representing respectively "Tradition," "Writing," and "Printing." Again passing through the vestibule into the main entrance hall, a wealth of color and splendor greets the eye, with always as background the gleaming, snowy-white Italian marble. Like a gigantic flower suspended from the heavens, seems the magnificence before one, and the spirit reaches out unconsciously to grasp this intangible form of beauty, but as its petals gradually unfold, he feels a pigmy in spirit and intellect. The realization sweeps over him that did this library contain not a single volume, the building as a whole would constitute a vast educational storehouse which only the broadest culture could comprehend, for here, from prehistoric to present times, the histories of architecture, sculpture, art, painting, literature, poetry, printing, science, philosophy and religion are all treated mythologically in relief, in mosaic, and in mural decorations.

In the north corridor a series of rare mural paintings in oil, by Mr. Pearce, typify "Religion," "Labor," "Study," "Recreation" and "Rest," and are summed up in a larger painting whose subject, "The Family," represents Arcadian life in all its primitive simplicity, but preserves the arts and habits of a refined civilization.

Decorations by Mr. Walker, in the south corridor, typifying lyric poetry are suggested by poems of English and American authors, while in the east corridor Mr. Alexander has depicted in the same manner "The Evolution of the Book," the subjects being "The Cairn," "Oral Tradition," Egyptian Hieroglyphics," "Picture Writing," "The Manuscript Book," and "The Printing Press."

MAIN ENTRANCE HALL, SHOWING NORTH STAIRWAY.

Mr. Vedder, in the entrance to the main reading-room, has very aptly portrayed "Government" in all its phases—ideally, good, bad, and the natural consequences. "Corrupt Legislation" is here illustrated in its natural outcome—"Anarchy," and "Good Administration" is portrayed in "Peace and Prosperity."

THE ROTUNDA—READING ROOM.

On the second floor, contrasting with classic female figures representing the sciences, are the "Five Senses," represented by beautiful women of more modern type and dress. Nor are forgotten the "Virtues"—Fortitude and Justice," "Patriotism and Courage," "Temperance and Prudence," "Industry and Concord." Temperance, that virtue which should stand out pre-eminent as a warning to this grasping, commercial age, is represented by a classic figure pouring liquid from an antique pitcher into a bowl which she holds in her left hand. Her vivacity and air of good health suggest moderation.

The inscriptions along the walls, taken from the writings of eminent authors, cannot be passed by, for their ennobling thoughts must help to make life richer:

"Too low they build who build beneath the stars."—Young.

"Nature is the art of God."—Browne.

"The foundation of every state is the education of its youth."—Dionysius.

"Science is organized knowledge."—Spencer.

"Beauty is truth, truth beauty."—Keats.

Both the Senate and House reading-rooms are magnificently appointed and lavishly ornamented, though the style of ornamentation is more austere, heavy oak being largely used for the wall and the ceilings.

From the east corridor one passes to the rotunda, the central vital point of the library—the reading room—whose interior abounds in sculpture, painting, and a richness in color scheme and ornamentation nowhere else to be found. The room, octagonal in shape, is encompassed by a tier of alcoves containing the shelves for books. Above the second story of alcoves is the visitors' gallery, where the room may be viewed without disturbing the readers below. Statues in bronze typify human development and civilization: Moses and St. Paul standing for religion; Columbus and Fulton, commerce; Herodotus and Gibbon, history; Michael Angelo and Bethoven, art; Plato and Bacon, philosophy; Homer and Shakespeare, poetry; Solon and Kent, law; Newton and Henry, science.

Among the boundless treasures of knowledge here stored, no collection is more interesting than that of the vast library of reform literature, covering man's noblest achievements. What a boon to the worker would be even the barest outline, the scantiest abridgment of the records found in this department!

But the crowning glory of this palace of art is Mr. Blashfield's painting in the dome of the rotunda, illustrating the "Evolution of Civilization." The decorations consist of twelve colossal figures, in sitting posture, representing the twelve countries which have contributed most to civilization.

The wonderful system for the distribution of books is by means of an apparatus consisting of endless chains, connecting the alcoves with the distributing center. A cable also connects the Capitol by an underground tunnel thru which the books are carried. Every care and precaution are used in housing these silent members of the human family, for, like people, books need light and pure air to save them from destruction. In no detail of this building have the practical features been overlooked.

Thus the great Congressional Library of Washington stands in its imperial splendor and flings back the Old World taunt that America has need of the artistic sense; thus it forever remains as an object-lesson to the beholder, teaching the value of education united with beauty, use, and power.

Negation.

By Lulu Whedon Mitchell.

I WILL not ask to have my cross removed
Thou knowest best the weight my heart can bear—
But give me strength unmurmuring to go,

I will not ask continual ways of peace,
Unfailing good—nay, rather to be tried,
And in affliction's furnace lose my dross,
If only so I may be purified.

I will not ask great gifts of tongue or pen;
Only inspire me with unwearying trust,
That though I plant the tiniest seed for Thee,
Thy love shall raise it, blooming, from the dust.

Chapter XV.

"BOB," said Mrs. Langley, "I have something to tell you, and I don't know how to begin."

She spoke diffidently, and the doctor, dropping his paper, gazed across the table in dismay.

"Don't be so silly!" snapped his sister, divining the absurd suspicion that had turned his thoughts wrathfully to Hugh Brotherton. "I was only going to tell you that, last night, I took the pledge."

Dr. Mann's astonishment was sufficiently manifest to restore her equanimity, and she added bravely:

"And, what is more, I hope and trust that I may be enabled to keep it."

"Bravo, Ethel! If that is to be the result of our young friend's enthusiasm, I shall be tempted to believe in him."

There was that in the doctor's tone that showed him to be genuinely moved.

"Poor old Bob! I have been nothing but a trouble to you; I know that. Why, of course I have known it, and taken a delight in it, but that boy has made me realize and regret things as no one else could or did. It isn't that I am blind to his little weaknesses and exaggerations; but beneath all that, his real honest goodness has impressed me as nothing else could. It isn't his eloquence, which often is mere clap-trap; it's just his simple faith and goodness."

"There! I wanted to get it off my mind while I was in the humor for saying it. I may never again feel impelled to such candor. I wanted you to know how it was, for I never quite felt that you did him justice, Bob."

"Justice? If you really mean what you say, and stick to it, I shall feel like doing him adoration," said the doctor deliberately.

Mrs. Langley laughed a little.

"Of course, I don't expect you to believe in me all at once. I have never given you reason to feel much confidence in my vagaries."

"I recognize in this—this step something more than a vagary," began the doctor, with a valiant attempt at appearing to mean what he said.

Mrs. Langley glanced swiftly at him, and laughed again.

"Anyway, I do mean it," she said quietly. "After all, I have not given in so readily as you suppose. I began by laughing at him in my sleeve, and, quite lately, I could have doubted him, as I doubt every one."

She paused irresolutely, as if on the verge of adding something.

"Oh, I don't think one need entertain any doubt of his sincerity," said the doctor, not noticing her hesitation.

"Yet, Bob, for one half-hour I did greatly doubt it. Do you remember that day when, to serve you out, I took the cab to Milborough? Well, I saw someone very like him come out of Laycock's, and chaffed him about it; but, of course, I knew all the time that it could not possibly be he."

"Well—hardly," agreed the doctor, rather absent-mindedly.

"No. Yet, oddly enough, on another occasion I did see him hurrying out of another office in exactly the same way. That time it really was Mr. Brotherton, and I told him that it behooved him to be more careful."

"What on earth was he doing in a wine merchant's office?' inquired Dr. Mann, seemingly intent upon his second egg.

"He was buying whisky," said Mrs. Langley calmly.

"Whisky? How do you know?"

"I know, because he told me so; but I admit that I had a bad half-hour or so before the explanation came. Not that I really doubted him, although, at first sight, it did look odd. However, the transaction proved to be innocent enough. It was that day last week when you asked me to give him a lift. Before we reached home he told me where he had been, and for what purpose. He had heard nurse say that she wanted some whisky for use among her patients, and being in town, he got it for her."

"He had better not let Enoch & Co. hear of him as a customer of Laycock's," he said drily. "As you say, the explanation is simple enough; but not every one will have the generosity to believe it."

A few minutes later, he was standing in the surgery, with his hands in his pockets, whistling softly. He was so entirely absorbed in thought that Thomas, who had entered the room behind his master, had to cough loudly in order to attract his attention.

Meanwhile, ever since Mrs. Foote had carried away his untasted breakfast, Hugh had been sitting with his head between his hands, thinking miserably. What a fool—what an unmitigated fool he had once more shown himself to be! Albeit fool was the least opprobrious of the epithets which he heaped upon himself in his morning misery. Hypocrite, traitor, liar, he was all of these; in short, he was grandad duplicated in the third generation. Not that he wanted to shelter himself behind grandad—not he! Sophistries were for the hour of temptation. Stern truth stared him in the face in this cold morning light. Grandad should have been—was surely meant to have been—a warning to him. God was just. He, Hugh Brotherton, had refused to profit by his warning. He had been given his chance, and had flung it from him. For that matter, he had his chance still, for the past was not irretrievable. Wasn't it? He laughed bitterly, even while assuring himself of the fact; for, as surely as he was Hugh Brotherton, he would go on trifling with his temptation to the bitter end. At last he knew himself well enough for that.

But not here; no, certainly not here. Grandad's history should never be repeated in his to that extent. This very day—he thought it over for a few minutes—no, not today, tomorrow important business should summon him away, and Pitsmoor should never see him again. He thought of Enoch, of the newly-pledged abstainers, of Mrs. Langley, of Miss Glyn, and even of Tummas Windle, and a few hot drops splashed upon the paper on which, for Mrs. Foote's benefit, he was pretending to write a letter. No, cost him what it might, he would go; and after that, only God knew what he would do. Go home and face his father he never would. When the hour for luncheon came, he rejected Mrs. Foote's tempting dishes, and asked only for tea. Then, having drained the teapot to the last drop, he prepared to go out.

Mrs. Foote remonstrated in vain.

"Family trouble is no excuse for neglecting parishioners," said Hugh briskly.

Mrs. Foote looked relieved. Family trouble was bad enough, poor young man; but from her point of view, not so bad as a severe personal illness. She offered no further objection, but turned her thoughts in the direction of high tea. If she knew anything of young men, family troubles were not wont to impair their appetites for long. Mr. Brotherton would be more than ready for what he called a square meal when he came in.

Meantime, Hugh strode away, intent on an afternoon's visiting. Truth to tell, he had done so little in that way of late that an ever-increasing proportion of his flock had modified their opinion of Miss Milner.

"Her might be hard, and a hard 'un her was; but as a visitor, her won't never be bet," Tummas Windle had gone so far as to say.

Ah, Tummas was almost the first acquaintance he had made, thought Hugh, as he turned his steps that way. How distinctly he recalled every incident of the day on which, for the first time, he had walked so confidently up the blackened pathway. With a deadly sinking of the heart, he called to mind the high purposes and hopes which, all unconsciously, Tummas had been the first to dash. In a sense, he went confidently still, being sure of his welcome. For the wrong-headed old man had learned to love him. Thank God for that! And thank God, also, for this, that so far as he could trust the testimony of his own conscience, Hugh had never, either by precept or by discovered example, encouraged the old reprobate in his wrong-doing.

Dissembling the despair that weighed him down, Hugh went in as heartily as usual and took his seat, prepared to listen to the latest chapter of parochial history as compiled by the parochial gossip from more or less reliable sources.

"Ah, and it's abaht time you coomed an' all," grumbled Tummas, more benignantly than might have been expected, because of the soft spot in his heart for "t' parson lad." Still, with an eye to the improvement of "t' parson lad's" ways, he continued to grumble freely.

"Now, I tell ye, ye won't never do for this parish unless ye make up your mind to more visitin'. Why, it mun be a matter o' fower weeks sin' your foot crossed yon doorstep."

"And what if it is, you incorrigible old grumbler? Do you know that, if I visited you only in your turn, you would be lucky if you saw me once in three months? You haven't much to complain of."

"Gar on," said Tummas, with the freedom that Hugh's free manners had fostered in him. "Miss Milner comed abaht once a week."

"Ah, Miss Milner must have been a saint."

There was something in the tone that brought Tummas's peering eyes up to the young man's face.

"What then? am I saying that I liked her better nor you?"

"I shouldn't have believed it if you had, for how could an old sinner like you be expected to appreciate her? As I have told you from the first, she was worth a dozen of me, yet you like me best."

"Ay," nodded the old man complacently, "I like ye best. Ye can read me a chapter if ye want to," he added magnanimously, after an obvious struggle with his feelings; "and that's givin' in further than I ever yet give in to any man—let alone a woman. But women I don't hold within religion. They're too pushin'. Catch a woman waitin' to be arst!"

"Push back your chair; you're roastin'," said Tummas, remarking the color of the young man's face.

The next moment, with his chin resting on the back of the hands that grasped his stick, he was listening decorously while Hugh poured out the penitence of a broken heart in the fifty-first Psalm. Far as Tummas was from divining the real source of the reader's earnestness, some responsive chord was struck, and thrilled in his dulled breast.

After the closing of the book followed a brief silence.

"Ye can have a word o' prayer if ye want to," said Tummas, with an air of not wishing to do the thing by halves.

Hugh paused aghast, but there seemed no help for it. He slipped to his knees, and with closed eyes began, faltered, and burst into tears. He made one spasmodic attempt to go on, failed, and rose suddenly to his feet.

"Don't mind me," he managed to say, with his hand on the old man's shoulder. "I'm tired—overdone. But, Tummas, God's mercy is for you and for me, if we will but have it on His terms. Never forget that, and God bless you, old boy!"

"Lor'-a'-massy," ejaculated Tummas, realizing that he was alone, "to think o' him carin' like that, and me not carin' a jot. For I don't, and that's the truth. What a desprute old sinner I be! Lor'-amassy on my hard heart!" It was perhaps the first genuine prayer that he had ever prayed.

Feeling it impossible at that moment to face Miss Smith, Hugh turned back to Enoch Light's door. The grim-faced deputy, who was just now on the sick-list, sat by the table lost in theological and contradictious depths. At his request, Hugh grappled bravely with the problem under consideration, and succeeded in smoothing a wrinkle or two from the furrowed brow.

"Ay, lad, you've not only got the root of the matter in you, but the book-learnin' as well, and that's where it is. Thanks be to the Lord as sent you to us in oor need. He's good, He is; for only He knows what would have become of us with no one but this here bafflin' Boyd to look to."

Then for the second time Hugh was invited to "have a word of prayer," and thought to escape by relegating the duty to Enoch himself. Nothing loth the deputy poured forth his sincere if crabbed petitions, but at the close he once more called upon Hugh. This time, by dint of confining himself to generalities, the curate managed to acquit himself to Enoch's satisfaction.

Not daring to trust himself further, on rising to his feet Hugh held out his hand silently.

"God bless you!" uttered Enoch, as he wrung it. "Are ye takin' due care o' you own body in the midst of all your care for oor souls? Ye've got a poor look today, and we munna lose ye, lad."

Once more, on escaping, Hugh found himself not quite able to face Miss Smith, so he braced himself by a sharp walk to the hilltop and Bet Colson, stopping to make a small purchase by the way.

"Bet, Bet, what would Mr. Boyd say? And what do you suppose will become of you and me if we go on like this?" he asked as he dropped the small packet into the old dame's lap.

It was significant of the change in himself that once more he could feel sure of finding Bet's door on the latch.

The skinny fingers clutched the packet rapturously.

Children's Cozy Corner

Rodney's Pansy Brothers. By Jessie Wright Whitcomb.

RODNEY'S mother bought some pansy seeds—several different sorts from several different firms. Rodney watched her as she examined her bright-colored little packets.

"O, I wish I could have one!" he exclaimed.

"You may. You may have the largest and prettiest one of all, though the seeds may be no better."

He watched his mother plant her seeds, but he could scarcely make up his mind to plant his own. He kept the packet under his pillow at night and admired it the first thing in the morning. Finally he picked out a place to plant on the north side of the play-house, made a very neat bed, and tucked in his seeds. In about ten days, when he had nearly forgotten them, up they came—every one, so he said.

They grew and grew and blossomed, not very large pansies at first, but all sorts of colors. Something about them fascinated Rodney; he would lie on the short grass and look and look at them, lightly touching the soft petals, at times putting his face down near, and always wondering about them.

One day the twins came out and squatted on their heels, one on each side.

"What you call 'em?" demanded Ralph.

"Pansies."

"Donnie, do you call them your little pansy brothers?" persisted Hugh.

Rodney laughed, but after that he always thought of them as his little pansy brothers, and the twins always called them so. He hated to pick them, though his mother told him they would bloom better if he did.

One night, after he had been in bed a long time, he heard his mother in the upstairs hall.

"Mamma," he said, softly.

She went in, troubled that he was not asleep.

"Can't you go to sleep, dear?"

"I slept too long this afternoon, I guess. Say, mamma."

"Well?"

"What could I do with my pansies if I picked them?"

"You could put them in water, I suppose."

"I don't mean that."

"When you had your first garden you picked the flowers and took them to a hospital."

"I remember—down to the Santa Fe." He laughed a little. "I asked if there was a brakeman or fireman or engineer there, and they said there was a fireman; and I was awful scared, and they took me to give my flowers to him and"—

"Well."

"Why, he didn't look sick a bit; he was in a room, smoking and playing a game with another man."

His mother tried not to smile and suggested that it was fortunate he was so nearly recovered.

"And then," went on Rodney, reminiscently, "my next bunch I took to the Salvation Army Hospital and asked if there was a sick child there."

"Then what?"

"Why, there wasn't, and they just put the flowers in a pitcher on a table in the hall."

"Perhaps they gave them to some one later."

"I know one thing you might like to do with some, at any rate. When Otto was here today chopping he said his little girl was sick. She would like to see some cunning little pansy brothers I am sure."

"I'll just do it—in the morning."

"She lives right over there in Auburndale."

"I guess I know that," regretfully, "right where a whole lot of those big boys do that go to our school—and if they see me with flowers! O my!"

But next morning he started bravely enough with his pansies. No boys appeared upon the scene; Otto's little girl was delighted with the pansies and inveigled Rodney into taking some to another child who was "pining." He told her shyly what the twins called them.

It turned out to be what one woman called "a sickly spell of weather" for the children, and Rodney took a good many pansies down that way. Occasionally some of the large boys chaffed him, but not greatly to his undoing, until one day he met Sam, the boy of all others whom he had most reason to fear at school, and one who never missed a chance to grab his hat and pull his hair or chase him.

"Hello, chump!" said Sam.

"Hello."

"Whatchy been doin'?"

"Nothing much."

"Takin' flowers around?"

"Only pansies."

"Say," drawing nearer, with an expression of marked curiosity, "is it them the kids calls your pansy brothers?"

Rodney nodded, blushing violently.

"Got any now?"

"I gave them all away."

"Got any more of 'em home?"

"Lots."

"Say, let me see 'em?"

"Yes, of course," astonished.

So they walked on to Rodney's home without much attempt at conversation, Rodney marveling greatly. When they reached the pansy bed Sam stood gazing at them curiously. Rodney mechanically picked two of the handsomest and held them out to him. Sam took them, smelled them, fumbled around for a pin, pinned them elaborately on his shirt, grinned broadly at Rodney and chuckled. Rodney gave vent to precisely the same sort of chuckle, glanced with a look of fresh recognition into Sam's eyes, and was all at once curiously conscious that his world had grown wider.

"O, he was a boy goes to our school," proudly, "one of the BIG boys."

His mother's eyes twinkled. "Is he one of the boys who used to plague you?"

"Well," hesitatingly, "p'raps he did used to—a little, easy."

"He looks like a nice boy."

"O, my stars, yes," eagerly, "he's first class! and say, mamma, he LIKED those little pansy brothers, too."—Selected.

My Bare-foot Fairy.

By Edith Morton.

LAUGHING lips and eyes so merry,
Chubby cheeks, brown as a berry;
O'er the hills with bare feet prancing,
Or on grassy meadows dancing;

You can hear her sweet voice singing,
Clear above the bird-notes ringing,
Like a nymph so blithe and airy,
Is my little bare-foot fairy.

Funny Children.

Mother—I'm afraid, Tommy, you are not much of a favorite with your teacher.

Tommy—Oh, yes, I am, mamma; she makes me stay after school every day, just to keep her company.

A small boy of four summers was riding on a rocking-horse with a companion. He was seated rather uncomfortably on the horse's neck. After a reflective pause he said, "I think if one of us gets off, I could ride much better."

Doctor to Gilbert (aged four): "Put your tongue out, dear." Sick little Gilbert feebly protruded the tip of his tongue.

Doctor: "No, no, put it right out." The little fellow shook his head weakly, and the tears gathered in his eyes: "I can't, doctor; it's fastened on to me."—London Tid-Bits.

A Sunday-school teacher recently told her class about the cruelty involved in docking horses. "Can any little girl tell me," she said, "of any appropriate verse of Scripture referring to such treatment?"

There was a pause, and then a small girl arose and said solemnly, "What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

"Mamma, mamma," sobbed a little three-year-old girl, running into the house, much offended: "I wish you'd whip the old hen. She won't let me see the chickies. She dest lifted up her d'ess, and they all run right under."

Mother was packing a box of goodies, to be sent to one of the boys who was at boarding-school. "I think that's all, Jane," she said, "so please screw it up."

"But, mother, aren't you going to put in a screw-driver?" asked little Betty. "How will Jack get it open without one?"

Was TOTAL? That was all.

Spelling Reform.

THE movement for the revision of English spelling is gradually but surely gaining ground. Eminent philologists on both sides the water have for some time been agitating the question, and here and there a writer or an editor has been found brave enough to introduce a few of the suggested changes, but they have found scant support.

Four years ago the National Educational Association took the matter up. It took a short step in this direction by adopting in all its publications the following twelve simplified spellings:

Program,	Thruout,
Tho,	Catalog,
Altho,	Prolog,
Thoro,	Decalog,
Thorofare,	Demagog,
Thru,	Pedagog,

This tentative action is receiving sufficient endorsement from educators, editors and business men as to give ground for hope that these forms will before long come into general use. The thought is that when these few new spellings have become established it will be easier to secure the adoption of others. Scholarly and progressive men and women are awake to the desirability (in the interests of science and common sense) of simplifying and modernizing our spelling, the only question being how to bring it about. We are so bound by habit and prejudice that advance must necessarily be slow.

A notable gathering for the discussion of "The Duty, Ways and Means of Simplifying Spelling" recently took place in Chicago, the result of the joint action of the men school principals' club and the women principals' club of the city. At the banquet many distinguished guests eloquently advocated this reform and hundreds of leading educators joined by letter in its support. Strong appeals were made on behalf of the children that they might be relieved to some extent, at least, from the oppressive burden imposed by our present cumbersome, irrational spelling. Mrs. Henrotin, speaking from the standpoint of the home, declared it to be in the most vital sense a family problem, more especially a mother's problem, and one that women's clubs and women's societies generally should take hold of.

Attention was directed to what has been accomplished in the way of "throwing out orthographical rubbish" in other languages. Germany, France, Norway and Denmark are all showing themselves more progressive than ourselves in this matter. English-speaking people do not need to be reminded, however, that ever since Chaucer's time our spelling has been following the law of evolution. It is only within the past century that we have dropped the final k from music, logic, public and similar words. We have, therefore, in our own and other languages, abundant precedent for change.

As a time-saving and a labor-saving device, the movement should commend itself to twentieth-century people. It is stated that a rational method of spelling would lessen by one half the time now devoted to learning to spell, and that it would lessen by one-tenth the mechanical cost of producing each newspaper and paper-bound book. Mr. Carnegie says that "any man who gets rid of a ph performs a service to the English-speaking race."

The history of our crooked and burdensome spelling is the counterpart of the "calf-path" story, in which we are told that Boston's people, by following still that crooked trail, "lose one hundred years each day." Why, it is pertinently asked, in these days of ocean greyhounds, electric motors, arc lights, telephones and wireless telegraphy, are we willing to lumber along in the old orthographic stage-coach of a by-gone century? Why grow indignant at the suggestion even to macadamize the road? The language that encircles the globe should be free from inconsistencies.

As the mouthpiece of an organization which stands for advancement, educational as well as moral, THE UNION SIGNAL announces that after due deliberation it falls into line with the National Educational Association and adopts a policy of "progressive conservatism" with regard to revised spelling. It will hereafter use the twelve simplified forms authorized by the N. E. A. whenever it has occasion to use those words. We may be called cranks for so doing, but white ribboners are used to that, and we have splendid company, as witness the following list of journals, some of which are much more radical than this in their spelling:

The Independent, Intelligence, Week's Current, Literary Digest, New York School Journal, Educational Review, Kindergarten Magazine, Primary School Era, Teachers' Institute, Sunday School Times, Springfield Republican, Carpet Trade, Bee Journal, Journal of Surgery, Medical World.

A Choice of Weapons.

"DO unto the saloon keeper," says Justice Sabath, of Chicago, to the wives of drunkards, "as your husbands—victims of these same saloon keepers—do unto you. If your husbands come home at midnight and smash the furniture and, incidentally, members of the family, do ye likewise to the saloon keeper." Evidently the justice thinks that if the liquor dealers were occasionally treated to a gratuitous sampling of their own wares, the effect would be most salutary.

Different arguments must be adopted in dealing with different individuals. Pedagogs, no matter how tender their hearts, are forced to admit that there are incorrigibles who refuse to respond to gentle words and can be impressed only by physical contact with some hard, non-resisting substance; being somewhat brutalized, only methods applicable to brute creation are effective. The proper method of procedure, therefore, is to study the nature of the individual to be attacked, in order to determine wherein he is most vulnerable. The liquor dealer's vulnerable place is not his heart, his reason nor his judgment, but his bank account, hence, the logic of the course prescribed by Justice Sabath. As to its ultimate efficacy, opinions may differ.

A woman's frail hands, so often weakened with undue toil in an effort to supply a husband's lack, enfeebled through abuse and privation, could not hope to win in an unequal contest of physical prowess with such weapons as chairs, stoves and tables. But though woman's nature and training has unfitted her to wield such cumbrous weapons, there are weapons, far more fearful to the liquor men, which she could manipulate with ease if only chivalrous man would graciously unlock the arsenal of masculine privilege and grant her leave. Not for any mere desire for power would thousands of women flock to the polls, to use that all-powerful weapon, the ballot, against their hated foe, the legalized liquor traffic. Rather, indeed, would they watch the battle fought by their brothers, as they busy themselves with home duties and care of little ones, but having vainly pleaded these many years for that help, they ask that they be given an opportunity to fight the good fight against evil with the weapons which have been abused or discarded by their recreant husbands.

Little they care for insinuations of strong-mindedness or new womanism, for have they not for years been compelled to furnish not only the maternal, but paternal qualities in the family life, to be a substitute in their feminine nature for the deficiencies in the character of those who once promised to love, cherish and protect them? The world may well think twice, nay, many times, before criticising or condemning these women for claiming their right to the ballot in order that they may help to crush that monster of iniquity which has destroyed their homes and happiness.

The women of the land, who through a distressing and deplorable experimental knowledge of the liquor traffic, know whereof they speak, will hasten to accept the principle involved in Justice Sabath's suggestion. They ask, however, the privilege of choosing their own weapons as well as the courtesy of their brother man in placing those weapons at their disposal.

Watchman, What of the Night?

FREQUENTLY there appears a paragraph in the daily papers which to the superficial thinker seems an indication that restrictive measures are being enforced by the police of our cities. For instance, Inspector Campbell of the Chicago Police Department is at present advertising that he will insist that "women, music and singing" be banished from the saloons at midnight. Why this discrimination of sex? Why this partial measure? Nothing could show more clearly the purely spectacular nature of the reform than the fact that it offers this weak substitute in place of the enforcement of a midnight closing ordinance.

"Watchman, what of the night?" asks the citizen of the municipal guardians. "All's well, all's well," soothingly replies the city administration. "We have banished women and music from the saloons after midnight, that there may be no more disorderliness in the saloons. Never fear, citizen; all's well."

Assured by this specious falsehood, the citizen lies down to untroubled slumbers, but from a thousand throats comes the agonized protest, "All is not well."

"All's well"—while in countless wretched homes wives cower, keeping lonely vigils, waiting in dread for the coming of that which she calls husband, each night shapen in some new and more horrible form of iniquity.

"All's well"—when as the clock strikes the hour of midnight unfortunate women, stupid with liquor, are thrust into unfriendly alleys, to wander unprotected until sheltered within the walls of the police station.

"All's well"—when protectors of little ones, strong-armed sons of helpless mothers, guardians of weak women, are burning out energy and intellect, unfitting themselves for the morrow's work in some vile dram shop.

"All's well"—while in these open houses of infamy and shame thieves, murderers and despoilers of virtue plan and plot, restricted by no enforced ordinance.

Far removed from sanity and safety is that city which permits the Evil One to rule for ten hours of the night, which allows decency and order to abdicate its throne when the evening shadows fall, and turns itself over to lawlessness by granting the hospitality of its open saloon doors. "Give me the nights," say the criminals, "and we fear not your virtuous days." Terribly precarious is this Jekyll-and-Hyde character of municipal life, and the city that indulges in it has moved far down the broad and easy way that leads to destruction.

An Exhibition of Chivalry. A notable evidence of masculine jealousy of woman's success in what has heretofore been considered man's exclusive domain was displayed at the recent graduation of Mrs. Emma Reba Bailey, of Georgia, from the law department of the Columbian University at Washington. That lady had earned the degree of doctor of civil law; and the determination to bestow it upon her so arroused the opposition of some of her male fellow students that they refused to accept their own lesser degrees. However, none of them persisted in sulking in their tents except a Mr. Haskell B. Talley, of Tennessee. Mrs. Bailey is the first woman to receive that degree from the university.

THE editorial on spelling reform (page 8) closely concerns all readers of THE UNION SIGNAL. We ask that it be given careful attention.

The Lesser Evil. A Chicago preacher, the Rev. Dr. Barton, of Oak Park, in commenting on the present agitation over the unsatisfactory milk supply in its relation to infant mortality, said: "Civilization is ever straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. It grows very virtuous over its quest of leaks in the sewer connections, and ignores the moral stench of low vaudeville; it waxes warm over the poison of diluted milk and forgets the poison in the whisky glass. God's message to the good people of Chicago who are troubled because there is but one delivery of milk a day—and I am one of them—is this: 'If you take the responsibility of prolonging the lives of the little children of the poorest wards in the city, then yours is also the responsibility of providing them a decent place to live and grow.' "

President's Letter.

MY DEAR COMRADES:—Saturday morning, May 16, we sailed from New York harbor on the good ship Minnehaha. It is well that the "laughing water" ship was chosen for our official party, for the waters have indeed smiled and all on shipboard are well and happy. This is especially true of white-ribboners, some of whom have never before crossed the ocean.

Among our number are delegates to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention from New York, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Kansas, Virginia, Oklahoma, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, Georgia, Ohio, Iowa, Mississippi, Vermont and Maine. Six from the state of Maine, by the way. Some delegates have gone on other boats and some are already on the other side, having gone early to visit friends before the opening of the Convention. The United States delegation will not be as large as at the Edinburgh convention three years ago. It is too soon for many of our busy workers to go again, and too early in the season for some; and others still are busy with the spring conventions; but the United States will keep its record unbroken of having the largest number who have crossed the ocean to attend the World's convention.

Divine service was held on Sunday morning, which was Episcopal in form, and conducted by the captain. The singing was led by a choir of the stewards, one of their number playing the organ. In the evening in the dining room there was a song service, which had been arranged by Misses Anna and Elizabeth Gordon, and participated in by all who could sing and all who wished to listen. Miss Sarah Munroe Hall, musical director of the Maine W. C. T. U., sang as a solo "Jesus Lover of My Soul," and other selections which were much appreciated. She was invited to take part in the ship concert Friday evening.

When we bade the home friends good-bye at Union station, Portland, they said: "It isn't your going away or your absence that we mind; we are accustomed to that, and because of your frequent letters and telegrams we never lose sight of you when you are on land; but the ten days on the ocean, away from all communication, is what troubles us." I then mentally resolved that if the Marconi system was in use on our ship I would send them a message from midocean if possible, and that resolution has been carried into effect.

On the lower forward deck is a room somewhat like the usual telegraph operator's room in appearance. Here we found the Marconi men ready to take our message, but learned that in order to send it a ship going to New York must be within sixty miles of us. The operators send out a message, and it floats and hunts around until corresponding "taps" from the other ship take it up. In this way communication is established and the telegram taken; and when within sixty miles of New York it is sent by the Marconi system to New York and then wired by the usual method to its destination. The ship which took our message was the Campania. It was not even within sight, and it is indeed wonderful how it is all done. Before long daily papers may be published on shipboard, giving the latest news. On the bulletin in the companion way we read today:

> The Marconi International Marine Communication Company, Ltd.
> NEWS MESSAGE.
>
> From S. S. Saxonia, west bound, left Liverpool for Boston May 19; reports the following:

And there are other items of news about strikes in New York and war in Russia. As I walked down "Peace avenue" (so named by Miss Gordon) to my stateroom I was renewedly glad that our blessed W. C. T. U. has a department of mercy, of peace and arbitration, and that it has a lively interest in the labor question.

Afternoons, directly after luncheon, the white ribboners gather in the library to ask and answer questions about the coming Convention; the return trip; how to reckon English and French money, etc. There are also recitations and impromptu poems and other "doings," such as many W. C. T. U. women know so well how to do. One afternoon an informal reception was given W. C. T. U. members by Mrs. Augusta Hunt, of Maine, a long-time W. C. T. U. comrade. Miss Christine Tinling, of England, is one of our party, homeward bound after many months of efficient work in our country. Dr. Phoebe Wait, of New York, adds to the professional dignity of our company. I would gladly mention each one of ours, but the list is long, and they are sure to be heard from at the World's Convention and on other important occasions.

A picture has been taken of our W. C. T. U. party on deck, which must surely be seen sooner or later by UNION SIGNAL readers.

LATER: We are now nearing land. Scilly Islands are in view; soon we will see Land's End. "All hands" declare we have had a good voyage. We have had some high seas and one rainy day, but many would have been disappointed had it not been so, as they wished to "experience" all kinds of weather, and whatever variations may have been omitted will probably be supplied on the home passage. As I am finishing this letter my attention is called to the interesting fact that we are passing the Plymouth citadel, built by Charles I, from which point sailed the Pilgrim fathers and Pilgrim mothers. Gratefully and reverently we think of them. If they had not sailed away we might not now be sailing back to the mother country to meet with those to whom our hearts are united in Christ and love.

Miss Gordon and I intend to start back for the home land June 20 on the Minneapolis, in order that we may be at our desks or in the United States "field" by July 1. A few of the delegates will go with us, but many of them will do considerable touring, returning in late summer or early autumn.

With cordial greeting to all, I am

Truly and affectionately yours,

Lillian M. N. Stevens

Opinions of Leading Educators Concerning Spelling Reform.

1.—From the Universities.

Dr. Frederick E. Bolton, Head of Department of Education, University of Iowa:

I cannot understand how any one with altruistic regard for the future can object to a more fonetic spelling. Too many people are great fetish worshippers. What has been is sacred.

Dr. A. H. Thorndike, Professor of English Literature, Northwestern University:

The spellings adopted by the National Education Association have common sense and good authority back of them. They should commend themselves to the judgment of newspaper writers, teachers and business men.

Dr. D. L. Kiehle, formerly Professor of Philosophy, University of Minnesota:

Please put me on record with those who believe that the time has come when a custom of spelling that is obsolete in reason, difficult to learn and cumbersome in use should yield to the demands of economy in time and labor.

O. F. Emerson, Head of department of English, Western Reserve University, Ohio:

It gives me pleasure to express my fullest sympathy with every wise effort for the improvement of English spelling. The gradual changes since Johnson's time, especially those made by Webster, have been in the right direction.

Dr. George Hempl, Head of Department of English Philology, University of Michigan:

I look for ultimate complete reform of English spelling and in meantime I favor every movement that is likely to call general attention to the present lamentable state of things and tends to arouse the co-operation of the rising generation in bringing about a change.

Dr. Wm. Goodell Frost, President Berea College, Kentucky:

Improvement in spelling is one of the urgent reforms of the day for all who speak and use the English language. Any one who has resided in Germany and seen the children read almost at sight and attain precision and accuracy without any such impertinence as a "pronouncing dictionary" would be converted at once.

Upon every generation of those who use our noble tongue is laid the duty of doing what it can to simplify the spelling of English so that the language shall be kept as efficient as possible for the world-wide work before it. The more boldly we strike out superfluous letters the more certainly are we doing what we ought to do.

Men make the fashions in spelling and men can alter them. The convenience of the educated adults of the present generation should not determine this matter. The children and the future are entitled to some consideration. The proposal of the N. E. A. constitutes a moderate and feasible step in the gradual simplification of our spelling.

Dr. Thomas R. Lounsbury, Professor of English, Yale University:

Men usually cling to the spelling to which they have become accustomed in youth. A sort of sentiment springs up about it. The same sentimental regard can be made to attach itself to a civilized spelling which has existed towards the barbarous one. That can only be done, however, by accustoming to it in the most impressionable years of their lives, those who make use of it. It is for this reason that I say the simplification of our orthography rests not with any class of linguistic students or men of letters, but with the great body of teachers thruout our land.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, New York:

No one who has followed the history of the movement to bring about a simplified spelling will fail to appreciate the cogency of the arguments for such a step which have been advanced by eminent philologists, or of the strong practical reasons which have been put forward by teachers and others. At the same time we must realize that the movement runs counter to some of the strongest prejudices of the human mind, and its advancement must be by slow stages. In my judgment the wisest plan of procedure is to agree upon one or two simple, easy steps which can be taken at once and, little by little, justified to a larger public. For this reason I have been glad to use in the Educational Review for several years past the simplified spellings of the twelve words dealt with in the report of the special committee appointed by the Department of Superintendence of the N. E. A. and approved later by a vote of the directors of the National Educational Association itself.

Organizers.

DEAR CO-WORKERS:—Five months were spent in Florida, and so fully occupied have I been in the long trips taken and the everyday duties pertaining to the work in general, that I have had no time to send my usual letter, and will now send a summary report, which only bespeaks a small part of the efforts courageously made.

I have given in that state since Christmas 109 lectures; held forty-two ladies' meetings, twenty-six children's meetings; given four college addresses, besides attending the state convention. Have organized ten new unions; reorganized six old unions and organized three L. T. L.'s. Total number of new members secured to the W. C. T. U., 557; of which 411 are active, 146 honorary. Have taken nine subscriptions to "The Crusader Monthly," and twenty-two subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL.

To each of the new unions organized I have donated five dollars' worth of literature, and have found in every instance that unions thus supplied have prospered and constantly increased in interest and membership. Then I have tried to establish membership contests for the purpose of increasing membership and general interest in the cause by broadening our numbers. To this end I offered a set of Florence M. Kingsley's books: "Stephen," "Paul," "The Needle's Eye," "The Transfiguration of Miss Philura," and "Prisoners of the Sea." Many of the unions have made the effort, with good results, while other unions are still working up the contests, soon to close.

The work of the W. C. T. U. is in a flourishing condition, and the state well officered. I shall expect when we meet this fall at Cincinnati to see Florida come up to the Mother National with 500 members gained over all losses, and be the second Southern state to win that honor.

Superintendents.

Mothers' Meetings and White Ribbon Cradle Roll.

IT is with great pleasure that I address you through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL and tell you that there is a great increase of interest manifested this year in this line of work. The little leaven sown the last two years is taking root, and will, if cultivated, yield a rich harvest. It has been through hard and persistent effort, with sacrifice of money and time, that the new plan of the White Ribbon Cradle Roll has been introduced. The work has been accomplished in that short period, and the favor with which it has been received is proof of the merit of the plan and of what can be done with the White Ribbon Cradle Roll when well supported.

The special medal for the White Ribbon Cradle Roll contests is attracting attention, and I feel assured will become very popular. Children under six years, whether members of the Cradle Roll or not, can compete for this beautiful medal. A leaflet has been prepared with recitations suitable for such little people.

A model Mothers' and White Ribbon Cradle Roll meeting was held at Sycamore, Ill., a short time ago. It was truly a model program, because the mothers and children were there together. Ladies were present to care for the nursery, and if the children were troublesome they were taken out and the mothers remained to enjoy the meeting. The children entertained by speaking and singing. New White Ribbon Cradle Roll members were formally enrolled. The mothers pledged to teach them to live a pure and temperate life, and the Cradle Roll pin was placed upon the child. Children six years of age were graduated from the White Ribbon Cradle Roll into a junior Loyal Temperance Legion and a superintendent found to take up the Loyal Legion work. New members were also obtained for the W. C. T. U. Literature was distributed, and short, practical addresses were given to the mothers. The meeting was opened with scripture reading and prayer, as every meeting should be, and at the close a free-will offering was given to be used in the department work.

No union can afford to be without a superintendent of the department of Mothers' Meetings and White Ribbon Cradle Roll if it desires to grow and become strong in the community. Many new local, county, and state superintendents are being elected this year. Women who did not see the importance of White Ribbon Cradle Roll work two years ago are confessing to me that they were once blind, but that they now see, and are converted to the necessity and importance of the work. States that did but little last year are now inquiring about the work and preparing to do what they can the rest of this year. Although they may not be able to accomplish much in the few remaining months they will be ready to push the work another year.

This department needs many consecrated, live superintendents who will prepare a program for the meetings, so that the mothers will be loth to be absent because of the helpfulness and instruction to be obtained at the meetings. I hope the local, county, and state superintendents will make an extra effort to be present at the National Convention and attend the Purity, Mothers' Meeting and White Ribbon Cradle Roll conferences.

Yours for childhood,

MRS. C. E. HUNT,

National Assistant Superintendent of Mothers' Meetings and White Ribbon Cradle Roll.

Harvard, Ill.

As soon as your union has as many subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL as it has members we want to put the name of the union and its president on our Roll of Honor. Which union and which state will stand at the head of the list? This special offer of the paper until November 26, for fifty cents will make it possible for many unions to take a place on the Roll.

W. C. T. U. Notes.

A union has been organized in Media, Iowa.

Reading matter for the prison library is being collected by the Waupun, Wis., union.

Thacher union, named in honor of Mrs. Ella Thacher, was organized at Wilmington, Del., by Mrs. Mary B. Donnell.

Three membership contests in Tennessee have given an aggregate increase of more than one hundred members this year.

The W. C. T. U. at High Point, Iowa, held a memorial service in remembrance of Mrs. Martha Johnson, for whom the union was named.

The Chattanooga, Tenn., union has arranged for a series of temperance meetings conducted by Rev. S. H. Cummings of Baltimore.

Miss Elizabeth Pew won first place and $15 in gold at the oratorical contest held under the auspices of the Colorado Springs, Colo., union.

Mrs. Nelle G. Burger, National organizer, has been filling a series of twenty dates in Wisconsin. She attended eight county conventions and the state convention at Eau Claire.

The union at Detroit, Mich., has asked Mayor Maybury to secure a more orderly observance of the Fourth of July. The union is also exercised over the immoral posters pasted over the city.

According to the press dispatches the Galesburg, Ill., union is outspoken in its condemnation of the "inter-scholastic meets" because they are demoralizing to the children who attend them.

The Y of Jamaica, L. I., is doing much flower mission work. It sent recently 165 bouquets to a missionary in the slums of Manhattan. Eight new members were enrolled at a recent meeting.

Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, National organizer, spent two weeks in Seneca county, N. Y. Every union was visited, ten lectures given, nine afternoon meetings held, and sixty-seven new members secured.

The calendar of the Central union of Rockford, Ill., takes the form of a neat little booklet entitled "My Thursday Afternoon Engagements." This union meets every week, and considers general and departmental topics.

The Willard union of Saginaw, Mich., will furnish a room for the Salvation Army headquarters. A Bible reading on "Service for Christ" was conducted by Miss Etta Branch at a recent meeting.

A reception was given by the Johnston, S. C., union in honor of Mrs. J. H. Haynes, state president, and Mrs. Ada W. Unruh, National organizer. The mayor and members of the council and their wives were among the guests present.

Mrs. Mary E. Kuhl, National superintendent of Work among Miners, has been working in California, Oregon, and Idaho. She visited twenty-five towns, organized two counties, four unions, and gained eighty-three new members. Mrs. Kuhl is now working in Montana.

The following well-known workers of the W. C. T. U. were representatives in the late National Conference of Charities and Correction in Atlanta: Mrs. M. L. Spencer and Mrs. W. H. Jeffries of Alabama, Mrs. Martha Havens-Baker of Colorado, and Mrs. Carrie L. Grout of Illinois.

During a recent visit to Sycamore, Ill., of Mrs. C. E. Hunt, National assistant superintendent of Mothers' Meetings and White Ribbon Cradle Roll, five children were graduated from the Cradle Roll into the L. T. L. Mrs. Hunt has organized Cradle rolls at Leland, Ill., and Racine, Wis.

Miss Marie Brehm, state president, had a busy day in Springfield, Ill., recently. She received the members and explained proposed state work during the day, addressing a large audience in the evening. Miss Brehm was en route to Loami where the Sangamon county institute was held.

The Frances Willard C. T. U. of Fort Washington, Md., gave an enjoyable program recently. Several white ribboners from Washington, D. C., were present and assisted in the program. A social hour followed, and, in spite of a heavy rain storm which limited the attendance, those present had a delightful meeting.

The Wood and Marathon inter-county convention was held at Grand Rapids, Wis. Mrs. Nelle G. Burger, National organizer, and Mrs. Mary C. Upham, state president, were honored guests. The membership of the inter-county organization has doubled within the past year and trebled since the convention two years ago.

Mrs. McVean Adams, National lecturer, has just given a series of twelve lectures at McPherson college, Kansas. She also gave one evening recital, using only her own poems and stories. Mrs. Adams is state president of the Purity department. Kansas won the National Purity banner last year, and is working to retain it.

The meeting of the Waterloo, Iowa, union was one of unusual interest and profit. Sunday baseball games, a W. C. T. U. tent at the Chautauqua, and a report from the ministerial union as to what was being done to suppress gambling and Sabbath breaking were considered.

Magnolia Center, the only union in Putnam county, Ill., entertained the county institute May 18 and 19. Miss Frances Ensign, National organizer, was the leader. The sessions were interesting and instructive. Miss Helen Edwards won the medal at the silver medal contest, and the proceeds of the contest nearly met the expenses of the institute.

A fight is on in Kingston, Ont., over the ways of the holders of liquor licenses. On Sunday two W. C. T. U. ladies accompanied the license inspector in a walk about the city, and called his attention to the windows with curtains drawn. As a result nine hotel-keepers were in court to tell why they neglected to uncover their windows and afford a clear view of the interiors.

The Bosworth, Mo., union gave a social meeting May 14, inviting the husbands of the members, the Y's, and the members of the Anti-Saloon League with their wives. A short, spicy program was presented, refreshments were served, and three new active and eight honorary members gained. The Anti-Saloon League, which has been in a dormant condition for several months, was roused into new life, and appointed a meeting at an early date.

LEARNING THINGS

We Are All in the Apprentice Class.

When a simple change of diet brings back health and happiness the story is briefly told. A lady of Springfield, Ill., says: "After being afflicted for years with nervousness and heart trouble, I received a shock four years ago that left me in such a condition that my life was despaired of. I could get no relief from doctors nor from the numberless heart and nerve medicines I tried because I didn't know that the coffee was daily putting me back more than the doctors could put me ahead.

"Finally at the request of a friend I left off coffee and began the use of Postum and against my convictions I gradually improved in health until for the past six or eight months I have been entirely free from nervousness and those terrible sinking, weakening spells of heart trouble.

"My troubles all came from the use of coffee which I had drunk from childhood and yet they disappeared when I quit coffee and took up the use of Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Many people marvel at the effects of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum, but there is nothing marvelous about it—only common sense.

Coffee is a destroyer—Postum is a rebuilder. That's the reason.

W. C. T. U. Notes.

The Portage county, Wis., convention will be held at Stevens Point June 11.

Mrs. N. H. Dunham, state president, spoke to a large audience at Centerville, Iowa.

Fort Pierce, Fla., union supports a reading and rest room which is greatly enjoyed by winter tourists.

Three diamond medal contests have been held in California this spring. Can any other state equal this record?

Berrien county, S. D., has doubled its membership this past year. Over sixty delegates were present at the annual convention.

Miss Rhena Mosher, National organizer, is still working in Texas. She organized a union of fourteen members at Kaufman.

A large audience was present at the union temperance meeting held by the Falls City, Neb., union. Deep interest was manifested.

Department meetings are being conducted by the Newburg, N. Y., union. Work among soldiers and sailors was considered at the last meeting.

The unions of Rochester, N. Y., will hold their quarterly rally July 17. It is thought it will be held in one of the city parks and take the form of a picnic.

The Willard union of Milwaukee, Wis., has protested against the use of beer in christening the new fire boat, and asks that cut flowers be used for the purpose.

The Chester county, Pa., L. T. L. held its second annual convention in Lenape. Among the speakers was Rev. Charles Wesley Burns, former president of the State Legion.

Mrs. A. C. Zehner, state lecturer, is doing valiant service in Texas in the local option campaigns. She spent a week in Milam county, going from there to Franklin.

"Non-Alcoholics and Patent Medicines" was the subject of a paper read by Mrs. F. P. Plummer at the meeting of the Manchester, N. H., union. Interesting discussion followed the reading.

Three hundred and fifty-four comfort bags were distributed to the marines and sailors of the Baltimore, at Brooklyn navy yard, by Miss Emma Alexander, superintendent of Work among Soldiers and Sailors of New York state.

Richland Center, Wis., has an attractive year book. The Red Letter days are truly "red letters," being printed in red. Many interesting topics are assigned for discussion. The motto of the union is "Keep sweet and persevere."

The last meeting of the Belvidere, Ill., union was a departure from the ordinary sessions, as all business was omitted and a special program given. "Why I joined the union, and what is its most important work" was one of the subjects discussed.

"The Work of the W. C. T. U." was the topic of the Open Door Endeavor meeting at Schenectady, N. Y. Mrs. Martha Clowe presented the subject, and especial mention was made of the rescue work among girls carried on by the W. C. T. U.

Special memorial services were held in Willard Hall, Chicago, May 30, and the many beautiful flowers contributed for this purpose were taken to Rosehill and placed on Miss Willard's grave at sunset. Eighteen states were represented in the floral offerings.

Hancock county, Maine, held its sixteenth annual convention at Northeast Harbor. There were many "best things" on the program, and the presence and address of Mrs. Helen G. Rice, National superintendent of the L. T. L. branch, were much enjoyed by all.

The union at Vermilion, S. D., is engaged in many lines of work. It used the program given in the UNION SIGNAL for its Willard Memorial meeting in February. A Neal Dow supper netted it $17.50. Mass meetings were held previous to the spring election, and Vermilion voted in favor of no license The union will now "lend a hand" to assist in law enforcement.

Illinois women will be especially interested in the fine reports that come to us of the work of Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, former state president, in W. C. T. U. Institutes. Mrs. Rounds has just completed a trip of three weeks in western New York, during which time she attended seven Institutes, being the "conductor" of five of them. In this department Mrs. Rounds is especially at home and to her belongs the credit of securing the change of name from "Schools of Method" to the more happy term—"Institute." Her wide experience in this work began at Bay View, Michigan, where she was for several years at the head of the W. C. T. U. Institutes held there in connection with the Bay View Assembly. As an Institute worker Mrs. Rounds has made a fine record.

Dates Wanted.

We desire to know the date, with the name and postoffice address of the presiding officer, of every convention, institute or other meeting where white ribbon women are gathered. We also wish the date of every Chautauqua where the W. C. T. U. is represented. Will you give THE UNION SIGNAL ten minutes on your convention program? If so we will send material to fill this number on the program, and sample copies of THE UNION SIGNAL for the literature table. Send the information as to convention or other dates to the Circulation Department of THE UNION SIGNAL, 184 La Salle street, Chicago.

Every member of your union will be glad to see its name on our Roll of Honor. Your state president will be made happy, every white ribbon leader who has ever visited you will "point with pride" to your record. All this is made easy to accomplish by the special offer of THE UNION SIGNAL until November 26 for fifty cents.

Where Our Speakers Are.

I expect to be in Evanston during the summer months, and will be available for work at Chautauquas, Institutes, Temperance and Prohibition rallies, and will be glad to respond to calls from local Unions or conventions. For terms address me at Evanston, Ill., Care of Helen M. Barker, Rest Cottage.

The Movement for an Opium Monopoly in the Philippines.

Rev. Homer C. Stunz, Correspondent.

MANILA, P. I., May 2.—We are in the midst of a hard fight over the licensing of the opium traffic in these Islands under the "Concessionary" or "Farmer" system. In some ways it is an improvement upon the system obtaining in British possessions in the East; but it fastens the monopolistic, highest bidder infamy upon us as a nation.

The Evangelical Union has asked that our government cut the traffic up by the roots. I have had repeated interviews with Governor Taft and with General Smith, of the Commission, but meet with little encouragement in the effort to secure prohibition of the traffic. Our argument in favor of prohibition is, in outline, about as follows:

1. It ought to be prohibited. It is an evil and among such people as the Filipinos it is certain to work terrible havoc. The harm it does to the Chinese people is a hint and a help to understand what it will do among a people with equal aptitude and less resisting power.

2. It can be prohibited. The traffic is small. The coast line is patrolled in all directions now to prevent importation of fire-arms, etc., and the same force would be sufficient to detect any attempt to smuggle in opium. In fact the vigilance required to protect the Concessioner or Farmer under this act would be as great as that required to keep the poison out altogether.

3. The proposed legislation creates a monopoly for profit, and that monopoly will stimulate consumption by all means known to Chinese traders in order to recoup themselves. This will swell the volume of the awful trade to proportions appalling to consider.

4. America ought to set an example to the nations about us here in dealing with the opium traffic. She certainly should not fall into the deep ditch in which the old "John Company" left England in India. The long agitation of the opium question has made it clear that the government monopoly of the traffic as that monopoly obtains in India and Malaysia is an infamy that no nation can afford to invite.

The passage of the Two Mile Limit Law has been a great victory for righteousness. The first operation of the law is reported in the paper this evening. All applications for renewal of licenses in Malate, where saloons just across the road from the reservation have been a scandal and a deep disgrace to us ever since the canteen was abolished, have been promptly refused by the civil authorities, and the paper contains a long list of saloon-keepers who will be compelled to shut up their places. We rejoice. It all conspires with other legislation to make drunkenness hard and temperance easy.

The peremptory order of the Commission to all Americans living with native women to either marry them or amend their ways by putting them away is clearing up the situation wonderfully. Many are marrying these women, and on the whole that is the best thing to do. I hesitate to marry them unless well satisfied that they intend to remain in the Islands and support their wives; but even if they do not do this, marriage gives the woman and any children which may be born to these mesalliances an honorable position in society.

The Forty-second Psalm.

N. F. S. Grundtvig, 1812.

As after the water brooks panteth
The hart when it sinks in the chase.
So thirsteth my soul as it fainteth
For Thee, O my God, and Thy Grace;
For Thou art the fount ever-living,
And fain I would drink, O be giving
The water of life unto me!

By day and by night in her anguish
My soul is lamenting in woe;
O Lord, in my grief I must languish;
No counsel, no help do I know;
When shall I Thy mercy awaken?
When shall I, the poor and forsaken,
Before Thee appear, O my God?

Great fears have my heart overtaken,
For near the abyss I am brought;
I stand on the brink, and am shaken;
My passage with peril is fraught;
I faint, I see terrors appalling,
And into the deep I am falling—
O hearken, O Lord, to my cries!

Thou, Thou art my Rock of Salvation;
My house I have built upon Thee;
Oh, if Thou shouldst fail as foundation,
My ruin it surely would be;
Lord, deep unto deep is now calling;
Thy waves and Thy billows appalling
Arise to go over my soul.

When others sing anthems of gladness,
And offer thanksgiving and praise,
I sit in the gloom of my sadness
And hear not the anthems they raise;
My song is the voice of my sighing,
The festal days pass in my crying—
I languish in grief and in woe.

Why art thou disquiet within me?
Why art thou cast down, O my soul?
Confide in thy God, let Him win thee!
Still hope in thy God, Him extol!
For surely once dawneth a morrow,
When, freed from thy care and thy sorrow,
Thou praises shall sing to thy God.

His light and His truth, they shall lead me
In peace to His temple at last;
I rest on His word, He will speed me,
And conflict and sorrow are past;
Yea, joyful I anthems will raise Him,
With heart and with voice will I praise Him—
My Health and my Life and my God.

The Bow of White.

By Laura Smith.

"GIVE us a sign" has been the cry of all the ages; an outward symbol for an inward truth.

When this cry reached the ears of a body of consecrated women they chose the little bow of white ribbon, symbol of purity, as a sign unto all the world of the standard of purity of life and thought which they were striving to set up. Then, too, it is the white light that embodies all the prismatic colors, and so all the beauties of the "Bow of Promise" are contained in the modest little knot of white ribbon worn by those who "belong."

What has it come to mean to the world about us? To the needy it means physical help; to the poor in spirit and sick of soul it means a hand clasp and a pointing of the way; to the suffering and sorrowing it means flowers, brightness, and comfort; to the erring girl it means protection and help to better things; to a wayward boy a motherly greeting or a sisterly kindness; to the drunkard an anchor of safety if he but come under its influence and away from the reign of the enemy; to the child it suggests the interested friend from whom he is sure of a smile; to the pastor a church worker and one upon whom he may depend for sympathy and help. In short, to one side of life it means that "somebody cares"; to the other, strength of principle, loyalty to right, earnestness of purpose, and, above all, total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the nation.

Sister, is it worth while to wear it? Is it worth while to keep the bows tied, ready for use? Is it worth while to step back for this little symbol in the hope of its performing a mission rather than the "O, well, it doesn't matter; doesn't amount to much anyway, and it does get soiled so quickly"?

Two young men were seated in a dining car. They were out for a good time and had ordered drinks to liven things up a little. Before the order was filled a lady entered the car and was seated not far away. When the glasses came one young man refused to drink. His companion demanded an explanation, which quickly followed: "No, John; I can't. That lady over there has on a white ribbon. My mother wears it, and I can't drink in its presence." Neither drank. Was that worth while?

Still we hear "It only aggravates the prejudice and subjects to ridicule." Melt the frost of prejudice with the sunshine of love, and anoint the stiff necks with the "oil of gladness." Make your life practical and helpful and the white ribbon is honored in your community.

Think what it has meant to the womanhood of the world!

The Iowa Law.

[The following article by Bertha E. Bush, of Garner, Iowa, in the "Midland Schools," is worthy of a careful reading by our workers in the department of Scientific Temperance Instruction.]

A Kansas speaker is reported to have said: "They have a law in Iowa that is worth more than all the prohibition laws that can be made and that is the law that the harmful effects of stimulants and narcotics shall be taught in all the schools."

Is it worth so much as that? The discouraged Iowa teacher, mourning over boys that will smoke cigarets although they have been taught the evil effects of stimulants and narcotics ever since they entered the primary room, doubts the Kansas speaker's statement. But our state law is a fine thing and every Iowa teacher will do well to study it over and over and exercise the utmost care in complying with every requirement. Here is the text of the law taken from "Iowa School Laws and Decisions for 1902":

It (the board of school directors) shall require all teachers to give and all scholars to receive instruction in physiology and hygiene, which study in every division of the subject shall include the effects upon the human system of alcoholic stimulants, narcotics and poisonous substances. The instruction in this branch shall of its kind be as direct and specific as that given in other essential branches, and each scholar shall be required to complete the part of such study in his class or grade before being advanced to the next higher, and before being credited with having completed the study of the subject.

1. This study must begin in the lowest primary class. In what grade or class it shall be completed is to be determined by the board.

2. Primary classes must be instructed orally, as the children are not old enough to use or comprehend a book. But this oral instruction must be outlined as a course, and adopted by each board.

3. The portion assigned to each grade or class should be thoroughly mastered before more advanced work is entered upon.

4. The board may forbid the use of tobacco on the school grounds.

6. Teachers should be careful to give instruction in accordance with the spirit of the law. The law contemplates that the noxious effects upon the system of the user of any of the articles named shall be taught.

7. Many other harmful effects, very properly emphasized in public lectures, are not required to be taught in the class room.

8. It is not out of place to emphasize the truth that total abstinence is the only sure way to escape the evils arising from the use of alcoholic drinks and tobacco.

9. The alarming increase of the cigaret habit calls for united and aggressive action in removing from the growing boy, as far as we can possibly do so, the temptation and opportunity to purchase tobacco. In this way value will be added to the instruction required to be given in all public schools as to the effects of narcotics.

10. We urge upon all teachers to co-operate with the authorities and with all other persons in creating and fostering a sentiment favoring a rigid enforcement of the law regarding the sale or giving of tobacco to boys.

11. Every scholar must study physiology and hygiene, including the effects of stimulants and narcotics, until the outline upon that branch, as adopted by the board, has been completed.

12. The law does not mean that a scholar must necessarily study this branch continuously during his entire school life, unless the course of study adopted by the board so provides.

13. A board cannot shift responsibility by simply providing that teachers shall give instruction in this branch. It must see to it that the work is actually done by the teachers as the law requires.

14. To teach a special branch a person may receive a state or county certificate for that study only, and is not required also to be examined as provided for teachers in general.

15. County superintendents should know that every teacher is complying fully with this statute, and any teacher failing or refusing to teach as required, may not be permitted to continue in the work of teaching.

16. The proper remedy to secure an enforcement of these provisions as of other mandatory requirements, is application to a court of law for a writ of mandamus.

What is the penalty if we fail to comply with this statute? Do you know, oh teachers of Iowa, who slip over the temperance parts of the text-books as lightly as your conscience will allow because it certainly is the hardest subject in the course of study to teach, do you know what every county superintendent is in duty bound to do in case we fail to give instruction? Read the latter part of Section 2737:

"The superintendent shall revoke the certificate of any teacher who shall fail or neglect to comply with the provisions of law relating to the teaching of physiology and hygiene, and such teacher shall be disqualified for teaching in any public school for one year thereafter."

How shall the county superintendent know whether you have taught these subjects or not? By an elaborate system of reports which the secretaries of the school boards are required to make to him and he to the state superintendent. There is no loophole of evasion left unguarded. It is as good a law as was ever put on the statute books of any state. May God bless and help us all to carry it out.

THAT'S THE TIME

When Proper Food Is Necessary.

Proper food is never more necessary than when recovering from a wasting sickness, when over-eating would be fatal and yet the body needs nourishment and plenty of it.

At this time the condensed food Grape-Nuts is shown to be one's most powerful friend. Four teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts and cream will sustain a healthy man for half a day and a less quantity in warm milk will build up the convalscent wonderfully. No stomach is too weak to digest and relish Grape-Nuts. "I was taken sick with Typhoid fever and everyone who has had this disease knows how weak and lifeless a person feels when beginning to recuperate.

"I had to be very careful about my diet and could eat only very light foods. These did not seem to nourish me and instead of getting better everyone began to fear a relapse. One day while lying in bed very much discouraged my sister who was reading to me from the paper read an article about Grape-Nuts and we decided to send for a package.

"From the very first meal of Grape-Nuts I began to improve, strength came in bounds and leaps with the result that I was soon out of bed; my change for the better seemed simply marvelous. My mind is clear and strong and my body sturdy. I am now entirely recovered." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is a reason.

A dessert that helps the body, that's the thing! Any number of them in the little recipe book in each package of Grape-Nuts.

The contract will state the number of hours the girl is supposed to work, the time she may have off, and how long her vacation is to be. The girl promises conscientious work.

Miss Elizabeth Yeats, a sister of the Irish poet, W. B. Yeats, has started in Ireland a "Dun Emer Press," in which she is attempting to rival the Kelmscott work. Paper made from pure linen has been procured from the Irish mills, and Miss Yeats, with the help of an apprentice, is doing the printing. The Woman's Educational Association of Boston, an old and well-known society, has undertaken a unique plan for the solution of the servant-girl problem. The association will not antagonize the servant girls' union. It will guarantee the efficiency of the girls it hires out, and wages will be graded and reasonable.

June Magazines.

"The Negro in the Regular Army" is the opening paper in the ATLANTIC, ably discussed by Oswald Garrison Villard, who after careful and deliberate study, concludes that notwithstanding the discrimination against the negro in questions of promotion and appointment to the regular army, "the negro regiments have come to stay, both in the regulars and in the volunteers." "The Boston Religion," is a lively review of Unitarianism, by Rev. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, and there is a discussion of "The Changes in College Life," by John Bascom. The literary department has a new feature—a paper upon books of art, written by Royal Cortissoz, the literary editor of the New York Tribune. Allan Neilson reviews with gratifying appreciation the unique work, Helen Keller's "The Story of My Life." The poems are all exquisite models of art, and the Contributors' Club relieves the seriousness of this weighty number.

The CHAUTAUQUAN'S contents are handled in a masterly style by educators, critics and students of social questions. Frederic Austin Ogg, in "Saxon and Slave," England and Russia, predicts that ere the close of the present century the Saxon or the Slave will control the politics of half the globe. Benjamin A. Heydrick's article on letter writing is suggestive, repeating the good advice, "Do not correspond with more people than you correspond to." Caroline L. Hunt makes a strong plea for "More Conscience for the Consumer," and the programs and bibliography found in Survey of Civic Betterment will prove of help to clubs and betterment organizations.

Stories and sketches relating to school life appropriately distinguish the June ST. NICHOLAS. A wholesome and interesting story, with a distinctively original plot, is "The School Room Dog," by Mary E. Fitzgerald. "When Stacie's Class Graduated" is a charming tale of self denial and quiet heroism, worked out in a dramatic climax, artistically and graphically executed. "How to Take Snap-Shots" is a pleasantly given lesson for amateur photographers and "About Magnets" contains many hints regarding the skillful management of those attractive little instruments. In fact, summer brightness irradiates the pages, making the magazine ideal reading for boys and girls.

THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS presents an unusual variety in the make-up of the current month. Prominent place is given to four important articles on the latest methods of treating consumption. In "Forest-Making in Barren Lands", Charles M. Hager describes the latest experiments that have been made by the government in tree-planting. Among the editorial topics are strikes in the building trades, the present business situation, negro suffrage and negro education in the south, and the Kisheneff riots. In the department, "The Progress of the World," is a full résumé of the significant events of the past month.

Perhaps the most attractive feature of the WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION is the setting forth of the June wedding. There are practical hints for carrying out the important function, together with illustrations showing decorations for both home and church. "Bird-Land Nurseries," by Ernest Harold Baynes, will be of assistance to all those who take an interest in the study of nature—and who does not these out-of-door days? The illustrations of this number are particularly fine, including the work of A. I. Keeler, Frederic Remington and C. M. Relyea.

SUCCESS, as usual, abounds in practical hints and helps calculated to lift up and strengthen the discouraged and to inspire anew the hopeful and the ambitious. "Financing a Nation," by Frank Fayant, another chapter of "The Confessions of a Croesus," by David Graham Phillips, "The Philosophy of Mr. Dooley," by Allan Graham, and "The Young Men in the Administration," by Redgely Torrence, will attract the general reader.

Richard le Gallienne, Elia W. Peattie, Bliss Carman, James Forbes, and other writers of note, make AINSLEE'S a brilliant fiction number—an excellent companion for the hammock at home or an outing.

The HOME-MAKER, edited and published by Emma A F. Drake, M. D., carries thruout its pages the spell of its quietly beautiful color-cover. There is found not only the home atmosphere, but the definite word of guidance needed by the makers of the home. Besides the practical articles and special departments, are bright suggestive stories for both the younger and older members of the family. This little magazine should find its way into many homes.

COALS FROM THE ALTAR, by Rev. H. T. Davis, consists of twelve sermons upon exalted subjects. "The Value of the Soul," "Time to Seek God," "The Out and Out Christian," are topics that exemplify the author's faith in the power of God to do for the believer more than it has entered into the heart of man to think or ask or dream. The themes are well developed and anecdote and incident give interest and emphasis to the vital truths taught. (Cincinnati: office of God's Revivalist, 75 cents.)

NANCY'S EASTER GIFT, by Myra Baldwin, is a short dramatic dialect poem telling the story of a forlorn child's self-denial in giving to the Master, on Easter day, her sole possession, her tiny crutch, the only means by which she is enabled to reach and enjoy the simple pleasures of field and woodland stream. The struggle in the child's heart is vividly depicted and the mastery in it has a gleam of heroism that enspires to noble living. The happy outcome and the pervading theme of temperance gives to the poem the elements of a recitation. (New York: The Abbey Press. 50 cents.)

"Mon, mon, have it really coomed? Not a livin' sinner coomed nigh me yesterday, and me fast wi' the rheumatiz, and starved for a bit o' bacca! Mon, it coomed to pass that I 'most brought mysen to ask God A'mighty Hissen to send me a bit."

"Well, Bet, and how do you know that he hasn't?" asked Hugh as he prepared to give her a light.

"Nay! we knaws better than to think that it coomed that way," said Bet significantly. "Never a livin' sinner nigh me for two days, and there's no bacca to be had out o' t'other kind."

"Oh, then I come in with the sinners, do I?"

"Happen," said Bet, with serenity. "I knaw nothing about it, and care less. I'm suited with ye, for ye are the first that wasn't scart at me, and barrin' an odd time here and there, ye haven't worrited overmuch abaht my soul."

"Oh, Bet!"

They sat on in silence until, with a sigh of content, Bet knocked the ashes from the empty bowl into the hollow of her hand.

"Well, I'll say this for God A'mighty: He made one good lad."

"Ah, Bet! if you only knew—"

"Ye needn't 'Ah, Bet' me. I knaw all abaht ye that I want to knaw, and I tell ye that I'm suited," said Bet with an air of finality as she proceeded to refill her pipe.

"Shall we ask God to bless us and make us thankful for all the good things He sends us?" asked Hugh, out of an earthly desire to clear himself from a rankling imputation

"Why, yes; but—"

"Then, thank ye kindly, and let it be. I'm not one for grovellin'."

"Bet, Bet; we're a couple of bad ones and may the Lord have mercy on us both," he said so fervently that Bet wondered vaguely what ailed him.

He supplied her once more with a light, receiving by way of thanks the grunt that was an unspoken benison, and at last resolutely turned his steps toward Miss Smith's immaculate hearth.

Not for any consideration would Miss Smith have been looking for his coming, but she sat with her back to the window, sternly listening for his knock.

"Come in!" commanded the acid tones the minute the knock was heard.

With the acidity was a judicious infusion of incredulous surprise which prepared the unfortunate curate for the form taken by Miss Smith's greeting.

"Well, you are a stranger!"

This time, however, the shaft glanced off harmlessly, for it was followed in a tone of real concern by a further exclamation:

"My! what a poor look you've got! There, I knowed you was comin'. Tummas rapped of me to say as I was to see to it that you didn't go out without a cup of tea. Now, if you want to offend me, say at once you'd rather not. It's all ready for maskin,' so sit ye down and let's have no words about it."

Hugh obeyed and with grim severity was made to swallow the scalding contents of a large cup with the accompaniment of a proportion of buttered tea-cake. Moreover, Miss Smith successfully resisted the temptation offered by this unprecedented opportunity to instruct him concerning certain neglected details of his clerical duty. On the contrary she more than once adjured him to see that he went straight home to rest. With thankful alacrity he availed himself of her permission to depart as soon as his duty towards her hospitable table was done, and Miss Smith dismissed him from her door with warmer commendation than was often suffered to pass her lips.

Anti-Cigaret Helps.

Now that people everywhere are becoming awakened to the evils which follow cigaret smoking, we should push our campaign in this department with redoubled energy. Two effective helps are "An Anti-Cigaret Program," price five cents, and "The Anti-Cigaret Speaker," price ten cents, both prepared by Mrs. Ida B. Cole, associate and lecturer for the Anti-Narcotic department. The "Program," which is to be given by the boys and girls, presents the subject effectively and would make a pleasing entertainment. The numerous recitations mentioned in the program are found in the "Speaker." This book should be in the hands of every mother or teacher, who is called on to furnish "something to speak." The recitations are suited to all grades, are easily memorized and will be welcomed by the children, for whose use the book is prepared.

Anent Women Emigration Inspectors.

Mrs. Ellis' Personal Experiences on Board Ship.

Margaret Dye Ellis, Correspondent.

En Route in Maine, June 1, 1903.—You may be assured that I have not been idle in behalf of retaining women inspectors of immigration.

MRS. MARGARET DYE ELLIS.

I received a letter from the Secretary to the President, asking me to see Commissioner Williams in command at New York Harbor. This I did. I was received very cordially, but was assured by him the plan was an unwise one, that it "was no place for women," "no lady would accept the position," "men inspectors could give all the aid and counsel necessary—and could do the work as well as women," "men could detect immoral women more readily than women," and "women resented being singled out and spoken to by the women inspectors," etc. Of course I met these objections with my own convictions on the subject, but failed to convince him.

Not long after, one bright beautiful morning, I sailed down the bay in company with the government officials. Several steamers were anchored in the lower bay—and as the cutter came alongside, a ladder was raised, and doctors and inspectors quickly climbed to the steamer deck, then away to another vessel.

You will remember how much was said in the press concerning women climbing the ship's ladder. The accompanying picture will show how this is done. A reporter on the cutter snapped his camera as I was about to board a French steamer, "La Bretagne." Some of the vessels are higher, but any woman who has cleaned windows on a step-ladder, or hung pictures could do this. Indeed, it doesn't begin to be as hard as climbing a tally-ho coach.

Once on board, and passing thru the crowds of steerage passengers, I was led by my companion to a place where I could observe the plan mapped out by the government in dealing with second cabin passengers. The male inspector took his place at a table with a manifest sheet before him; one of the stewards stood at his side to interpret; the passengers crowded up to answer the questions shot at them—such as "name," "age," "where from," "destination," etc. There was no time for more than the most rapid answers to the questions—for the steamer was sailing up the bay and in an hour and a quarter from the time we boarded, was made fast to her dock in New York, hence the need of haste.

In the meantime the woman inspector had been moving about among the passengers, speaking to every woman, in her own language, for the majority were from France. Commissioner Williams had told me that "women resented being singled out and being spoken to, as it made them conspicuous;" but this was not the case. Four young girls coming to New York to take positions as maids, wholly unacquainted with the language, with no friends to meet them, were assured by my friend that they should be placed in safe hands and taken to a good house, where they could stay until situations were procured. The look of relief and satisfaction on these four, their profuse thanks, certainly gave proof that they at least appreciated being met by, and cared for by a woman.

A young French girl of sixteen was found to be in company with a man of perhaps forty-five. She had told the inspector she was not married, but the man later declared they "had been married nine years"—and she sixteen years old! Upon examining their manifest-card, it was found they were booked for a house of ill-fame in New York, the man evidently bringing the girl over for this purpose.

I had frequent conversations with the inspectors and have learned enough to more thoroly convince me than ever, that women are greatly needed to meet and care for women arriving at our ports.

Two conferences were held in April at the Presbyterian Building, in New York, to consider the subject. At the first, twenty-four societies were represented, and at the second thirty-eight, embracing sociological, philanthropic, benevolent and reform interests generally. Dr. Josiah Strong presided, and Mrs. Ella A. Boole acted as secretary. Resolutions in appreciation of the act of President Roosevelt in recommending the appointment of women inspectors and urging their retention was adopted.

At the second meeting Commissioner Williams in response to our invitation was present, and stated his objections. Questions came thick and fast from the audience, and were parried or answered as the case might be. At one time he replied: "Well, I have only been Commissioner ten months," and finally when Rev. Dr. Mason North asked "if the women had received instructions as to their duties," refused to reply.

At the end of the ninety days, for which they were appointed, the women inspectors received word "their services were no longer required by the government."

When I waited upon the President just before he left for his Western trip he gave a memorandum for an order that they "should not be disturbed until his return"—certainly somewhere there has been a lapse. Secretary Shaw wrote Dr. Strong that he would receive a few persons interested and listen to their views, May 25, whereupon Dr. Strong, president, American Institute of Social Service; Miss. American, of Jewish Council of Women; Mrs. Kelly, of the Consumers' League, and myself, went to Washington and presented our case to him. We found him full of objections to the plan, but before we left was more inclined to listen. He also informed us that, on July 1, the whole immigration department was to be turned over to Secretary Cortelyou, and advised our seeing him. This we did, and received his assurance that he would give the subject his most careful attention, looking the entire ground over most carefully. We believe he will deal justly in the matter.

I have been delighted at the interest manifested on the part of the representative women of New York. I have been invited to speak upon this subject before the Woman's Republican Club, at their monthly meeting held at Delmonico's, also at the annual Federation of Women's Clubs held at the Waldorf-Astoria, in New York, which was a great gathering of women who have known very little of the work of the W. C. T. U. Resolutions were adopted, and sent those in authority, expressive of their desire that women be appointed by the government to meet women coming to our ports in the second cabin.

Our Work in the Nutmeg State.

Several Fine Schools of Methods—Much Good Local Work.

By Josephine Lockrow, Correspondent.

Meriden, Conn., June 6.—The four Schools of Methods held in different parts of our state were largely attended and much interest was shown. It was expected that Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis would address each school, but owing to illness she was unable to go to Torrington. She addressed the meetings at Middletown, Willimantic, and Norwich.

M. JOSEPHINE LOCKROW.

Meriden union celebrated its twenty-ninth anniversary by an afternoon meeting to which the neighboring unions were invited. Four unions were well represented. The state and county presidents both took part in the program. A social hour followed, with light refreshments. Mrs. Ellis gave an address in the Trinity M. E. Church the evening of May 13, which was well attended and created much interest. The union and two companies of the L. T. L. expect to enjoy an outing together the last of this month.

Ansonia recently held an interesting meeting in the Baptist church. Ninety-five persons were present, nearly all children. At the annual meeting of Branford union a new department was adopted, that of foreign literature. A fine free-will-offering meeting was held, with a good collection. For the coming year The Union Signal will be given to the public library and the pastors of two churches. Branford is a shore resort and the saloon element is firmly established, so it is very hard to make any sort of impression. Moodus union is erecting a drinking fountain in their village.

Middlesex county held its annual meeting in Middletown, May 14. Stamford union held their silver anniversary recently. There are nineteen of the charter members still on the roll, nine of whom were present.

Our readers will remember the action of the mayor of Stamford in regard to closing the saloons on Sunday. He has at last declared himself for a strict enforcement of the law relative to Sunday closing—not of saloons, but of clothing stores! The following is from the local newspaper report of a recent meeting of the common council:

"The Sunday closing petition from the W. C. T. U. was not reached until near the end of the meeting. The names signed to it, which took up about ten feet of paper, were not read. The petition was received and placed on file, and immediate attention was given to a communication from Catherine Quinn regarding a pig-pen. This matter was referred to the health and sewerage committee and no further attention was given the W. C. T. U. petition. Comment is unnecessary."

A World-Wide War on Opium.

By Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, Correspondent.

Washington, D. C., June 12.—The International Reform Bureau has brought the opium question in three aspects before the War Department and the President. First, the opium monopoly bill, which will come up for final passage in the Philippine Civil Government on June 15, unless the President shall use his full powers to prevent it. The law, as seen in proof at the War Department, covers a dozen 12mo pages. It forbids selling or giving opium "as a narcotic" to anybody but a full-blooded Chinaman of full age, and confines the sale of these to on "opium concessionary" and his "opium dealers," who buy the monopoly once in three years at auction. Druggists, however, may import direct and sell to anybody on a physician's prescription, of which sales they are required to keep no record by names, as is required by the concessionary and his agents. Punishment is fine or imprisonment, with no minimum penalty, so that it may be nominal if public sentiment or other influences dispose the judge to leniency. The revenue, by way of sweetening the poison, is devoted to the education of the Filipinos.

The bill would be very hard to enforce, and the prominence given to revenue would almost inevitably make it PROMOTIVE rather than "restrictive" of the traffic. The Clerical Union of Manila in an $80 cablegram to the Reform Bureau thru which they appeal to the American people and the President to defeat the bill, declare it "would increase consumption," and is at once "BAD MORALS AND WORSE POLITICS." The Bureau has urged that instead of dealing with the opium from the "revenue" standpoint, as Great Britain has done, to its own great dishonor, we should adopt the Japanese law, which the world applauds as right and wise, prohibiting not only the sale but also the importation.

There is some smuggling in Japan, but the evil is reduced to its lowest terms, in accord with the Gladstonian principle, to "make it as hard as possible to do wrong." Those who will not stay in the Philippines without opium can be spared with profit. IT WAS LEARNED AT THE WAR DEPARTMENT THAT THE ONLY EFFECT OF THE EARLY PROTESTS SENT TO THE PRESIDENT BY BISHOP THOBURN AND OTHERS HAS BEEN A CABLEGRAM TO JUDGE TAFT FOR UTMOST "RESTRICTION." We know what that means. The President should learn at once, by swift letters and telegrams, that this country desires to follow Japan's wisdom rather than England's folly. The President has full power over this matter in the Philippines.

But in the United States also opium needs attention, and here Congress must act. The Bureau of Statistics shows an increased expenditure for opium from a quarter of a million in 1890 to more than a million in 1900. The President has been asked to bring this alarming increase to the attention of the next Congress, with a recommendation of legislation like that of Japan as far as possible.

Renewed attention is also called, while the opium question is up, to the petition of the American Missionary Societies, asking that our Government will initiate diplomatic relations to release China from treaty obligation to tolerate the blighting opium traffic.

The Bureau proposes a world-wide warfare on the opium traffic in the hope it can be buried beside the slave traffic in the limbo of crimes against civilization.

Virginia's Adopted Daughter.

Miss Christine Tinling of London, Represents the "Old Dominion" at the World's Convention.

Mrs. Howard M. Hoge, Correspondent.

Lincoln, Va., June 15.—Virginia is very proud to claim Miss Christine Tinling as one of her very own white ribboners, and we feel assured that no other state had a more distinguished representative at the World's convention.

MISS CHRISTINE TINLING.

Ruckersville Y has recently completed its membership contest. Jamestown district in James City county has just voted "dry." Mrs. Newton, our state organizer, was there a short time. She writes: "In one day I drove twenty-five miles, interviewing voters and advertising an address for the night at the church in center of the district. Had a good audience, altho the district is thinly settled and the farmers very busy. The new union resulting from this meeting is at work.

The next state convention will be held in Charlottesville. The convention was entertained there in 1895, again in 1900, and they have extended a most cordial invitation for 1903. It is central, easy of access, and the seat of our university. Their recent local option contest was won by the "wets," but the temperance forces are not discouraged. They mean to continue to agitate and educate till victory is won.

Annual Meeting of the British Woman's Temperance Union.

Special Correspondence.

LONDON, England, May 28.—The annual council meeting of the National B. W. T. A., which closed to-day, was unusual from many points of view—the retirement of the beloved president, Lady Henry Somerset, after fourteen years of faithful service—the presence of many foreign visitors who were en route to the World's Convention, and the large attendance of delegates from all parts of England, with a good representation from Scotland and Wales.

MRS. HUGH PRICE HUGHES.

LADY CARLISLE.

MISS AGNES E. SLACK.

Special interest has centered in this meeting since the first of the year, when Lady Henry Somerset gave notice that, owing to continued ill health, she would not be a candidate for re-election. Her farewell address as president was delivered at a great meeting held in Queen's Hall, and many expressions of love and appreciation were tendered her. The Countess of Carlisle was chosen as Lady Henry's successor. Lady Carlisle is well known as an ardent temperance woman, a fine speaker, and a good presiding officer. Her influence has done much for the temperance cause in England. All her family are abstainers, and the practical means she uses to advance the cause of national sobriety has the full support of the Earl of Carlisle, who has closed all the public houses on their estates wherever possible. Lady Carlisle fully believes in the democratic movement of the temperance crusade, and sets a splendid example of consistent adherence to principle.

Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes was elected vice-president by nomination of Lady Carlisle. Miss Agnes E. Slack was re-elected corresponding secretary, Mrs. Osborn recording secretary, and Miss M. C. Gorham treasurer.

Among the resolutions adopted was the following:

"Having heard that an effort is likely to be made to introduce barmaids at the forthcoming St. Louis Exhibition, and knowing the great evils involved in this employment in our own country, this council of the B. W. T. A. earnestly hopes that the W. C. T. U. and others interested in temperance and morality will use their best endeavors to prevent this employment from entering into the United States."

The special public meetings attracted great audiences. Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, Miss Anna Gordon and Mrs. Katherine Lente Stevenson of America were among the speakers.

Temperance Work Pushed in the Buckeye State.

Successful County Convention—Many New Unions Formed.

Anna P. Stillwell, Correspondent.

TROY, Ohio, June 12.—Miami county convention, held at Bradford, while successful as to results, had a smaller attendance than usual. In the evening the annual lecture was given by Mrs. J. C. Stone, state superintendent of Unfermented Wine at Sacrament, and one of our best lecturers. Mrs. Stone spent three weeks in Miami county preceding this convention, organizing a new union of nine members at Ludlow Falls and giving a series of three meetings each at Covington, Laura and Bradford.

MRS. J. C. STONE.

Wood county held a two-days' institute at Bradner, at which Mrs. Lillian Burt, editor of our state paper, was leader. Miss Olivia A. Thomas, state recording secretary, is president of the county, and Miss Ida F. Simon, press superintendent. The evening was devoted to a grand gold medal contest in which Miss Mabel Craig of Brander won the medal. Eleven departments were discussed during the institute and representative citizens held a symposium on "What Shall be the Next Step Toward the Abolition of the Liquor Traffic and Tobacco Habit?"

La Fayette union is doing a fine educational work thru meetings with special topics and the press reports of the superintendent, Mrs. Mary Mehaffey.

Franklin county has twenty-two unions, three organized recently by Mrs. Jennie White Smith, the state superintendent of Mothers' Meetings. The county suffers by the removal to Pittsburg, Pa., of Mrs. Mary Castle, county president. She is the sister of our state president and one of the organizers, and carried with her inspiration and enthusiasm.

An Enterprising Colorado Union.

Esther A. Gaymon, Correspondent.

DENVER, Colo., June 8.—Over a year ago, Mrs. Anna L. Christiansen, then a member of Highlands union, Denver, removed to Ouray, Colo., a mining town in the southern part of the state, where, with a population of 2,500, twenty-four saloons flourish. In April of last year Mrs. Christiansen organized a union with four regular members and one honorary. The following month, a two-day institute was conducted by the state president, Mrs. Hawley, and the Fourteenth district was organized, with Mrs. Christiansen, as district president.

MRS. A. L. CHRISTIANSEN.

As president of the Ouray union Mrs. Christiansen has done a splendid work. Temperance work in a mining town, where the liquor element controls, is neither easy nor free from disappointments. The one who undertakes it must have patience and the power of endurance. Mrs. Christiansen has these qualities and has been untiring in her work, addressing mass meetings as well as attending to the routine work of the union and by her eneregtic example inciting other members to do their best. The union now numbers twenty-five regular and eight honorary members. The Press superintendent, Mrs. Eggleston, has been very helpful in the work, furnishing up-to-date temperance news for the two weekly papers. The Willard Memorial meeting, which was participated in by the principal of the public schools, ministers, and representatives of the literary clubs, was fully reported. The departments of Flower Mission and Literature have been combined and exceptionally good work done, the sick having been visited both in hospitals and homes and good reading matter furnished for the W. C. T. U. wall-pocket at the depot as well as the near-by mines.

The High School has been presented with a picture of Miss Willard. Medal contests have been held with good success and the financial standing of the union is good. A list of ten subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL was lately sent in, another proof of the wide-awake and up-to-date qualities of this union.

Slot machines were removed from the town by the efforts of the W. C. T. U. and an active part was taken in the campaign preceding the city election this spring, several of the candidates supported by the union being elected and the power of the leading saloonkeeper, who has been controlling the political issues of the city, received a death-blow. During the campaign two helpful and well attended public meetings were held, both addressed by Mrs. Christiansen. At present the W. C. T. U., in connection with committee from the Miner's Union and clubs of the city, are petitioning for the enforcement of the ordinance against gambling.

The motto of the union is: "They conquer who dare to wait and be strong." With this ever uppermost in their thoughts these brave women of Ouray are looking forward to still greater achievements.

Death of Professor Stuckenberg.

Louise E. Purington, Correspondent.

BOSTON, Mass., June 10.—The Massachusetts constituency sorrows in the great loss which has come to our beloved comrade, Mary J. Stuckenberg, state superintendent, also National, of the department of Temperance and Labor.

Dr. J. H. W. Stuckenberg died suddenly in London, May 28, during an operation for an affection of the throat. Mrs. Stuckenberg crossed the ocean a few weeks earlier to attend the Bremen Anti-Alcoholic Congress, and this sad event occurred after they had come together in London, expecting to spend part of the summer abroad.

The following appreciative words in the Boston Evening Transcript are an editorial conception of Dr. Stuckenberg's relation to the outside world:

"The sudden death of Professor J. H. W. Stuckenberg in London will cause mourning among a circle of friends, not large, but select, which knew him as a fine exponent of German-Americanism at its best. Conversant with a wide realm of human knowledge, and ever trying to co-ordinate it, profoundly in sympathy with all efforts to better man's social conditions and individual spiritual welfare, a most charming host who, together with his wife, made many American students in Berlin and in Cambridge understand what Christian hospitality means, a helper of clergymen of all denominations by his regular contributions to the Homiletic Review, and an author of thoughtful, valuable works on social science—his premature death makes a gap not easily filled. Many are the men and women scattered over the land, now holding responsible positions as teachers or artists, to whom the home of Professor and Mrs. Stuckenberg, while they were in charge of the American Church in Berlin, was a Mecca where inspiration and consolation were ever to be found by the needy, homesick student."

To the inner circle privileged to know Professor and Mrs. Stuckenberg this loss is immeasurable. Your reporter writes from a comradeship with this noble pair of a quarter of a century, during which time they have been an unfailing inspiration. Like Frances E. Willard, Professor Stuckenberg was a lover of humanity, and in the student sense gave his life thereto. He was a faithful helper and comrade in the temperance work and his going means a vacancy in our great organization.

We close ranks and press forward.

Mrs. Blanks' Fine Work in Northern Louisiana.

Lury Gould Baldwin, Correspondent.

BALDWIN, La., June 12.—Mrs. Eugenia F. Blanks is state vice-president, and also state superintendent of Proportionate and Systematic Giving. She has attended every state convention and three National Conventions. Mrs. Blanks has been president of the local union for eleven years and has given time, money, and strenuous service for the cause of prohibition in Ouchita parish. She has an ideal home at Monroe where she dispenses a generous and comforting hospitality to the W. C. T. U. and all its workers. Mrs. Blanks' sisters, Mrs. Lily Blanks and Mrs. Annie Gooch, are also counted among our most efficient workers. The three women are all consecrated Christians and eternity alone can reveal their blessed influence in northern Louisiana.

MRS. E. F. BLANKS.

The Monroe union, by systematic giving at their regular meetings, secures a fund for local work. They are thus enabled to maintain a bed in the city hospital, buy department literature for distribution and meet other demands on the organization. The treasury is reimbursed from $1 to $3 every meeting.

RACE SUICIDE.

By Mary E. Teats.

LORD BACON in his essay on books said: "Read not to contradict, or to take for granted; nor yet to find talk or discussion, but to weigh and consider!"

It would be well for President Roosevelt, Dr. Shrady, and others to "weigh well" and "consider" the part that alcohol and tobacco play in this question of "Race Suicide" before laying all the responsibility of "small families" at the door of woman. Let these good people, in the light of reason, justice, and love, consider the following facts, gleaned from reliable sources:

"An English specialist carefully noted twelve abstaining families and twelve drinking families for twelve years. The drinking families produced fifty-seven children, of whom twenty-five died the first week; three died of convulsions, two were idiots, five dwarfs, five epileptics, one had chorea, five were deformed, two became drunkards, and only ten were normal.

"The twelve total abstaining families produced sixty-one children, of whom only six died the first week; four had curable diseases, two showed inherited nervous defects, and fifty were normal."

Consider well the death rate in the drinking and the total-abstaining families.

"Careful estimates, both in Europe and America, indicate that eighty-two per cent of the children born of drinking parents die before they are two years old!" Statistics tell us that "seventy per cent of the outcast girls of this country are born of drinking parents," also, "that every twenty-four hours there are committed in the United States twenty-eight murders and twenty-two suicides." The courts and other sources tell us that the liquor traffic is responsible for ninety per cent of the crime committed in our country, but putting it at the very conservative figure of seventy-five per cent, in the light of the foregoing facts, I would ask every thinking man and woman to "weigh and consider" the effects of alcohol and tobacco in their relation to infantile mortality, and what part the legalized liquor traffic plays in the blood-curdling spectacle of murder and suicide; also, the fact that the legalized liquor traffic is not the creature of woman, but of man the voter. Let them then ask themselves the question, Is it just to lay all the responsibility of "race suicide'" at the door of American womanhood?

Darwin says, "It is remarkable that all the evils coming from alcoholism pass from father to son, even to the third generation, becoming worse if the use of alcoholism is continued, until the result is 'sterility!'" Who consumes the bulk of alcohol in this country, man or woman? If the former, then is not man partly responsible for the prevailing "sterility?"

The spirit of true patriotism is strong in true American womanhood, and when our country calls for our bravest and best—our boys—we are willing to press them to our hearts and, with a good-bye kiss, bid them go to death, if need be, at their country's call; but I voice the sentiments of the womanhood of this country when I say that we are not willing to have 250,000 legalized saloons to debauch, degrade, and eventually to destroy our boys and girls.

Miss Willard said she hoped "the black wagon of Paris would never find place in America." When I read that France was offering "prizes" for large families, I said, "I hope those low ideals of parentage will never find place in America." To my surprise, I read that Pennsylvania has a bill before the legislature "subsidizing large families and providing gold medals for the mothers!" Is it possible that the spirit of commercialism has so stultified public conscience that the holy office of motherhood is to be prostituted to the low level of merchandise? Would it not be more in harmony with Christian civilization to see to it that our young people are properly and sacredly instructed regarding the responsibility of parentage, the science of life, and the laws of heredity and prenatal influences?

Plato aimed to establish an "ideal republic" by the production of the highest possible type of child-life, but, ignoring marriage, he failed. We are insisting on marriage, but with little thought of the "rights of the child to be well born," hence we find some of our legislatures being obliged to withdraw portions of "appropriations" for educational purposes and applying the same for the care of the incorrigibles, the insane, blind, deaf-mutes, and the millions of "perverts" and "inefficients" that have been cursed into existence, robbed of their divine right.

"My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge." God dare not clamor for quantity, but He is exceedingly anxious as to quality. This should be the Christian attitude with reference to this question of "race suicide."

Let us cease robbing God's humanity of a clean, wholesome birthright by the proper instruction of our young people before marriage, by the utter annihilation of the liquor traffic and the use of tobacco, by the emancipation of motherhood ("a subjected motherhood can never give to the world the best results in child-life"), and by eliminating as rapidly as possible the false delicacy that clusters about the sacred and holy theme of parentage, substituting the word "sacred" for "shame."

The first step to be taken toward these desired results is to outlaw the liquor traffic and wipe out this foul blot from our otherwise fair land. May God speed the day when these things shall be, for then, and not until then, will the problem of "race suicide" be solved.

The Girl Who Works.

By James Buckham.

THOSE of us who have reached middle age can recall the time when it was looked upon as a misfortune, if not a slight disgrace, for an American girl of good family to be obliged to turn her hand to any kind of money-making employment. This sentiment, however, belonged to the days preceding what we are accustomed to call "the emancipation of woman," and in the light of a larger knowledge and better understanding of social economics it already appears mistaken and absurd. We may rightly count it among the obsolete prejudices of a period which seems to have been peculiarly conservative because transitional; for it is a striking fact that all transitional periods are periods of emphasized and almost fanatical conservatism.

As soon, however, as the larger relations of woman to our multiplex modern civilization were clearly set forth and began to be practically demonstrated, this old prejudice faded rapidly and entirely away, until at the present time we find so complete a revolution of sentiment on the subject that the girl who works is held in higher esteem than the girl who lives in mere genteel idleness.

The healthfully stimulating effect of this change of sentiment, this rectification of popular sentiment, upon woman's mental expansion and economic usefulness is increasingly evident. The girl who works is taking, every year, a larger and more important place in the educational, industrial, artistic, and commercial life of the American people. There are certain things for which she is, admittedly, better adapted and equipped by nature than is man; and as her training for such functions gradually grows finer and surer, we find her becoming the acknowledged and unequalled expert whose services are worth, and may command, a premium.

This demonstration of the high economic value of woman's expert labor as a factor in our intense modern life, opens a vista of possibility to the girl of today which was not possible to former generations. Two considerations that are highly inspiring and stimulating combine at the present time to urge young women into the active arena of public service. One is, as I have pointed out, the ever increasing respect and regard of the community at large for the girl who works, who devotes herself to any form of honest and reputable service. The other is the fact that the world is calling in terms of economic preferment and financial reward for the service of women in those branches of art and science and manual dexterity wherein she naturally excels. It has come to the point that, instead of being a questionable thing, even a reproach, for a young woman to go out from her domestic seclusion and from the protection of home to take her part in the active work of the world, it is a duty and an honor for her so to act, when other obligations do not impose a prior and more imperative claim.

There is a growing conviction among the most intelligent of her sex that woman is being called to a decidedly larger place in the industrial and esthetic life of the community than she has hitherto availed herself of; and this conviction is supported by one equally strong and sensible, that in no way does the life of industrial service interfere with a woman's chances for final domestic happiness or unfit her for taking up later in life, if she choose, the noble and all-engrossing functions of wife and mother. The girl who begins life by working does not forfeit or in any degree lessen her chances for matrimony and a happy home life.

The girl who works, and who preserves her refinement and character and self-respect in all the associations of life, stands no less a chance of winning a good husband than does the girl who holds herself aloof from the world's toilers in their most serious and strenuous hours.

There is no longer any reproach in this life of labor—nor was there ever any reproach save that of a mistaken and blinded prejudice. The world of today urgently needs and calls for the girl who is willing to devote her bright, quick brain, her natural refinement and graces of mind and character, her artistic equipment and training, her quick apprehension and facile fingers, to the growingly complicated work of shop and school and factory and office. If she will accept the call, she will be received with the highest respect and most appreciative consideration, and the way will be opened to her more and more broadly for all possible promotion that true womanhood can desire.

By Cordelia A. Greene, M. D.

IN the year 1850, while I was studying medicine with my father and assisting him in his professional work, the wife of a well known and esteemed pastor, the mother of two children, was brought to our home and placed in my father's care. Although a most interesting patient, she was under a sad thralldom—which for nearly six years had grown more hopeless and hapless—that of an alcohol and opium habitue.

The disordered habit begun during a somewhat prolonged illness, was voluntarily continued, as in all like cases, for the seductive, soothing effects experienced. The actual physical result was the benumbing and undermining of the nerve centers controlling sentient and organic life. The patient's dim sense of her real condition, lack of power to bear even ordinary suffering, enfeebled will, and weakened moral perception, were all sad features of her case, as also were her nervous distress and piteous cries for the beloved solace. The prolonged severe struggle for mastery, her evident recovery, and later her return to the twofold bondage and the blight upon the home—which but for this would have been happy and prosperous—made a profound impression upon me.

During a constant and laborious medical practice of nearly half a century, I have had the care of many patients, principally women, who were subjects of the alcohol or opium disease. My experience has unmistakably proved the wisdom of the decision I made for them and for myself—that it is better to suffer much, rather than allow the nervous system to become subject to the deceptive, subjugating power of any form of opium or alcoholics.

Opium and alcohol are found in many of the patent medicines so highly recommended for debility and digestive disorders. Those who depend upon the patent and proprietary medicines—headache powders, tablets and tonics—are running a foolish and dangerous risk.

Every effort should be made by the physician, the scientist, the teacher and the humanitarian to prevent education into the alcohol and opium diseases which are as devastating and as needless as those that all science calls us to quarantine and stamp out forever.

The pitiable condition of the poor opium victim is well known; but the blight upon the moderate user of the best wines and alcoholics is more subtle, more destructive to posterity. Opium, after a time, with both men and women, destroys the power of parentage; while alcoholics, from their earliest limited use, produce an unnatural, unreasoning activity of the sources of life.

I have never administered them to any of my children, even in severe illness, and they are now of adult age.

Old Anchors Ashore.

Signs of wild scenes, awe-fraught beyond reality,

National Organizers.

Mrs. Addie Northam Fields.

MRS. ADDIE NORTHAM FIELDS is one of the organizers in the National W. C. T. U. who has won for herself the distinctive title of "Always Reliable." Her ability and her work have been tested in many fields, and in none has she done other than faithful, efficient service. As an organizer at home, in Bermuda, Nova Scotia, Cuba, and Mexico, and as special L. T. L. worker in Great Britain, she has come to be known to a wide circle of white-ribbon friends, all of whom give the same testimony of her unselfish, self-sacrificing, self-effacing work.

MRS. NELLE G. BURGER.

MISS LOUISE E. HOLLISTER.

MRS. CALLIE H. HOWE.

Mrs. Fields was born September 20, 1857, on a farm in the town of Warren, Ill., where she lived till grown, and which has been her family home ever since. Her first work was in the school-room, which she entered at the age of seventeen, and which she left only to take charge of the State L. T. L. of Illinois. This position she held for five years, and then, for a time, was vice-president of Indiana. Still later, while residing in Paducah, Ky., she built up a strong union in that place which has done efficient work and has provided several workers for the state. She also helped to found a Home for the Friendless which has ever since done good service. A little later Mrs. Fields was made state superintendent of the L. T. L. of New Hampshire, going from there to England in 1894, where she organized the British L. T. L. which is now doing such magnificent work under the efficient leadership of Miss Edith Wilson.

For three years Mrs. Fields had charge of our work at the Chautauqua (New York) Assembly, winning many friends both to herself and to our cause. To Mrs. Fields belongs the credit and honor of having organized the W. C. T. U. of Bermuda, and also of having followed Mrs. Barney's visit with the formal organization of Cuba.

Her work for the last two years in Mexico sounds almost like a fairy tale. The president of the nation and the governors of the states accord her everywhere substantial aid. Mrs. Fields' method of work in Mexico has been largely thru the school children and she has found a wonderfully quick and helpful response from the educators of the nation and from the government officials as well. She has mastered the Spanish language to the extent of being able to speak without an interpreter, and the press of the country is loud in its praise of her work. She has organized many unions and many L. T. L,'s, and will doubtless remain in sunny Mexico until the National Union shall be organized.

MRS. ADDIE NORTHAM FIELDS.

MRS. HELEN L. BULLOCK.

MRS. L. E. BAILEY.

Mrs. Helen L. Bullock.

MRS. HELEN L. BULLOCK followed her profession of instructor in music until 1886, when she was appointed organizer and lecturer for the W. C. T. U. In 1897 Frances E. Willard writes of her in THE UNION SIGNAL: "A successful music teacher, consecrated local union president, diligent state organizer, and prize National organizer, entering every open door and winning laurels in every field she enters, —this, in epitome, is the history of the work of Helen L. Bullock."

Mrs. Bullock has been almost constantly in the field since 1897, traveling some years 15,000 miles and winning success in every department of the work. Rescue work has also claimed a large share of her attention, as evidenced by the Anchorage, a home for homeless and erring girls, established at Elmira, N. Y., in 1890. She has been president of its board of managers since it was founded.

At the National Convention of the W. C. T. U. held at St. Paul, Minn., in 1899 she was appointed National superintendent of Purity in place of Dr. Mary Wood-Allen, who had resigned because of ill health. This department carries with it the supervision of Mothers' Meeting, White Ribbon Cradle Roll, White Cross work for men, White Shield work for women, Public School Branch and Reform Legislation. The wisdom and intelligence with which she has carried on this most delicate and difficult department of work so gained the confidence of Dr. Mary Wood-Allen, who is superintendent of Purity in the World's W. C. T. U., that she invited Mrs. Bullock to represent her at Geneva, Switzerland, and take charge of her conferences. Mrs. Bullock is now in Switzerland for this purpose and for a brief period of well-earned rest. Truly, as Miss Willard said of her, "There are wider fields and pastures new before this beloved worker, in whom all our hearts do safely trust."

Mrs. L. E. Bailey.

MRS. L. E. BAILEY was born in Battle Creek, Mich., January 21, 1851. Her father, Thomas Dunton, was a native of Scotland, and her mother of Vermont. Both parents possessed sterling traits of character, honesty, and moral worth. Her mother was especially gifted with rare intelligence. Mrs Bailey while a mere child developed the gift of writing poems and prose for the newspapers and to be read at public gatherings. Before the organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union she began lecturing upon the temperance question, and has since been almost constantly before the public, speaking upon temperance and kindred reform subjects as well as giving literary lectures. She lectured for several years under the auspices of the Prohibition party, and also for the Good Templars and the W. C. T. U. She has been a member of the former since she was thirteen years old and of the latter since its organization. Mrs. Bailey could have made her mark as a literary writer had she not felt it her duty to proclaim the gospel of temperance. She is also an ardent advocate of equal suffrage, and in her temperance speeches she does not fail to blend the two reforms. No speaker is more constantly in demand. She is continually in the field, and she has calls from many states which she cannot fill. She is a very pleasing speaker and a successful organizer as well as a good financier. Her photograph and a biographical sketch were published in "The Voice Album" a few years ago as one of the one hundred best speakers of the United States. "The Women of the Century," "Prohibition Leaders," and several other books contain a sketch of her life. Mrs. Bailey is at present actively at work under the auspices of the National W. C. T. U., of which she is an authorized organizer and lecturer.

Mrs. Lucia Faxon Additon.

MRS. LUCIA FAXON ADDITON has for nineteen years been one of the foremost leaders in the W. C. T. U. of Oregon, filling many prominent offices, among them that of state organizer and lecturer. She is thoroly conversant with all lines of W. C. T. U. work, and as a specialist in the labor department she has made a deep and exhaustive study of social economics. Few are more competent to speak or write upon this subject. Possessed of a master mind, keen intellect, forceful logic, she is recognized as a leader in the reform work of today. Mrs. Additon is far-sighted and practical in her plans, and her methods have brought repeated success to her co-workers in the many departments of the W. C. T. U. As an organizer Mrs. Additon excels, her cheerful personality enabling her to lend encouragement both to individual worker and from the platform. As a public speaker she is logical and eloquent, always holding the closest attention of her audiences. A deep spirituality characterizes all of her writings, and her consecrated pen has rendered most valuable service to the W. C. T. U. of Oregon and to our cause in general.

A true philanthropist, her mother heart especially warms toward homeless girls, and many such have found homes under her hospitable roof. This love for young women induced her to found the Noon Rest for the working girls of Portland, Oregon.

Miss Louise E. Hollister.

MISS LOUISE E. HOLLISTER'S training for W. C. T. U. work began in 1886 when she was elected first president of the Duluth Y. During the ten years of the existence of this Y she held the office of president repeatedly. She also conducted physical culture classes and served as county superintendent of the Sunday-school department. The responsibility of furnishing a leader for the L. T. L. was so impressed upon her mind that failing to secure anyone else she resigned the Y presidency and her large class of young men in the Sunday-school and, while busily teaching large classes in mathematics in the high school, succeeded in organizing and maintaining eight companies of the Legion in the churches.

In the fall of 1896 Miss Hollister took the two state departments of Loyal Temperance Legion and Physical Culture, removing her residence to Minneapolis. Next year the Y Branch was added to her responsibilities, and she was started out as state organizer, a position held until the present year. The next step was to the state vice-presidency. Her name appeared first upon the list of National organizers at the Washington convention. Because of her work as state secretary of the Y and L. T. L. the National secretaries of the branches have chosen her to rank among their associates.

Mrs. Nelle G. Burger.

MRS. NELLE G. BURGER is one of the most brilliant and effective of W. C. T. U. workers. She is the wife of Mr. Charles A. Burger, of Clark, Mo., and has found in him a faithful helpmeet in her work. Mrs. Burger entered the W. C. T. U. work as president of a local union. It proved the preparatory department for broader fields of usefulness. She possesses qualifications necessary to the highest attainments in presenting the grand principles of Christian temperance to a land cursed by the baneful influence of the liquor traffic, the traffic in human souls. Where doors are opened, she enters; where she finds them closed, and sometimes tightly barred, her bright intellect, profound judgment, and persuasive manner prove the key to unlock, and she enters and captures the field for God and for the home. She is a wonderfully eloquent woman, and is in constant demand, and her audiences, which frequently number up into the thousands, sit spellbound under the magnetic influence of her modest, gentle demeanor and forceful, convincing arguments, and her efforts are bearing fruit an hundred fold. Today she stands in the front ranks of white-ribboners, loved, trusted, honored by all.

MRS. LUCIA FAXON ADDITON.

Mrs. Callie H. Howe.

MRS. CALLIE H. HOWE joined the W. C. T. U. at St. Joseph, Mo., about fifteen years ago, and she at once began active service as corresponding secretary of the Central union, afterwards serving for two years as district treasurer. She found the district several hundred dollars in debt, and her efforts in its behalf was the beginning of the financial schooling which has everywhere made her famous as a collector. Where other lecturers have failed repeatedly to make expenses Mrs. Howe has not only made expenses but has almost invariably added to the local treasury besides. She held the office of district president for several years and in 1893 she was made a state organizer in Missouri, attaining to the honor of National lecturer and organizer at the St. Louis National Convention. She has grown steadily in favor and ability, and now ranks with the very ablest of our platform speakers, being much sought after by Chautauquas and summer assemblies. She was a delegate from Missouri to the World's Convention at Toronto, Canada.

Mrs. Howe's success is phenomenal, her rapid growth being a constant surprise to even her nearest friends. She is a bright, energetic young woman who readily grasps her environment and heartily enters into the accomplishment of any forward movement along the lines of reform. It is characteristic of her that she can travel many times over the same territory with ever increasing success.

Chapter XVI.

HUGH smiled bitterly as he picked his way down the rough, uneven road. To a certain extent even Miss Smith believed in him. How little they all knew! Well, the greatest mercy he dared ask for himself was that they might never know. Miss Smith watched him out of her sight in the comfortable assurance that he was on the way to fulfill her behest. As a matter of fact she had scarcely closed her door before he turned in the direction of a group of outlying cottages. Before that important business, which he meditated, called him away from Pitsmoor he meant to know how it fared with the two who were newly pledged.

But long before he reached the cottages, as he came within sight of Enoch's pit, he saw a crowd collected around its mouth, and quickened his steps.

As he drew nearer he was met by a little lad who, pale with terror, was crying as he ran. He barely stopped to answer Hugh's rapid question.

His father? Why, it was Sellers! The most notorious of the odd dozen; the one real reprobate of the band. God forbid that Sellers should be cut off like that! Already the lad was far on his way to carry the news home, and Hugh was running his hardest towards the pit. The crowd was rapidly increasing, but a path was rapidly made for him as he pushed his way to the front. Numbers of poor fellows had already been rescued, bruised and exhausted. With them Dr. Mann and a band of willing helpers were busy in the shed, while at the pit's mouth men whose rugged faces showed pallid thru the grime were awaiting the results of the pumping operations, and from time to time shouting words of feigned encouragement and hope which might perchance reach the ears of the unhappy man below.

"It aren't no manner o' use, sir," said one of these in a hoarse whisper to Hugh. "He's a donen, that's about what he is. T' watter's comin' in faster nor they can pump it out."

Nevertheless the speaker went off to take his turn at the pumps, while half a dozen excited onlookers poured out incoherent details of the disaster. An unfortunate blow from a collier's pick had tapped an old working, and at a moment's notice a huge volume of water rushed into the pit. Instant alarm had been given and the greater number of those in the workings had escaped practically unhurt; others had been rescued and brought to the surface, suffering chiefly from shock and a wetting, but Sellers had been quickly shut off in a distant corner of the pit.

"You know that end bit, the clearin' where you was speakin' that day when you and the ladies went down. It's thereabouts that he's supposed to be. Some of his mates as can swim has made fower different attempts to reach him. Once they got nigh enough to hear 'un cryin' to 'em for God's sake to hurry or he couldn't hold out till they comed; but each time they tries it their candles gets put out; and what with them projections, and floatin' wreckage, they've got knocked about somethin' cruel. The last to give it oop was hardlins able to get back to the cage. Mann's tendin' to 'em now. T' water's not so far from the roof by now, and I doubt it's all oop wi' poor Billy. Hearken to him! That'll be him sure enough, poor soul!"

Hugh shuddered, for something resembling the faint, forlorn cry of an agonized creature wailed through the momentary silence.

"If that's him he's most done," said the miner critically. "T' watter 'll be creepin' upwards, choose where he's took refuge; and he's no swimmer. God have mercy on his soul!"

Hugh's face was colorless as, turning to the crowd, he tore off his coat.

"Is there a strong fellow among you who knows the pit and can swim?"

With a low cry a woman at the edge of the crowd darted unnoticed into the shed and seized on Dr. Mann.

"Bob, it's sheer madness! You must come and forbid it. He means to go down!"

"Hold on," said the doctor imperturbably. "Who means to go down?"

"Mr. Brotherton. It's madness! What can he do? You shall stop it, Bob!"

They were in the crowd now, and another voice was vigorously protesting:

"For God's sake, sir, don't undertake no such rashness. Haven't I told ye that men as knows every yeard of the pit have tried and better tried? Don't 'ee now; for any sake, don't 'ee, sir!"

"Men, there's a mate of yours and mine down there, drowning, and I can swim—a little," and he laughed reassuringly. "Who will volunteer to go down with me and make one last attempt to save him?"

Mrs. Langley burst into tears, as did many another woman.

"Bob!"

"Hold on," repeated Dr. Mann more gently, with his eyes on Hugh's face. "It may be the best day's work he ever did."

But even as he spoke he turned abruptly back into the shed, for his eyes had encountered those of Rose Glyn fixed imploringly upon him. It all happened in the brief, breathless pause that was followed by a stir at the back of the crowd, as a brawny young collier elbowed his way stolidly to Hugh's side. It was Sam Widgery, but Hugh neither betrayed, nor felt, any surprise.

"You can swim?" he asked briefly, and, as briefly, Sam nodded.

"It's a fule's errand, but if we mun go there's no time to lose, I'm thinkin'," and he turned towards the cage.

"Sam, Sam! and you drunk no further back than last night! Have a thought for your poor soul?" screamed a shrill voice.

"That's just what I amn't thinkin' on, or maybe I shouldn't be so forrard to go, missis," grinned Sam in reply.

Anxious veterans had rapidly made preparations for the desperate enterprise, and with a light breaking over his face Hugh stepped into the cage and grasped his companion's hand.

"Lord," he said fervently, "it isn't that we are careless as to our past, but just now our business is to save another man's life. Do Thou look after our souls!"

The burst of "Amens" was followed by a ringing cheer from the younger men, but John Broadbent lifted a quavering voice.

"Friends, my mind misgives me concernin' one o' them young men. Happen we hav'n't done all as we might ha' done to bring him to a better mind, but neither he nor t'other dear young man has gone beyond the reach of our prayers. Let us pray."

Thus was inaugurated the impromptu prayer meeting that was maintained unceasingly during a weary period of suspense and foreboding.

After ensuring a supply of dry blankets and beef tea Dr. Mann joined the watchers at the pit's mouth. Moment by moment the crowd grew more dense and the general sense of anxiety deepened visibly. Oddly mingled with the petitions that with every dragging moment grew more importunate, broken scraps of comment and distress reached the taciturn doctor's ears.

"Good Lord, what'll coom of us if Thou takes him away?" pleaded Enoch, who had hastened to the pit's mouth on hearing the terrible news, while at the same moment a querulous female voice denounced Hugh's disinterested act as an "owdacious" tempting of Providence on the part of all concerned. Why had the Almighty in His wisdom caused miners to be trained to the work if a mere inexperienced lad was to step in and do the work they had failed to do? "And him," here the voice broke, "looking noways fit to be out of his bed." Another female voice in injured tones opined that Mr. Brotherton was too good for the world; it was always his sort that was taken first.

With a queer, inexplicable smile upon his face the doctor turned as a hand was laid upon his arm.

"How long they have been down! Can they possibly come back alive, Bob?"

The doctor glanced from one white face to the other—his sister's and Rose Glyn's.

"I hope so; with luck, if they keep their heads. That is, if they have any qualification beyond foolhardiness for their job."

He spoke all the more roughly because of the pain that clutched at his heart at the sight of Rose Glyn's face; but his mood changed again.

"You had better go, both of you, and sit down in the shed. I'll let you know if anything happens."

But without appearing to notice the fact he knew that they only shrank a little into the rear, and stood side by side. He fancied that Mrs. Langley had taken Rose's hand. A little later Mr. and Mrs. Boyd, who had been absent in Milborough, hurried anxiously to the spot.

Apparently he did but share the general misgiving; for by degrees a deep, strained silence had fallen upon the anxious crowd.

Now and again a resounding "Halloo!" was shouted into the pit's mouth, and always one or another was certain that he heard a far-off answering cry.

Yet the doubt and fear grew on every face. As if with one consent the women gave up the struggle for composure and sobbed and sobbed aloud.

Sellers' fate had been sufficiently awful, but to think of the additional sacrifice of those two young lives! Hugh's memory was already as the memory of a saint, and even Sam Widgery, it was remembered, had his better side. From the day on which he began to draw wages he had been good to his bedridden granny, and who had she to look to now? Not Sam's father, her besotted son, who, being safe above ground, had no good word from his fellow men.

Suspense was fast becoming despair when an excited stir among those nearest to the cage showed that some fresh development was at hand. Those in the background heard the foremost calling cheerily down the shaft; but alas! they called again, and yet again, and the listening doubt upon their faces showed that they waited in vain for a reply. Presently the word went around that they were drawing up the cage, and in those awful moments of suspense more than one woman fainted quietly away. A terrible silence fell upon the waiting crowd, and faces that had been pale before grew ghastly with unspoken dread. A few more tense moments, and those who could hope to get the first sight of the ascending cage craned their necks forward. Then suddenly a hoarse shout went up. All three were here! Thank God! living or dead, all were here once more. "Bravo! Bravo! Hip, hip, hip, hurrah!" Rough men shook each other by the hand and laughed aloud with the tears streaming down their cheeks; then, with a catch of the breath, fell silent again. Smothered in filth from head to foot, and barely conscious, the three men were tenderly lifted in strong, rough arms and borne quickly to the shed. By Dr. Mann's orders all but Mr. Boyd and the bearers were peremptorily shut out. A very few minutes, however, elapsed before the vicar reappeared.

"All are living, thank God! and, according to the doctor, likely to live. So far he finds no injuries more serious than shock and bruises; and in Mr. Brotherton's case a scalp wound. Will someone run to the forge for the cab?"

A dozen eager voices replied:

As a matter of fact the manager had already reached the crowd about the shed, and was listening to a dozen incoherent accounts of the accident. He was at once admitted, and in his own name, and in the name of the company, warmly thanked the rescuers.

"What's all the row about?" asked Hugh confusedly. "Oh, I remember. Did we manage it? I thought it was all over with us."

It was Dr. Mann who replied:

"Manage it? Rather! If he does but keep himself sober the old boy will be little the worse in a day or two."

Hugh shivered.

"And Widgery?"

"Doing famously. Bear a hand, Halsham, will you?"

As he firmly grasped the broad shoulders Dr. Mann nodded towards Hugh's blanket-wrapped feet; but before the manager had time to obey a young miner was glowing with pride at having secured to himself the honor of helping to carry the hero of the day to the waiting cab.

"Hurry up!" muttered the doctor as at first sight of the prostrate form a roar of greeting went up: but even he did not grudge Hugh his ovation. Perhaps he grudged it the less because of Hugh's heartfelt murmur of relief as they laid him in a warmed bed.

"Thank God, I'm thru with that, anyway!"

"Ay; they used their lungs, didn't they? But we're quit of them now. They're off to do as much for Widgery."

"Sam was a brick," said Hugh drowsily.

In another moment he was asleep. That, briefly, was the sum of what they extracted from him with reference to his experiences in the pit. A more graphic account of the search and its results was given to the doctor by Sam.

"I thought it a fule's errand at the start. I did, I tell ye; but I thought it all the more when we had to take to that mooky watter. I doubt if I should ha' turned tail that minute if Mr. Brotherton hadn't made me laugh i' my inside.

"'Lor'-a-massy,' I says in a sort o' fright, 'what fools we be!' 'Right you are, Sam,' says he, grimlike, 'two young fools a-goin' to resky an old one.' If I'd been drownin' there an' then I think I'd have had to laugh to hear him say it so earnestlike.

"Well, once in we didn't get on so bad till our lights went out. Then we had a bad time, I tell ye; and what wi' knocks and bruises, and the fearsomeness o' struggling thru that stinkin' watter under ground, I should ha' gi'en oop over and over again if it hadn't ha' been for the parson. He's a game 'un, he is."

For the moment Sam seemed to be on the point of losing himself in thought, but a fresh recollection started him off again.

"'Cheer up, Sam,' he says, 'we're neither of us such great shakes that they can't do wi'out us overhead wi'out bein' much the worse for their loss. If we must die, we shall die like men. That'll be something for the fathers and mothers of us to know. We are goin' to show ourselves men, Sam. We're goin' to show, please God, that after all we're men.' He kept all on mutterin' things like that, like as if

Conducted by Mrs. Helen G. Rice, General Secretary.

Notes.

1. Earnest attention which will result in doing something, is asked for the very important communication on this page from our Director of L. T. L. Extension Fund. The article has been unavoidably delayed, but Mrs. Straw has been in correspondence with the various states, some of which are already at work for their respective mission fields.

2. THE YOUNG CRUSADER, which we have learned to value and to love, is henceforth to be issued as THE CRUSADER MONTHLY. While it will contain some new features, it will preserve the characteristics of the old friend, and loyalty to the L. T. L. demands that we give to it more hearty support than ever before. Each state has been asked to obtain a prescribed number of new subscribers, and we trust that each local Legion is planning to do its part toward the grand total of subscriptions.

3. Miss Margaret Wintringer gave April dates to Ohio field work, and the entire month of May to Minnesota. We know that means increased interest Legionward in those two sections of our great country.

4. From two of our National superintendents who have offered L. T. L. prizes, repeatedly announced, recent appeals have been received, urging the Legioners to help as much as possible in their respective departments. Mrs. Ella M. Thacher writes: "Very few comfort bags are coming in, and I need them badly. I have two hundred bags on hand without any filling. Oh! that the L. T. L.'s would send me needles, pins, thread, darning cotton, safety pins, court plaster, or money with which to buy these articles. I am almost heart-broken over being without these things, and more than two hundred pledged boys are waiting for them." Mrs. Thacher recently organized, during a trip in Delaware, four Legions, one of them a Senior. (See practical suggestion in article on July Red-Letter Days, on this page.) Mrs. H. T. Guild writes: "So far no effort has been made to win the (cash) prize offered to the state showing the greatest number of Legioners who have assisted in the work of fair and open-air meetings. Gospel services, enforcement of law, the suppression of gambling places, immoral exhibits, and kindred evils, would give the Seniors opportunity to put on record the practical side of the L. T. L. Junior exercises would interest the masses of people in our work; bring the children to the front when you want to win." Mrs. Guild desires that a special point be made of securing new members, for which purpose cards must be obtained from and returned to her, in order to count in this contest.

5. The Legion of Leicester, Mass., sends out a most attractive topic-card for regular meetings, naming for each meeting the Legioner who will have charge of the devotional service and of the résumé of current events. Special topics for the various meetings are: "The Door of My Lips," "Our Kitchen," "The Furnace," "The Blood," "Building and Repairing," "The Heart," "The Lungs and the Heart," "Mercy," Review.

6. Legion of Port Jervis, N. Y., consisting of Junior and Senior grades, carries out very systematically the plan of subdivision with platoons, with ensign and banker for each. These officers wear special badges marked with the name of the office and the number of the platoon. We are in receipt of an enthusiastic press notice of a recent entertainment given by this Legion, which netted upwards of $50.

7. L. T. L. news from the field is most encouraging:

New Hampshire: Warner has a Senior Legion named for the state president, Mrs. Ellen R. Richardson, whose members are studying for diplomas. Rochester Seniors are also working for diplomas. Dover Legion, whose successful entertainments of various kinds have been previously mentioned in this page, numbers 138 members. The general L. T. L. secretary of New Hampshire has been invited to organize a Legion in the state Industrial School, and plans are under way for a Legion at the Orphans' Home in Franklin.

Indian Territory: The president writes after special inquiries as to L. T. L. dues and representation: "We are working for Legions in every town where we have a union. We have some good Legions. I am urging the women to greater work with the boys and girls. We of Indian Territory must educate our future citizens to vote as they pray."

July L. T. L. Red Letter Days.

JULY 21, the anniversary of our Anna Gordon's birth, designated as L. T. L. Membership Day, will be commemorated by a special L. T. L. number of THE UNION SIGNAL. This will be issued the first week in July, that Legions will have time to prepare the program for the celebration on July 21 which will appear in this number. Watch THE UNION SIGNAL for the price of this special number, singly and in quantity, and send in orders early. Mrs. Mary D. Tomlinson, 212 La Grande avenue, Plainfield, N. J., has just brought out a biography of Miss Gordon in booklet form, which will make an admirable souvenir for this birthday celebration. Order from Mrs. Tomlinson at 10 cents per copy. An extra two-cent stamp will bring you her admirable leaflet, "To Hold and To Gain." A very practical and helpful turn may be given to this celebration, and one which would surely delight Miss Gordon, by sending notice far and wide that each one attending is asked to bring some article for a comfort bag (see list in note 4 on this page), these contributions to be forwarded to Mrs. Thacher.

Campaign Work.

IN the recent campaign in New Hampshire, which resulted in the loss of the prohibitory law and the bringing in of license, the W. C. T. U. of Dover, assisted by the L. T. L., distributed thruout the city a most telling leaflet, upon which was the picture of a beautiful boy and the words "Please protect us by voting No License." The Senior Legioners were offered a prize for the best essay on "Why Vote No Saloon." All the essays were capital. The one which secured the prize is given below:

"Why Vote No Saloon?

"We do not want the saloon because it wants the boys to take the places of the old drunkards when they die. It spoils the homes and poisons the community. It makes beasts out of men, and causes three-fourths of the crimes of the United States. It increases the taxes and causes people to break the Sabbath. We have no place for the saloon. We do not want it near our churches or our homes. We do not want to have to pass by it when we are walking on the street. The money that is paid for alcoholic drinks in one year would purchase four barrels of flour for every person in the United States, and it would also pay for a five-years' course of education for 2,000,000 young men and women. The licensed saloon is making a hundred thousand drunkards annually.

"For these reasons and many others that might be named we do not want the saloon.

"ALBERT A. RAND."

National L. T. L. Extension Fund.

THE object of this fund is twofold: First, to aid with literature the Legions of the newer states and territories, especially in their work among the Indians and the work among the colored girls and boys of the Southern states. Second, to assist in planting Legions in the Philippines.

The specific work for this fund is: First, to raise money for sending THE CRUSADER MONTHLY into parts of our own land mentioned above; also, to send song books, manuals and other L. T. L. supplies which have already served their purpose and can be spared. Second, to contribute money or supplies for L. T. L. work in the Philippines.

As director of this Extension Fund I must have the co-operation of L. T. L. secretaries of both the receiving and the contributing states. All contributions of money, properly marked, should be sent to me. Supplies should be sent direct to their final destination in order to save postage. Addresses to which these may be sent can be obtained of me.

I will assign to each state, upon application, a special mission field, or its contributions may be applied to answering the specific calls which I am receiving. Among the calls now before me are: A request from Mrs. Addie N. Fields, Mexico, for thirty subscriptions to THE CRUSADER MONTHLY to be sent to Mexico; from the National superintendent of Work among Indians a list of subscriptions to be sent to teachers, and from another source a list to be sent to leaders of colored Legions.

Mission fields already assigned are: To Maine, Virginia (No. 2); to Massachusetts, Mexico; to New York, North Carolina (Thurman); to Pennsylvania, Alabama (No. 2); to Wisconsin, the Indian work of its own state; to Iowa, Florida; to Michigan, Indian Territory; to New Jersey, New Mexico; to New Hampshire, Georgia (No. 2); to Illinois, Oklahoma; to North Dakota, Tennessee (No. 2); to California, Arizona Indian work; to Frances E. Willard Legion of Knoxville, Tenn., the two mission schools of Chihuahua, Mexico.

Altho the needs of our own states are sufficient to tax our energies, let us not fail to broaden our outlook and enlarge our sympathies by doing what we can in the line of this National plan, thus exemplifying the spirit of our motto: "Lifting others as we climb." Twenty-five cents will send THE CRUSADER MONTHLY to do work for us for one whole year, a small amount of money for the large amount of good it will accomplish.

Director of L. T. L. Extension Fund.

The Calendar Plan.

THIS Calendar Plan was adopted last summer at the annual convention of the Pennsylvania L. T. L. in order to raise funds for the state treasury. Altho the returns are not yet in, we expect to realize about $450, assuming that every individual engaged in the work is doing his duty.

The plan is essentially a "chain" scheme, based on the calendar; but it has the advantage of not being "endless."

Briefly it is this: There is one person in charge who acts as the "year," and contributes one dollar. The "year" obtains twelve other persons to serve as months, and to contribute fifty cents each. Each month in turn secures four weeks, who pay twenty-five cents each; each week secures seven days to pay ten cents each, and, finally, each day secures twenty-four hours to pay five cents each. As the money is collected it is passed backward thru the chain till it eventually reaches the "year," the "days" being responsible to the "week" who secured their services, the "weeks" responsible to the "months," and the latter to the "year," in natural sequence.

The success of the plan depends upon the faithfulness of the individual. If a "day" prove delinquent the loss is $1.20; if a "week" the loss is $8.50; if a "month" the loss is $38.00. The importance and necessity of faithful workers is therefore apparent.

Of course the plan may be modified to suit varying circumstances, as it is not at all essential to adhere rigidly to the calendar as it is. In case not so much money as $450 is needed, the hours may be dropped and the number of months, weeks and days increased.

When the plan is to be used over such a limited area as a county affords it would indeed be advisable to let the "hours" go, since when they are used a total of more than 8,000 persons are engaged.

If I may be permitted to mention the matter here I should like to suggest to the Pennsylvania Legioners connected with the Calendar Plan inaugurated last June that the time to the next convention is becoming short, and that the money should soon be turned in.

NINE years ago Company B of the L. T. L. united with the Junior Christian Endeavor of the Memorial Church, Springfield, Mass., and it has since held its temperance meeting the third Sunday of each month. The company has its own leader, officers and committees, and the collection on this Sunday goes into the L. T. L. treasury. It is really a society within a society. The two societies have their election of officers at the same time, and their socials are held together. The attendance and results are much better than when we held the L. T. L. independently and the meeting on a week day, for we reach a greater number of children without crowding their time with meetings. At the L. T. L. meetings the pledge and temperance motto are repeated in concert, followed by recitations, singing and chalk talks, after which all take part by reciting verses or clippings.

The Attitude of Reform Organizations to Reforms Other Than Their Own.

IN common with other reform organizations, the W. C. T. U. has often found occasion to criticize severely the cowardice of political parties concerning reform movements. The criticism is just; but political parties are not the only sinners in this respect. Organizations making far more pretensions to lofty aims and disinterested motives, too often refuse to throw their influence on the side of some righteous but unpopular movement. The temptation to which the political party succumbs is, in fact, one of the most subtle and deceptive which assails our humanity, and it is not merely the selfish and the evil, but many of the well-meaning and conscientious, who are deceived thereby. We are apt to assume that the political partisan is influenced only by motives of selfish greed when he turns his back upon the struggle against the liquor power.

In many instances this is true. If it were true in all, or even in the great majority of cases, the problem would be a comparatively simple one; but in this, as in all contests for the right, the mistaken good people constitute the chief difficulty. There are voters, some of them professedly Christian, who are consciously faithless to duty; but there are many more who believe that the situation forces them to choose which of two good ends they must sacrifice in order to gain the other, and they honestly strive to preserve the greater good. They believe that to stand by both means the immediate loss of both. They fail to grasp the great underlying principle. They have not the faith which does right and leaves results with God.

The Republican party, for example, came into power on the wave of one of the greatest moral movements the world ever has known. It stood for the preservation of the nation and the emancipation of the slave. It deserved and commanded the allegiance of the moral strength of the nation. Too many within its ranks to-day care for its supremacy merely because that supremacy means their own personal aggrandizement. But there are multitudes of others, honest, loyal citizens, who believe that the party still stands for principles vital to the welfare of the nation. It is clear to all that the adoption of the temperance reform means the breaking up of the old party lines and the practical re-formation of parties around new issues. Beyond this they cannot see and dare not trust. To every one of us, as individuals and as members of organizations, such questions come.

In every community, in every church, in every organization, religious, social, or political, there are crises when men and women are called upon to stand for righteousness. It may be against some wrong custom fortified by usage, time, and prejudice; it may be against the evil-doer entrenched by position, wealth, or political influence. In any case, those who oppose the evil must do it at the risk of wealth, position, or even of their good name. How many stand the test? Only those who have gone thru such a struggle realize how little real bravery exists among all the well-meaning people around them. To one who has entered upon an attempt to purify the church or the community of some evil or evil-doer, this general cowardice is most disheartening. "With one accord," those whom you have trusted and believed in begin to "make excuse." Each and all promptly find that the matter is none of their business. They excuse themselves by representing that interests committed to their care will suffer if they take any part in the effort to overthrow evil, and, as it is outside of their own self-imposed line of work, it is their duty to take no part in it. And so, in multitudes of cases, evil triumphs.

When Daniel O'Connell first obtained a seat in the English Parliament a delegation of the pro-slavery party waited upon him and said: "O'Connell, at last you are in Parliament with one helper. If you will have nothing to do with Buxton and Brougham, here are thirty votes for you on every Irish question. If you have anything to do with the abolition movement, count us always against you." Not the unprincipled politician alone, but the really well-meaning man might plausibly have answered: "I can at the best do nothing for the negro. My one vote and one voice will not amount to anything for the cause, and I will not oppose it. I am not asked to do that. I will simply keep still on that subject, and when I have won the freedom of Ireland, then I will do what I can for this other oppressed people." But this man who had the faith in God which believes that He in very truth rules this world, and that he has no need to compromise with evil—the faith that overcomes the world—without one moment's hesitation replied: "Gentlemen, God knows I speak for the saddest people the sun shines upon; but may my right hand forget its cunning, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if to save Ireland—even Ireland—I forget the negro one single hour." To the worldly-wise politician, to the average Christian, O'Connell's position is "foolishness" and a "stumbling-block." It is nevertheless the only position which the follower of Jesus Christ has a right to take. It is indeed the narrow way, and "few there be that find it."

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union cannot escape the common test, and what is right for other organizations is also alone right for us. Our great Chieftain strove to anticipate this by allying our organization with every good movement as it arose. But new issues are constantly arising, and we cannot, without guilt, draw our skirts around us and pass by on the other side. We have seen clearly the duty of political parties in relation to the work which we have specially in hand. Let us be sure that we see with as clear and honest vision our own duty toward the movements for righteousness which lie outside our own special field of work.

Classifying a Crime.

THIS is an age of specialization. Every department of life, whether good or evil, is being subjected to a bewildering subdivision, confusing to the mind. In the not far distant past robbery was clearly defined in the minds of respectable people as the felonious taking of a man's money or goods, and that definition not only branded the offender as a criminal, but insured his conviction and punishment. It is different now-a-days. We still classify as criminal the ruder and more barbarous forms of lawlessness. The highwayman, the burglar, the holdup man and even the pickpocket we regard with unfeigned disapproval and horror, and realizing that their existence is a menace to society, we seek to put them where they cannot do harm.

It is at this point that the specializing process, applied to the criminal professions, appears to deceive the ordinary citizen. He fails to seriously recognize as crime other far more insidious forms of robbery which are conducted in up-to-date fashion; in sumptuously furnished club rooms, under the name of policy shops and other forms of popular gambling. Because this species of robber neither lurks in dark caves nor secretes himself in gloomy alley or cellar, but instead stands on well-lighted street corners, chatting with a stalwart policeman, well dressed, with a magnificent diamond flashing from his finger, another from his shirt bosom, a smile of invitation upon his face—in all particulars so unlike the robber of tradition—society is loath to look too curiously below the fine clothes and diamonds to discover his real identity.

Truly the analytical mind does discover between the two classes of criminals an elemental difference which threatens society with a far greater danger than did the Robin Hoods in the days when men dared not venture on the public highways without arms. The old-fashioned robber stole from a man his accumulated wealth that represented often days of toil, but he had the grace to leave the victim a free, honest man. He had not learned the art in which the robbers which infest our cities so excel, of stripping him, at the same time, of the best elements of his manhood, of depriving him not only of his purse but of his self-respect and honor and leaving him a moral pauper.

It is a sad comment on our civilization, and it is almost an admission that we as a nation have bowed down to the idol of material wealth, that we continue to esteem this form of manhood-robbery as less dangerous to society than a mere money-robbery; that we keep our detectives and our police hot upon the trail of the man who breaks into our house at night and takes a few paltry jewels, and yet permit, and even sanction by our abominable tolerance, those criminals who are robbing us of our choicest youth, the real wealth of the nation.

It is positively suicidal for a city to admit that it is unable to cope with the evil of public gambling or to enforce anti-gambling ordinances. Every moment of hesitation and inaction on the part of our city governments allows these men to secure a firmer hold; every day's delay in attempting to abolish the gambling hells marks the downfall of some young man.

A Unique Strike.

THE labor question has reached such proportions that people have ceased to be surprised when a strike is announced. In the history of strikes, however, that of the villagers of Arnold, Daybrook and Redhill in Notts, England, who have gone out on strike against a rise in the price of beer, rum, and gin, has certainly never had a counterpart.

This event proves conclusively that regular topers who declaim against reform and temperance, declaring that hard manual toil needs stimulants and that those accustomed to use strong drink daily cannot do without it, are equal to the occasion when voluntary abstinence takes the form of a strike.

The eccentricities of humanity are amusing, and when a body of men will combine to aid each other in resisting tempting tankards of foaming beer pressed upon them gratuitously on their way to work, surely their courage might be called into play for a better reason than to keep down the price of strong drink. For nearly two weeks the fight has been maintained. During that time this voluntarily abstemious band of men have eaten their dry bread and cheese without the elixir which has heretofore proved such a necessary adjunct.

This strike is great! In but a little while these men will find that the near proximity of the pump is good for more purposes than ducking traitors, and that its thirst-quenching properties are more refreshing than beer, rum, or gin. They will also find that with each day's abstinence the power of resistance has been increased and appetite weakened. We trust, therefore, that this strike may continue until the men realize that strong drink is not necessary; that by saving the money usually spent upon it, health and independence are more likely to be secured; and that in raising the prices of their wares the saloon-keepers have lost their customers now, henceforth, and forever.

Licensing the Opium Traffic.

WE trust our readers have read carefully, and with purpose, the letter from Rev. Homer C. Stuntz in last week's issue of THE UNION SIGNAL in regard to the shameful opium monopoly that is being planned for the Philippines, and also the earnest appeal of Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts in this week's issue for a world-wide war on the opium traffic.

Our contact with the degradation caused by the use of this drug has not been as general or as sensible as with that caused by the use of alcohol, because, for one reason, that it is not so prevalent in occidental countries as the other, and because, for another reason, it seeks seclusion. But, while not minimizing the evil effects of intoxicating liquors, we must admit that the effects of opium are more deadly. No drug has such a blighting effect upon its victims. The soddenness, the hopelessness, the irredeemableness of the debauched soul, mind, and body are beyond description.

That our government should, in cold-blooded greed, be guilty of legalizing and licensing this infamous traffic should fill every loyal American heart with indignation and dismay. Shall we who have assumed "the white man's burden" to this inferior (?) race emulate our English brothers in fastening upon the heathen the shackles of death? While they forced opium down the throats of the Chinese by the cannon ball, shall we debauch the Filipinos and our own soldiers by "act of parliament?"

The Plain Truth.

The need of women inspectors at all our ports of immigration has been demonstrated in numerous instances in years past by the shocking facts that have come to public knowledge concerning young women immigrants, ignorant of our language and customs, who have been lured to destruction by the human harpies who are always lying in wait for such victims. It is evident enough that under the regular system of immigrant inspection sufficient safeguards were not provided for this class of persons, and hence came the agitation for the appointment of the women. We are confident that a careful and unprejudiced review of the work performed by these inspectors during their brief term of service will convince the authorities at Washington that they ought to be reinstated at the earliest possible date, and such we hope will be the result.—Leslies' Weekly.

World's Convention News. The cable dispatches from Geneva announce a most successful convention and the re-election of our present corps of World's officers: President, Lady Henry Somerset, of England; vice president-at-large, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, of America; secretaries, Miss Agnes Slack, of England, and Miss Anna Gordon, of America; treasurer, Mrs. Mary Sanderson, of Canada; secretary of the Young Woman's Branch, Mrs. Clara Parrish-Wright; secretary of the L. T. L. Branch, Miss Anna Gordon, both of America. A full report of the convention will appear in an early issue of THE UNION SIGNAL.

Death of a Good Friend. A letter just received from Mrs. Stevens, dated "Geneva, June 2," brings the sad news of the death of Professor Stuckenberg, husband of our National superintendent of Temperance and Labor, Mrs. Mary G. Stuckenberg, in London, where he was studying in the British Museum. White ribboners in London, as well as our own delegates, are doing everything possible to comfort our sister in her great sorrow. The sympathy of all W. C. T. U. workers will go out to Mrs. Stuckenberg.

Flower Mission Day at Rose Hill. The Reiley Union, of Evanston, conducted a Flower Mission service at Rose Hill cemetery on June 9, decorating the graves of Miss Willard, Jessie Brown Hillon and Mrs. Carrie Franklin. Several white ribbon friends went out from the city to participate in the service and add their tributes of love to those laid upon the grave of the chieftain.

Special L. T. L. Number. THE UNION SIGNAL of July 2 will be our annual L. T. L. number. It will be characterized this year by special articles and pictures illustrating our world-wide work for children, as well as the reports of all our state secretaries. Orders for this number should be sent in at once. Price $2.25 per hundred.

Experience Corner.

COMRADES:—With the green and warmth of summer come somewhat different methods of "serving up" our temperance work. It is really the same bread of abstinence and prohibition and the same wine of life, but the dishes may well be adapted to the season, and we need not be afraid of Nature's adornments.

Somebody asks: "Is it well to discontinue our meetings for two months, as many churches do?" I think not. Nearly every woman in our unions is a volunteer—not a paid worker—and she is ready to work right on or to find a substitute if she must go to sleep a while. But diversify the meetings. Your parlor meetings may be called "rose socials" on somebody's lawn that is not too good for use, but just good enough to add diversion to the more severe study of winter. We are in such dead earnest, as we well may be, that the social side of us too often suffers eclipse. And that is the side we win people with, comrades.

Let no one tell all she knows at these meetings. Carefully choose a subject, and give the audience a taste only of some dainty tid-bit, so they will want more. Make them participants, if possible, at some time in the meeting; not only in the way of the simple, artistically-prepared literal luncheon, but with a song or two everybody knows and loves.

Have you tried making the union a flower mission in these beautiful Jennie Cassedy June days, and going to the poor farm or some neglected institutional charity? Have you taken along some really sweet-voiced singers and a pretty girl or two, and a baby in some mother's fond arms? Ah! try it! You will be wise enough to choose pretty girls who are sensible, and you will not permit anyone to kiss the baby; but the sight and the sound and the smell will linger long after you have forgotten that you sacrificed your desire for a fashionable function and went to the neglected instead.

J. G. Holland said the sense of smell recalls associations with more vividness than any other. Some old fellow who used to have a home will be taken down to the spring of his boyhood days, wafted upon the odor of a lavender leaf you have carried him, and the memories of a clean period in his life may do what no sermon has been able to do for him.

Some wayward girl, listening to the song of "The Green Things Growing," may see again the roses under the kitchen window where she and mother washed dishes together, and the song may awaken the old desire for a better life.

Disappointed old ladies, objects of the cold side of love we call "charity," may hold once more in their arms the babies that were long ago transplanted into celestial gardens thru seeing yours.

Oh, yes, dear hearts; this is all part of our work! She who wrought into it her very being said, as you know, we are to "make the whole world homelike!" And where is there greater need than among those who never had a home, or who having once had one have lost it. Do not let your flower missioner have all the joy that comes of this service. Do it sometimes your very self instead of by proxy.

Do you say you are sad; too sad for such things? It is Lincoln's saying, isn't it, that "to ease another's heartache is to forget your own"?

I seldom "relapse" into rhyme, but, apropos of all this and the posies of June, let me ask you to take this with you:

"Have you had a kindness shown you?
Pass it on.
'Twas not given for you alone—
Pass it on."
Let it travel down the years,
Let it stop another's tears,
Till in heaven the deed appears.
Pass it on.

One burdened heart has been the beginning of a revival many a time. If you are moved in your holiest moments to join with others, do it at whatever cost. A religion that is not worth a little extra time is not worth holding. Pray first for self and then for others. Hold mind and heart to the one desired blessing. There are other duties, cares, delights; but let heart and mind keep reverting to this. Remember these two words: Definiteness, importunity.—B. A. Greene.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR SISTERS: I write you from Somerset, Ky., a mountain county-seat well down toward the Tennessee line, where I am attending a district convention. Mrs. Mary W. Bender, vice-president-at-large, is my companion. We have had the inspiration this first morning of not only breathing the invigorating mountain air while sitting on the veranda a few moments after breakfast, but of feasting our eyes on five magnificent hard maple trees growing in the front yard of the home of our hostess, Mrs. Brinkley; of smelling the perfume of a hundred blossoms on an old-fashioned sweet smelling shrub and a mass of cabbage roses (now all new fashioned, I believe), not to speak of the jasmine flowers, the purple clematis, the sweet clover, helping the grass to hold its own against the all-absorbing, thrifty maples. After this deep breath of nature I will begin to jot down some interesting things about the convention.

In the first place the mayor of the town was not called away on pressing business or overcome by sudden illness, but was present, and welcomed us as allies and friends who, he really thought, would help to better conditions in Somerset. Eight men representing the city, the churches, the Sunday-schools, the day schools, the bar and county officers, the press and the doctors, welcomed the convention, and before they had finished I almost wished I had not come, for I feared we would fall short of their expectations. I never heard the W. C. T. U. receive more appreciative and intelligent glorification. It was an embarrassment of riches! I really believe that at least these eight men think we can do anything we please, not only in the home and local matters, but in national affairs. You will not wonder so much when I tell you that the doctor and the lawyer, representing their fraternities, both affirmed that to their knowledge every member of the bar, and every member of the medical fraternity in Somerset are total abstainers, and yet this town of 4,000 has eleven saloons. They hope to vote them out this fall, and believe that this convention will help to that end. God grant that it may!

Now, listen, dear white-ribboners, who cannot go forty blocks or less to attend a union meeting, there were two women at the meeting last night who had driven forty miles thru the rain over worse roads than most of us ever saw, and so cannot imagine, to reach this district convention. There was a strength, sweetness, and originality about the program, and especially in the district president's address rarely seen or heard, and I am believing that if any of our unions lack new blood and inspiration they could be renewed here.

None of the features of an up-to-date convention were absent, from the Crusade Psalm to the "God be with you till we meet again." The children with a most appropriate and taking program, the violinists, the large choirs, the soloists—all were beautifully prepared and contributed greatly to the enjoyment of the meetings. Mrs. Bender was most helpful all thru the program, and gave an excellent evening address on the ethical side of our work. The writer had an opportunity to talk to her heart's content and the honor to be invited by the business men of Somerset to remain another day and address them at a special meeting in the courthouse. This invitation she was obliged to decline on account of other engagements.

The spirit of the convention was beautiful, the eagerness to learn inspiring, and the Christian courtesy and devotion to the work not to be excelled anywhere. Among those remembered tenderly in prayer were Mrs. Beauchamp, the state president, and her husband, whose mother had just "crossed the bar" peacefully and beautifully into the world beyond. Did you know the strength and sweetness of Mrs. Sophia H. Stone you would know why she was re-elected district president in spite of her feeling that she must be excused because of pressing home cares.

The hospitality of Kentucky has always been proverbial. In my childhood I heard of mistresses who were not only always prepared to offer unlimited hospitality to all who came their way, but who upon great days gave orders that the ice-cream should be served in soup dishes and that the biscuit should be red-hot You might as well believe it all and wish you could see and enjoy for yourselves.

Since beginning these notes I have been transferred bodily from the cool veranda with its overhanging shade to the guards of an Ohio river steamer lying at the wharf of Cincinnati, and the "scenes of my childhood so dear to my heart" are before me—even to the muddy water, the old auntie stewardess, and the orange man, so I cannot write any more now. A few days up the river to see the "old oaken bucket, the moss-covered bucket" once more, and I will be back in the office at Evanston—which will have come to pass before you read these words. Yesterday (Sunday) I spoke at Ashland, Ky., for a union numbering well on toward 200, forty of whom are honoraries. The union is not a year old yet, eager to learn and eager to do. Ashland is one of two places in the county where saloons are licensed. Yesterday, on the spur of the moment, the union decided to cross the Ohio river next Tuesday afternoon and come five miles to Ironton, O., to meet with the union there.

This doubtless will be a pleasant and profitable meeting together of Kentucky and Ohio white ribboners, and I am to have the pleasure of addressing them.

Ironton, the county-seat of Lawrence county, O., came near voting out the saloons last fall under the Beal law. This would be a great victory, for iron interests control here. Rolling mills, nail mills, foundries of various kinds, and great iron furnaces, belching out their flames night and day, represent the wealth of the place. The great Etna was the largest furnace in the world when it was built, and continues such, so far as I know. Where such conditions exist temperance is not likely to flourish.

You infer that I am writing these closing lines from Ironton, and you may know that I am glad to be in Lawrence county again, where my ancestors came as long ago as 1799, and where my grandfather and father held their lands by patents written on parchments signed and sealed by presidents of the United States.

Yours for the work,
SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Sunday School Work.

DEAR SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS:—We believe the Sunday-school should foster Christian patriotism, and therefore we will this year inaugurate the plan of trying to have the first Sunday following the Fourth of July observed in a patriotic manner in the Sunday schools. Let it be a day when special thought and consideration shall be given to the subject of Christian patriotism and the relation of true Christian patriots to existing evils which affect the welfare of our nation and people. To this end we will recommend that suitable exercises be held in the Sunday-schools; that our nation's flag be used in decorating the Sunday-school rooms; that we also use the new Christian Conquest flag, which bears a red cross on a white surface and the motto "By this Sign Conquer" printed on a blue ground. This flag speaks to us of victory thru Christ, our great captain, in whose name we wage our peaceful warfare for God and home and native land. We suggest, also, that small bannerets bearing significant mottoes be used with the flags in decoration. Such mottoes as "Saloons Must Go," "No Flag for the Saloon," "Purity in the Home," and "God in Government," and many others which speak forth a lesson of duty we owe to our nation and to our God. Our Sunday-school pledge chain could be used with excellent effect. It would teach a lesson of total abstinence, while it would plead silently for the protection of the rising generation from the rum curse.

We do not wish our workers to suggest any plan or provide any exercises that will interfere with the regular lesson study, but only that patriotic exercises be included in the opening and closing exercises of the Sunday-school. Let the Sunday-school salute to the flag be given at a suitable time. After the opening song a little boy could appear in front of the school bearing a large American flag, and, at a given signal, the school could rise and give the flag salute. Many of the children will know it since it differs in only one or two phrases from that used in our Loyal Temperance Legions.

We herewith give the words and order of salute:

WORDS: "I give my head, my heart, and this right hand." "For God and home and native land." "One country!" "One language!" "One flag!" "One God!" "To whom be praise forevermore!"

ORDER OF SALUTE:

1. Class or audience seated, standard bearer with flag on platform in front.

2. Rise at signal.

3. Right arm extended, and hand pointing directly to the flag.

4. Right arm bent gracefully, elbows down, so that the finger tips of the right hand will touch the forehead. At the same time say in unison, "I give my head."

5. Right hand carried to the left side, resting over the heart: "My heart."

6. Right arm extended with palm upward: "And this right hand."

8 Hands clasped in front: "And home."

9. Both arms extended gracefully: "And native land."

10. Hands fall quietly to the sides as all exclaim, "One country!" "One language!"

11. Suddenly extend right arm to full length, hand pointing to flag, body slightly bent forward, right foot advanced, the attitude that of intense earnestness; the speakers reach, as it were, toward the flag, exclaiming with strong emphasis, "One flag!"

12. Erect position resumed. Right arm lifted, hand pointing upward, eyes looking upward as all say, "One God!" "To whom be praise forevermore!" Seated.

During the opening exercises "Our Captain's Marching Orders," might be recited by classes in concert. These are scripture texts such as: Prov. 4:14. Prov. 23:20. Prov. 23:31, 32. I. Tim. 5:22 (last clause). II. Cor. 6:17. I. Thess. 5:22. Rom. 12:1. The pastor could give a short impressive talk to the school during the closing exercises, choosing for his subject, "Why we Love our Flag" or "What is it to be Patriotic?"

Just before dismission a little girl could appear with the flag in front of the school and all could give a parting salute to the flag, which would lend emphasis to the hour and perhaps suggest the thought that it is for girls as well as boys, women as well as men to cultivate the spirit of Christian patriotism.

We ask the co-operation of all white-ribboners in the above suggested plans, and also ask that you will kindly report all special patriotic exercises given in Sunday-schools to your local superintendent, so that credit may be given for all effort made.

The Sunday-school salute to the flag is printed in circular form and can be secured of me for 25 cents per 100, postpaid. The new Christian Conquest flag can be secured of David C. Cook Publishing Co., Chicago, Ill.

Our next Temperance Sunday is September 20. My official letter will appear the latter part of July. Do not fail to read it.

Yours for patriotic endeavor,
(MRS.) STELLA B. IRVINE.

THE REAL CRANK

Is Plainly Marked.

The real crank is one who persists in using coffee because accustomed to and yet knows it hurts him. It is this one who always pays the penalty, while the sensible person who gives up coffee and takes on Postum Food Coffee in its place enjoys all the benefits of returning health.

A well-known manufacturer's agent of New York City visited the grocery department of one of the big New York stores not long ago and there he tasted a sample cup of Postum made the right way. He said afterwards: "Just through the energy of that young woman who was serving Postum there I became a convert to the food drink and gave up the drug drink coffee and got well.

"I had used coffee to excess and was gradually becoming a complete wreck, getting weaker and more nervous every day. I paid the penalty for using coffee and when I tasted the delicious Postum I was glad indeed to make the change.

"So I gave up the coffee altogether and have used Postum instead ever since. My family at first called me a crank but seeing how Postum benefited me the first month they all got in line and as a result of Postum's remarkable benefits to me we all drink it now entirely in place of coffee and we are well." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The Third district W. C. T. U., of Iowa, held a three-days' convention at Cedar Falls, Ia., Mrs. Margaret Hinman, of Belmond, and Rev. Charles Scanlon, of Minneapolis, were the evening speakers.

The San Jose (Cal.) union is arranging for a Fourth of July celebration. The Pastors' Union will co-operate and has appointed a committee to assist the W. C. T. U. This union held a medal contest May 30.

Mrs. L. E. Bailey, National organizer, is now working in Ohio. She will tour Brown, Scioto, and Highland counties. Unions desiring her services should address her in care of Miss Charlotte Boyer, Ripley, Brown county, Ohio.

Oxford county, Maine, held its sixteenth annual convention at West Paris, June 3 and 4. It was a profitable and helpful session. Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis gave an inspiring address. The county expects to do more and better work another year.

An interesting feature of the Flower Mission Day program of the Eighth Ward, Minneapolis, Minn., union, was a report of the sick to whom flowers had been sent. The beauty of the department work was more fully realized while listening to what had been accomplished.

Fayette, Greenbrier, and Summers counties, West Virginia, held a convention May 14 at Ganley Bridge. A parliamentary drill by Mrs. Wait, state superintendent of the department, was a feature of the day sessions. Rev. Daugherty, of Claremont, gave the evening address.

The Wisconsin state convention passed a resolution of thanks to the North-Western railway for its refusal to run Sunday excursion trains. The convention also adopted a memorial to congress asking for a constitutional amendment granting woman suffrage in the United States.

The union at Marietta, Ohio, observed two Flower Mission days. Twenty-five of the members held a meeting June 2 at the county infirmary. After a pleasing program ninety-three bouquets, with the text cards, were distributed. The Woman's Home and other places in the city were visited June 9.

Miss Rhena Mosher, National organizer, held an all-day meeting in Atlanta, Texas, May 26. The meeting was well advertised and a great success. Miss Mosher organized a union of colored women at Willis just before the state convention. This union will help win the local option election which will soon be held in Montgomery county.

The Le Droit, D. C., union enjoyed an outing at Glen Echo May 26. Mrs. Clinton Smith, district president, was an honored guest. One of the pleasant features of the day was a visit to the home of Miss Clara Barton. After the luncheon several toasts were responded to. The gala day was so pleasant that the union promises to repeat it.

The W. C. T. U. of Westchester county, New York, celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary by a carefully arranged history of its work for the quarter of a century. A great deal of interesting information is found in the 110 well arranged pages. An immense amount of work has been well done by these Westchester county white ribboners.

The membership of the West Philadelphia union is now 156, which, with many friends interested in the work, makes white ribbon principles a power for good on the west bank of the Schuylkill river. There are twenty-five unions in Philadelphia with members enough to entitle them to two delegates to the National Convention. The union has purchased a building for headquarters.

About thirty delegates attended the First district, N. D., convention, which met recently at Devil's Lake. Miss Lillian Phelps, of Canada, gave the principal address. Miss Wolcott, of Crary, won the gold medal in the oratorical contest. A life membership in the National W. C. T. U. was presented to the retiring district president, Mrs. L. C. McKinney, who is removing to Alberta.

Miss Marie Brehm, state president of Illinois W. C. T. U., had the unique distinction of assisting in the dedication of the new Methodist Episcopal Church at Hillsboro, occupying the pulpit both morning and evening of June 7. Miss Brehm also delivered an address before the annual conference of the Primitive Methodist churches of Wisconsin and Illinois which met at Kewanee, Ill., June 5.

Miss Margaret Wintringer, National organizer, has just closed a successful trip through southern Minnesota. At Preston she was greeted by the L. T. L., which gave its rallying cry and presented her with flowers. At Spring Valley Mrs. Jonathan Sample opened her new home for a reception, saying it could not be christened in a better way. Miss Wintringer won friends everywhere. She held from one to four meetings a day.

Mrs. Mary E. Kuhl, National superintendent of Work Among Miners, is still at work in Montana. She finds the people very enthusiastic along temperance lines. The Y's of Kalispell gave a pleasant reception in her honor. During the last week Mrs. Kuhl has organized three new unions, adding forty members and twenty-one honoraries to our ranks. She is insuring the continued interest by securing subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL under our special offer.

The Brockton, Mass., union observed Flower Mission Day by a special program and the distribution of over fifty bouquets. Mrs. Lucia F. Additon, National organizer, who was present at the meeting, spoke of the temperance work as she had seen it in various localities. Mrs. Additon said she had seen more white ribbons on the streets of Brockton than any other place she had visited. This union has leased a large house and will equip it for a home for working girls.

The department medal contest work is being carried on in the Texas schools under the superintendency of Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard, the state president. In Paris the W. C. T. U. offered three prizes and Prof. Wooten one in the eighth grade, to those pupils who should write the best essays on the effects of alcohol and other narcotics on the human system as this subject is treated of in the physiologies. The Paris union is so well pleased with the results of this contest that it is already arranging for another.

The Barnes-Griggs county W. C. T. U. held its fifteenth annual convention and its fourth annual institute at Valley City, N. D., June 2 and 3. Elizabeth Preston Anderson, state president, was the convention speaker and helper. Miss Anna B. Thompson, state home worker, was present, also Mrs. Van de Bogart, state corresponding secretary. A gold medal contest was held the last night, Mrs. V. H. Ruring, of Cooperstown, receiving the medal on the selection "A Christmas Story." The convention placed Miss Willard's picture in the new Carnegie public library, and made Mrs. Hollingshead a state life member.

Many things are coming to pass in the Sunday-school department of our work. Mrs. Margaret B. Platt, state president of Washington, gave a stirring address at the recent state Sunday-school convention, laying foundations for progressive Sunday school temperance work in that state. Ohio has begun the movement of adopting a temperance department in Sunday-school Associations. Several counties have already taken up the temperance department, and the work is progressing. A wave of temperance agitation swept over the state convention of the Southern California Sunday school association after the address given by Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, the National superintendent. The subject of her address was "Why, When, and How Teach Temperance in the Sunday schools." Much enthusiasm was created, which resulted in the adoption of a state temperance department. Four states now have Temperance departments in their Sunday school associations, Nebraska, Missouri, Northern California and Southern California.

Promoted.

Mrs. William Martin, of Chenoa, Ill., passed to her heavenly home June 1, 1903. Her beautiful Christian character found expression in her daily life. Mrs. Martin was one of the charter members of the local unions, and her counsel and assistance will be greatly missed.

Partiality of the Travelers.

There are not two other cities in this country between which there is more travel than between Buffalo and New York. There are at least eight railroads carrying immense numbers of passengers daily and most of the passengers are bound to points west of Buffalo, or east or south of New York. This class of through travel seems to show considerable partiality to the Lackawanna route, and not without good reason for doing so. In the first place, that railroad is the shortest line between the two cities, being from ten to fifty miles shorter than any of the other competitive lines. Then again, the Lackawanna route is a clean road and that is one of the blessings of traveling. It is one of the few railroads in the United States that burns hard coal entirely on its passenger engines. The four hundred mile trip from Buffalo to New York can be made in full dress or white duck suits, and they will have their pristine whiteness at the end of the journey. Whole State Celebrated.

Vermont Made Merry Over Finish of Prohibition Laws.

Special Correspondence to the Chicago Journal.

Rutland, Vt., June 3.—The entire state of Vermont has been on a week's spree in celebration of the incoming of the new high license liquor law and the death of prohibition, and even in the worst days of the latter statute there was not as much intemperance as now.

The saloons began opening a week ago, and the officers have taken every precaution to prevent outbreaks, but the courts have been overrun with "drunk" cases, the jails are full, and in some instances it has been necessary to swear in special policemen to keep order.

Two reasons are assigned for the extent of intoxication. One is the insidious cocktail, with which Vermont has heretofore had little to do, and the other is the fact that the strength of the whiskey sold over the bars has been misjudged.

When the bars began to open mountaineers and farmers poured into the city to see how it really seemed to take a nip openly and unmolested, and the result was that they all went too far. Many of the countrymen had never seen a real bar in operation, and their only idea of a saloon was a back room with a lookout stationed by the door or a hole under the sidewalk into which they could sneak after being properly introduced.

Rutland and other large towns have boasted real bars, but they always ran under cover and only when the enforcement of the law was lax. As it was necessary to be well known to get into one of these places, the farmer who came to town but two or three times a year patronized "kitchen bars," "whiskey bibles," or went home dry. The splendor of the new saloons with their white jacketed bartenders, cut glass mirrors and electric lights created great admiration, and from morning until night the saloons have been surrounded and filled with an admiring crowd.

A mountaineer who lives so far back in the hills that he doesn't keep up with the news was greatly surprised when he came to town and found the towns running wide open.

"Ye don't mean t' tell me that ye kin go right in t' one 'f them places an' git a glass 'f pisen an' not git th' sheriff arter ye?" he inquired of a policeman on the corner.

When told that he could he stood in deep meditation for a moment, and then said:

"Waal, I reckon thet th' ole state 's on th' high rud t' perdition, but es there seems t' be a turrible mess 'f folks a travelin' yere Uncle Mose'll jine th' procession, jest so 's not t' git left." He "jined," and later slept in the lockup.

Iowa's Prohibitory Law Carried to United States Supreme Court.

Des Moines, Ia., June 7.—The most important test case taken from Iowa to the United States Supreme Court for many years is the one in which Justice Brewer has just granted a writ of error in order that the decision of the Iowa court may be reviewed at Washington immediately. The case is vital to the Iowa prohibitory liquor law. If the Supreme Court of the United States declares that the state court is wrong the door will be again opened for utter disregard of prohibition in Iowa in substantially the same manner that was followed when the "original package saloons" were opened and maintained.

Speak Against Liquor Traffic.

Prominent Men of Many Denominations Condemn Saloons.

San Francisco, Cal., June 5.—Representatives of no less than eight religious denominations assembled in the Young Men's Christian Association auditorium yesterday to participate in the annual convention of the State Anti-Saloon League. It was the most enthusiastic and largest meeting ever held by the organization in this city, and the one strong point in all the speeches, and upon which all were agreed, was that either the complete suppression or the limitation of the traffic in liquor was necessary.

The Rev. Ernest E. Baker, D. D., presided, and on the platform with him were the Rev. J. N. Beard, D. D., vice-president, and M. S. Jones, secretary.

The Rev. Dr. Beard spoke of the object of the league and the Rev. Dr. T. M. Hartley gave an account of the work, which, he said, was growing past all expectation. He showed that there was a falling off in the number of saloons in Sutter and other counties, and said he looked for a similar result in San Francisco with a better administration of the law.

Asks Church Aid.

Major G. W. Calderwood chose for his subject "Anti-Saloon Economics," the Rev. Dr. Briggs spoke on "The Relation of the Church to the League" and the Rev. W. J. Speer's subject was "The Relation of the Minister to the League." Discussions followed each address. In these the Rev. Dr. George C. Adams, Dr. F. D. Bovard, the Rev. Dr. J. A. B. Wilson, the Rev. Dr. Beard, the Rev. W. C. Howard and the Rev. Everett M. Hill took part, all contending that the churches should assist the league in its labors, and that by giving their countenance and aid to the work they strengthened the hands of those who had the work in hand. There was a wholesale but temperate condemnation of the saloons, and the heartiest congratulations were exchanged upon the reports, which showed the successful effects resulting from the league's incessant labors.

The annual report was read, and it still further strengthened the enthusiasm, because it showed that the State Anti-Saloon League was entirely out of debt.

Temperance Union Meets

Catholic Society Holding State Convention at Dubuque.

Dubuque Ia, June 9.—(Special.)—The second annual convention of the Dubuque Archdiocesan Temperance Union opened this morning under the most favorable conditions. Fully a hundred and fifty delegates were present. High mass was celebrated in the cathedral, and eloquent sermons were delivered by Archbishop Keane and Father Daugherty. At the business meeting the report showed a big gain during the past year. The report says: "On Decoration Day, May 30, 1902, this state union was organized. Delegates representing twenty-five societies, with a total of 1,625 members, assembled to organize a state union and to battle against King Alcohol, and two months hence, when we assembled in the thirty-fifth national convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, we represented thirty affiliated societies with a total membership of over 2,000, in actual figures 2,104 affiliated members, an increase of nineteen societies and 1,398 members." This evening at the Grand Opera House there was a grand rally at which Archbishop Keane, Mrs. Lake, Mrs. McGovern, Father McKughlin, of Clinton, and other well-known temperance advocates delivered addresses.

Will Establish a Prohibition Sanitarium.

London, June 6.—Mr. F. N. Charrington is about to try a most interesting experiment of the effect of total prohibition under fair conditions. He has purchased the well-wooded island of Osea, on the coast of Essex, and intends to convert it into a seaside resort, in which the manufacture, sale, and consumption of alcohol will be absolutely prohibited. No license of any kind will be granted, and stringent conditions as regards intoxicants will be inserted in all leases.

The island will be a large sanitarium conducted on strict temperance principles.

Robertson County Prohibition Campaign.

Calvert, Texas, June 6.—The prohibition campaign continues to wax warm in Robertson county. Mrs. A. C. Zehner is again speaking in the courthouse. It is announced that Mrs. Zehner will speak at Hammond Sunday night and will close the campaign in Calvert Monday night.

A printed circular, an appeal to the husbands, fathers, brothers and sons to vote Tuesday against the licensed saloon, is being distributed here today. The petition is signed by a large number of ladies of Calvert, Bremond, Franklin, Wheelock, and a great many other towns of the county.

Prohibitionist Wins.

Hon. William A. Weaver was Elected Mayor of an Ohio Town.

To win an election at the head of a Prohibitionist ticket in a city of over 22,000 inhabitants is an achievement almost unprecedented, and William A. Weaver, the successful aspirant for mayor in Monday's election in East Liverpool, Ohio, has suddenly become a figure of great interest to temperance people all over the country.

The Ministerial Association took up Mr. Weaver's cause and two strong and popular clergymen in particular, Rev. J. C. Taggart, D. D., of the United Presbyterian Church, and Rev. Milton Butler Pratt, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, worked, preached and prayed for his success. They were opposed by Thomas V. Thompson, the Republican nominee, who holds the office of chief of police, claiming he had been negligent in enforcing the laws against gambling and for the regulation of the liquor traffic. The Republican organization backed Thompson, and the latter made a lively canvass. Campaign literature filled columns of the local newspapers and was scattered broadcast over the city.

Mr. Weaver conducted a quiet, systematic canvass, visiting every business place in the city and talking with voters. He also did much in the house-to-house line. He has been in business there fifteen years, and Mr. Thompson has lived there all his life. Mr. Weaver talked and canvassed for six weeks. His voice was so nearly worn out that he could scarcely converse above a whisper. But he had won the support of nearly every church and temperance organization in the city and a large following among business men of all parties. The women were for him almost unanimously and in one church held a prayer meeting, praying for his success while the voting was in progress. Weaver won by 186 majority on the largest vote ever polled in the city. —Cincinnati Enquirer.

The Patent Gate.

"So you've taken down your patent gate, Silas," observed Aunt Martha, as the wagon stopped at the lane, and Silas alighted to open the way. "Wasn't it good?"

"Yes. Well—middlin'," said Silas, answering the two questions together. "'Twas real handy when 'twould work, but 'twasn't reliable about workin'. If you come at it right, and hit the spring just proper, 'twould swing wide open, and was a fine thing. But if you happened to strike it wrong, 'twas a good deal worse'n no improvements; 'twould git so twisted up 'twouldn't open like a patent gate nor a common one, neither. I would manage it pretty well myself, but I couldn't be always outside to explain to other folks, and I thought if they had to climb out of their rigs to read a string of directions, they might as well open a gate. So I took it out.

"The man that sold it to me said 'twas almost human in its workin's, and I don't know but he was right, for I've seen humans that work just about that way. Strike 'em exactly in the right fashion, hit the proper mood in the middle, so to speak, and they are as good natured and open handed as you'd want; but happen to hit 'em the wrong way, and all the inside springs tangle up, and you're barred out. 'Tisn't what I'd call a first-class article, in either gates or folks."—Selected.

NOT DRUGS

Food Did It.

After using laxative and cathartic medicines from childhood a case of chronic and apparently incurable constipation yielded to the scientific food Grape-Nuts in a few days. "From early childhood I suffered with such terrible constipation that I had to use laxatives continuously going from one drug to another and suffering more or less all the time.

"A prominent physician whom I consulted told me the muscles of the digestive organs were partially paralyzed and could not perform their work without help of some kind, so I have tried at different time about every laxative and cathartic known but found no help that was at all permanent. I had finally become discouraged and had given my case up as hopeless when I began to use the pre-digested food Grape-Nuts.

"Although I had not expected this food to help my trouble to my great surprise Grape Nuts digested immediately from the first and in a few days I was convinced that this was just what my system needed.

"The bowels performed their functions regularly and I am now completely and permanently cured of this awful trouble.

"Truly the power of scientific food must be unlimited." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There is a reason.

Healthful desserts are just as easy as the bad kind. For further particulars see the little recipe book in each package of Grape-Nuts.

Test For Drink Habit.

Shrewd Man Who Proved His Clerks Were not Teetotalers.

Half a score of clerks in one of the largest brokerage houses in New York were astounded one morning last week when, one by one, they were called to their employer's private office and asked to hold up their feet and show the shanks of their shoes. They thought the "old man" had gone quite mad. Each young man as he entered the office was told to sit down and put his foot up on a corner of the desk where it could be examined. Then the head of the house put on his glasses and very carefully scrutinized the shank of the shoe.

When all had been put through this examination he called the entire force of clerks into his office and explained to them why this unusual examination had been made.

"You are well aware," said he, "that I will not have a drinking man in my employ if I know it. For some time I have had good reasons for believing that several of the young men before me have been indulging quite too much. Now I know it. Here are the marks of the bar rails on the bottoms of your shoes."

Several of the young men braced themselves against the wall and lifted their feet as a blacksmith lifts the foot of a horse. Sure enough, there were the glazed, metallic marks on the dry leather. They were the evidences of guilt and the young men's faces showed it.

"It's unmistakable proof," said the head of the house. "You can fix up your breath at the drug store and the barber can clean up your eyes and face, but you neglect the shanks of your shoes."

That afternoon three young men cleaned out their desks, says the New York Herald, and gave the keys to the managing clerk.

THE INVALIDS' HOTEL.

THE IDEAL MODERN HOSPITAL.

It is generally the case that when some great modern improvement of old methods of business is put forward, the world says, "How simple! Why didn't somebody think of it before?" When you read of an "Invalids' Hotel" as the modern hospital ideal, the thought at once comes, "What a great improvement. Why didn't somebody think of it before."

The Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute, of Buffalo, N. Y., the unique model of medical and surgical progress, owes its existence to its founder, Dr. R. V. Pierce, and the rare combination of business acumen and professional ability which he possesses in a marked degree.

Most people dread the thought of the ordinary hospital, however beneficent the institution may be. In the popular mind the hospital is next to a prison; a place where identity is lost, and a man or woman becomes merely a "case" for the experiments of doctors or surgeons. With his experience the thought occurred to Dr. Priece, why not put the hospital on a hotel basis? Why not let the patient preserve his individuality and indentity, and lead an existence as independent and free as the condition of invalidism will allow? And so was born and built the "Invalids' Hotel," whose waiters are white-clothed men and white-capped women nurses. Here are no great dreary wards, echoing with the moaning of the sick, but separate rooms, as in an ordinary hotel, with extraordinary hotel service, the servants being skilled physicians and nurses.

The Invalids' Hotel and Surgical Institute is provided with every modern appliance for the electrical or mechanical treatment of disease. Nearly a score of physicians (each man a specialist in his department) are in constant attendance on the inmates. Everything that can conduce to comfort and home-likeness is provided by Dr. Pierce for his guests, and the sights and sounds and smells of the public hospital are entirely avoided.

Adopting A Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

A True Story.—By Samueletta Dickson.

THE funeral was over, the friends had all left, and now in the gloaming Mrs. Grey was sitting alone in the large bay window where so many times she and her husband had sat in that twilight hour and seen the sun sink behind the foothills into the Pacific Ocean, and then, like the children in Dickens' story, had watched the stars come out, while they queried and wondered about those celestial orbs.

Now, as Mrs. Grey sat there alone with Mr. Grey's vacant chair near her, their married life passed like a panorama before her mental vision. Her marriage, which had occurred late in life, had been pleasant, altho lacking in romance. Her husband, considerably her senior, had supplied her everything he considered essential to her happiness and comfort, but an unideal, practical business man has little conception of the needs and wants of a highly nervous and imaginative woman in whom the intellectual and the spiritual were much stronger than the physical.

But Mr. Grey was kind-hearted, and his wife was cheery in disposition, so there was a pleasant comradeship in their lives, altho their souls never touched.

Mrs. Grey used to tell herself that the drudgery of life was like the athlete's punching bag, a developer of muscle, and she used to develop her spiritual muscle. Sometimes, however, the frail body gave out with too much of this exercise, and then Mr. Grey took her to the ocean, and there, in communion with the woods and the ocean and all the inspiring influences that cluster around Monterey Bay, she imbibed new life.

Mrs. Grey had had advantages of study and travel before her marriage, and Mr. Grey was proud to have his wife take a prominent part in the literary club of the town, but he did not like as well her interest in the small, unpopular W. C. T. U.

"I wish," he often said, "that you would keep away from those cranky women. Mrs. Judge Hollingsworth says that you are the best-informed woman in the club. I do not see why you associate with those women."

"The disciple should not be above his Lord," Mrs. Grey would meekly reply, and then would go steadily on her way, helping, as she had opportunity, the scorned white-ribboners.

Mrs. Grey reviewed all these past experiences, and then the question came to her, "What am I to do now?"

She had no child nor relative dependent on her and her husband had left her an income sufficient to supply her necessary wants. There in the light of the stars she asked God for her life work, and her soul listened for the answer that should come. She thought of the trials and needs of the little union, and she said, "What they need most is a home—a place of their own. I will adopt the W. C. T. U. as my child and give it a home."

When Mrs. Grey made up her mind she acted. She at once proceeded to put her resolution into practice. Carpenters were engaged, and her house was enlarged and made suitable for holding public gatherings.

"Are you going to take boarders, Mrs. Grey?" her friends asked her. But Mrs. Grey kept her own counsel. When the house was finished a difficulty confronted her, for she found that the bills of carpenters, painters, and plumbers are always much larger than the first estimate and that she had used up all her available funds and had no money with which to furnish the house. However, Mrs. Grey was a woman of resources.

The old carpet was too small for the enlarged room, so she painted a broad strip around the edge of the room and used the carpet as a rug. With boxes and boards lounges were constructed, the seats stuffed with straw, one covered with a pretty buggy robe, another with an old portiere, and another with a bright shawl. All were piled with pretty, soft cushions, and the room was cozy and inviting. In the dining-room tables were made with boards put on the lime barrels that the masons had left, and they were well covered with long linen cloths. When all was finished Mrs. Grey sent an invitation to every member of the union to meet at her house.

After the opening exercises of the meeting Mrs. Grey said: "My dear sisters, you know how one of the greatest obstacles to our work has been the lack of a suitable place of meeting, so it came into my heart to build a temple for our service. My imagination built a beautiful house and furnished it completely, but I had to descend from my air castle and take account of stock on hand, and altho it was very unsatisfactory, I think God will accept the best that I can give. I now open and give my home for the use of our W. C. T. U. during my life and after my death. It is only poorly equipped, but it will be our own home, and we will furnish it as we are able to do so. It may be it is best that I could not furnish it completely and have the selfish pleasure of doing all the giving, instead of your having to share in the work."

Not long after this meeting Mrs. Grey was invited out to spend the day, but in the afternoon a messenger called her home to meet a friend who had come from out of town. As Mrs. Grey opened her front door what a sight met her view!

The house was a bower of floral decoration, while in every room there were billows of faces crowding eagerly forward to enjoy her surprise. Her home-made lounges were replaced by comfortable chairs, and her tables by others that had been made and donated by one of the honoraries. After a program of music and loving speeches the ladies presented Mrs. Grey with a beautiful secretary's desk. Then refreshments were served on the new tables.

Now the little despised union began vigorous work. Every month they held a mothers' and babies' social tea, to which young mothers were invited. Mrs. Grey had a room supplied with plenty of playthings for the entertainment of the babies while their mothers attended the meetings. The Loyal Temperance Legion met there for their meetings and entertainments.

"We must look after our young people," said Mrs. Grey, so with the aid of a lady who had a genius for entertaining the young folks' club was organized and once a month spent an evening at "our headquarters," as the ladies liked to call Mrs. Grey's house. So popular were these gatherings that an invitation to them was esteemed quite desirable.

In less than six months the union had doubled its membership and receptions were given to the new members and honoraries. The now wide-awake union found its opportunities for usefulness greatly increased, while Mrs. Grey's days were hardly long enough for her to do all that she wished for her beloved "adopted child." If she ever found any one childless and alone she advised: "Now you just adopt something that will make somebody happier and better, and you will find a remedy for sorrow and loneliness and trouble."

it kind o' helped him; and just becaus I didn't want to die drowned, anyway, I had to keep on fetchin' up a fresh bit of spurt, till we acshally got to where Billy was. We found him, poor old shaver, hangin' with one arm thru the space left in the crossin' of three beams, and pretty nigh the end of his strength. It was nigh to bein' all oop wi' Billy, I tell ye. As it was, we had to put a rope round him and pull him thru the watter, and it was in tryin' to keep him clear o' the jagged sides that Mr. Brotherton got that last knock on the head. It were lucky for us that we were nigh the cage by then, and someways, one after the other, I got 'em in. My word! it's my first experience in the life-savin' business, is this here, doctor," concluded Sam, with a grin, "and, if Mr. Brotherton don't happen to be about, I'll take jolly good care as it's the last."

Notwithstanding which deliverance, it was quite evident that Sam had a secret and pardonable pride in his exploit.

Dr. Mann recounted the story with grim appreciation in the Vicarage drawing-room, while Hugh tossed, feverish and restless, in his bed upstairs. For Miss Boyd had insisted on having him carried to her house for proper care and nursing.

"Mrs. Foote would do all in her power for him. I know that quite well; but her rooms are poky, and, in every way, he will do better with us," she had urged, and the vicar had cordially seconded her representations.

On this second evening after the accident, the doctor had looked into the drawing-room, on his way downstairs, to tell Sam's story.

"No, Brotherton isn't quite so well as I had hoped to find him," he said, in answer to the general inquiry. "Still there's no cause for anxiety. He's neither so hardy nor so phlegmatic as Sam. I like Sam," and he laughed with retrospective enjoyment of the recent interview.

"I think that they both behaved splendidly," said Miss Glyn pointedly.

"They did; but we expected it of Brotherton, didn't we?" he asked meekly. "Now, Sam we have always held to be a black sheep."

"I don't see what difference that makes," retorted Rose valiantly. "I don't believe that what they did was one bit easier for Mr. Brotherton than it was for him."

"Granted; and to tell you the truth, Brotherton has gone up a hundred per cent in my esteem. Still, I submit that we have a right to expect more of him. He himself, by the standard he set up, has given us that right. Say, now, that in some emergency Sam fails us. Would the failure greatly affect our own standpoint? But suppose that, instead of Sam, it is Brotherton who fails us?"

The answer did not come from Rose, who, however, gravely nodded her head.

"I see; yes, I see what you mean. It would be different."

"Poor Brotherton!" said Mr. Boyd, with such heartfelt sympathy that they all laughed.

Mrs. Langley, who had called on a visit of inquiry, rose to accompany her brother home.

"Oh, I don't doubt that he will prove himself equal to his responsibilities," said the doctor cheerily.

Nevertheless, he spent an anxious hour that evening in pacing backwards and forwards in his den.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Dublin university has decided to admit women and abolish the study of Greek.

The Daughters of America in Victor, Colorado, has appealed to the council to close all the wine rooms in the city.

A hobby that nearly all the queens of Europe seem to have in common is dairying. Excellent milk and butter is being sold from the royal farm of Queen Wilhelmina of Holland.

The young women students of Boston university outrank the young men in scholarship at the ratio of fifteen to one. This spring just sixteen seniors divide the commencement honors and of the sixteen all but one are women.

At a meeting of the board of trustees of Leland Stanford Jr. university, Mrs. Leland Stanford resigned all the powers and duties invested in her by the terms of the grant founding the university.

Mrs. Charles H. Truax, a society woman, who has taken two hours a day from her social duties for study, has finished a three years' course at the New York University and received the degree of M. A.

By a decision of the court the bequest of $100,000 left by Mrs. Abbey R. H. Stewart of Olympia, Wash., goes to Mary Lowe Dickinson, of New York. The will was contested by the relatives of Mrs. Stewart.

The builders of a Catholic church in London could not find any English workmen able to do the mosaic work. As they did not wish to import Italians a number of women were taught to do the work and gave perfect satisfaction.

Nineteen states were represented at the interstate conference of King's Daughters which met in Detroit, Mich., June 8. Mrs. Margaret Bottome, the founder of the order and international president, was present and received an enthusiastic greeting. The child labor question was discussed.

What one woman can do in the matter of office getting is well illustrated by Mrs. C. B. Hollam of Dallas, Tex., who is deputy United States circuit and district court clerk, stenographer for the United States marshal, deputy United States marshal, and as such entitled to carry deadly weapons.

Miss Elsie Ward, of Fayette, Mo., has been awarded the prize for the best design for the fountain to be erected by the W. C. T. U. at the Louisiana Purchase exposition in St. Louis. The fountain is to be of bronze and will cost $3,000. Miss Ward's model is the figure of a woman carrying a child along the path of temperance and right living, thus typifying the spirit of the W. C. T. U.

"When the Woman's Christian Temperance Union secured the introduction of temperance text books and instruction into the public schools, we imagine that neither they nor anyone else saw how much they were doing for American commercial supremacy. High among the names of the contributors to our nation's power and glory must the historian write the names of these noble women. It is gratifying that their services to the American people are being placed at their true value by foreign journals. Let them be recognized at home. Their labors are putting more money in the pocket of this nation than that of the combined liquor traffic from the foundation of the government downward."—The American Issue.

Are Women Outstripping Men in the Colleges?

About the only safe deduction that can be made from the symposium of college presidents on the relative standing of men and women in the higher instituions published in the Sunday Record-Herald is that there is wide diversity of opinion among educators upon this question. As in the question of coeducation, the conclusions appear to be largely a matter of individual experience. A man who has never managed a coeducational institution is certainly not in a position to affirm that coeducation is a failure.

On one thing the college and university presidents appear to be agreed. Women have shown their ability to hold their own with men in the languages and in general literary work. It is averred by many, however, that they easily surpass the men in this field of endeavor, and they cite statistics to prove it. President MacLean of the University of Iowa says that in the Iowa College of Liberal Arts, where men and women are nearly equal in number, about three-fourths of those having the highest standing are women. "That they lead the men in actual scholarship, however, I seriously doubt," says Mr. MacLean.

At Boston University fifteen out of sixteen senior students just elected to membership in the Phi Beta Kappa Society, the sole test being scholarship, are women. In the University of Chicago, during the first ten years of its life, women have captured more prizes and honors than men.

Some of the reasons assigned for the present tendency of women to surpass men in scholarship in the colleges and universities are: Greater devotion to athletics by young men; 95 per cent of the studies are memory studies, and women long ago demonstrated that they could memorize more easily than men; women give greater attention to details and apply themselves more assiduously to study; the advantages to women are newer and they are more ambitious to excel.

While in many institutions it appears that the women students excel the men in scholarship by about 10 per cent on the average, the testimony of most of those interviewed was to the effect that scholarship records run comparatively even between men and women. The average grades in most of the coeducational institutions are in fact closely parallel.

If women are attaining higher scholarship than men in the colleges at this time it is probably due, as President Northrup of the University of Minnesota says, to conscientious and faithful work rather than to superior ability.—Chicago Record-Herald.

Women and Law.

What is supposed to be the first book of laws ever given to the world, has been discovered by the well-known Assyriologist, Dr. Hugo Winckler. The laws were promulgated by King Amraphel, about 2250 B. C. Among the 282 laws are found the following:

"If a woman who sells beverages gives bad value for the money paid her, she shall be thrown into the water.

"If a wife be a spendthrift, or if she otherwise neglect her duties, her husband may put her away without compensation; but if a man put away his wife for no other reason than that she has no children, he shall return her whole dowry.

"If a betrothal be rescinded, the man shall pay the woman compensation.

Too Tired to Trust.

(Printed by Request.)

I'M too tired to trust and too tired to pray,
Said one, as the over-taxed strength gave way.
The one conscious thought by my mind possessed,
Is, Oh, could I just drop it all and rest.

Will God forgive me, do you suppose,
If I go right to sleep as a baby goes,
Without an asking if I may;
Without ever trying to trust and pray?

Will God forgive you? why think, dear heart,
When language to you was an unknown art,
Did a mother deny you needed rest
Or refuse to pillow you on her breast?

Did she let you want when you could not ask?
Did she set her child an unequal task?
Or did she cradle you in her arms,
And then guard your slumber against alarms?

Ah, how quick was her mother love to see,
The unconscious yearnings of infancy.
When you've grown too tired to trust and pray,
When over-wrought nature has quite given way;

Then just drop it all, and give up to rest,
As you used to do on a mother's breast.
He knows all about it—the dear Lord knows.
So just go to sleep as a baby goes.

Without even asking if you may,
God knows when His child is too tired to pray.
He judges not solely by uttered prayer,
He knows when the yearnings of love are there.

He knows you do pray, He knows you do trust,
And He knows, too, the limits of poor, weak dust.
Oh, the wonderful sympathy of Christ
For His chosen ones in that midnight tryst.

When He bade them sleep and take their rest,
While on him the guilt of the whole world pressed—
You've given your life up to Him to keep,
Then don't be afraid to go right to sleep.

Anti-Saloon Program in Tennessee.

It is always well to know the plans of the enemy, and strategically it is recognized that a disclosure of hostile tactics is often half the battle to an opposing force. The retail liquor trade of Tennessee has been put on the defensive, and their main enemy has been the Anti-Saloon League of that state. A knowledge, therefore, of their program is essential to its proper defense. It is given out as follows:

(1) Rigid enforcement of the four-mile law in towns which now come under its operation, and to this end the vigorous prosecution of all its violators—blind tigers, bootleggers, or by whatever name called. The league stands ready to join the citizens of these towns in the adoption of any necessary means to render the laws effective. The officers of the league hope that these towns will feel free to call upon them for any assistance which they may be able to render.

(2) The extension of the law as soon as possible to all the towns in the state that want it, giving them the privilege of voting upon the question of having saloons, either by corporation as now, or by wards in the larger cities. If it should be said that the law could not be enforced in the larger cities, then we have to reply that before they can take advantage of the law they must have an expression from their citizens on the subject, and if there is sufficient public sentiment to vote out saloons, then there should be sufficient public sentiment to enforce the law there. If, on the other hand, there would not be sufficient public sentiment to enforce the law, then there would not be sufficient public sentiment to vote saloons out. Certainly we think that those towns whose citizens have been pleading for the privilege of having a vote on the question should be given that privilege.

(3) The regulation of saloons in towns where they still remain, so as to minimize as far as possible their direful influence.

This means that the Anti-Saloon League will tackle liquor in the cities of Bristol, Knoxville, Chattanooga, Nashville, Columbia, Clarksville, Jackson, and Memphis before the next legislature.—Mida's Criterion.

Local Option Elections.

VELASCO, TEXAS, June 7.—At the prohibition election held here yesterday Velasco gave a majority of sixteen for the pros. The county went dry by about four hundred. Everything passed off quietly.

DIMMITT, TEXAS, June 4.—The local option election held here Tuesday, June 2, resulted in a victory for the pros 3½ to 1. Only one box in the county went wet.

HUNTINGTON DEPOT, W. VA., June 7.—Huntington, always considered the most wide-open town on the Ohio river, experienced a dryness today for the first time in the city's history. Every saloon in town was closed, and guards were even placed at every entrance, front, side, and rear. The officials did not decide on this action until last midnight, and not a moment's warning was given.

LONGVIEW, TEXAS, June 5.—Prohibition went into effect here last night at 12 o'clock and this morning all is quiet, the closing of the saloons causing nothing very unusual last night or this morning. There were six saloons uptown and one at the junction, two saloons having closed since the election last February and the time set for the closing.

Newark Saloons Limited.

Board of Excise Decides Against Granting Any More Licenses.

NEWARK, N. J., June 4.—The Board of Excise has passed a resolution prohibiting the granting of any more liquor licenses in this city. There are 1,425 saloons within the city limits, and over twenty applications are now in the hands of the excise clerk, who has been instructed not to accept any more. In the meantime the pending applications will be acted upon.

The board's decision was caused by the fact that through brewery agents and individual action an unusually large number of applications have been made in the past few weeks. Seven applicants were refused permits to operate saloons last night.

Will Close Bremerton Saloons.

SEATTLE, WASH., June 7.—The city council of Bremerton last night took the final step toward a compliance with the demands of the navy department by passing an ordinance revoking the license of every saloon in the place.

Charles Schweizer, a German saloon keeper, has joined the Salvation Army in Muncie, Ind. The saloon is closed, and Mr. Schweizer is now a tailor.

The Englewood Law and Order League has joined the Hyde Park Protective Association in the effort to drive out saloons near Washington park, Chicago.

Fifty leading citizens, representing all professions and different walks of life, were recently asked, "Is waltzing dangerous to virtue?" All except three without hesitation answered, "Yes."

Those attending the World's Fair at St. Louis next year will find special attention paid to their comfort by the "Daylight Special" of the Illinois Central railroad. It is a handsome train both outside and in, with decorative features up to the highest standard. The artistic book which tells all about this train, can be secured by writing A. W. Hanson, G. P. In connection with the third annual convention of the American League for Civic Improvement a civic institute will be conducted at Chautauqua. For an entire week students and workers in the field of civic improvement will be offered a program of lectures and conferences, under the guidance of some of the chief leaders in civic improvement, which will give for the first time a complete survey of the principles, achievements, and hopes of this great movement.

The Assembly at Winona Lake, Indiana, presents an attractive program. The arrangement is a unique departure from former programs in that each week will have its general subject. Literature will occupy the first week, from July 6 to 11; travel the second week; pedagogy and science the third week; miscellaneous subjects the fourth week, from July 27 to August 1; living questions the fifth week, and the sixth and last will be devoted to music. The ninth annual Bible Conference, under the direction of the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, will crown the summer assembly program, from August 16 to 26. Many noted people will be heard during the summer from Winona's platform. More than the usual number of conventions, excursions and picnics have been arranged.

A new point has been raised in the prohibition contest in Grayson county, Texas. It is based upon that section of the state constitution which prohibits any infringement upon the religious views of any one. It is claimed the statutory enactment, which says in places where local option or prohibition laws prevail that liquor shall not be sold except for medicinal or sacramental use, is in conflict with the above section of the state constitution, in that it is a direct discrimination against the religious tenets and creed of the Jews. The Jewish creed requires the drinking of wine on Friday and Saturday evenings, not as a sacrament, but as a beverage, and that during the feasts of the Purim, Passover, and other stated occasions it is required that all orthodox Jews drink wine four times each day, not as a sacrament, but as a beverage. It is claimed that Jews will be unable under the law to perform these religious obligations in a community in which the prohibition laws of Texas are in force, because sacraments being essentially Christian they could not secure the wine upon affidavits truthfully filed that said wine was intended for sacramental purposes.

The July Magazine Number of The Union Signal will be largely devoted to the interests of the World's Loyal Temperance Legion.

Among the especially attractive features will be illustrations presenting groups of Legions in foreign countries; the largest Legion in the United States will be written up and a valuable article upon the splendid L. T. L. in the Reform School at Portland. Remember the date of issue, July 2, and send in advance orders. The price per hundred is $2.25.

An Inspiring Booklet.

No more tender tribute to Miss Willard was ever penned than is found in "Frances E. Willard's Message to the Womanhood of the Age," by Rev. Frank M. Bristol, D. D., of Washington, D. C. Having been a pupil of Miss Willard, at the Northwestern University, in Evanston, Dr. Bristol speaks with knowledge of her wonderful life and its value to the world. Place the booklet in the hands of your friends, reserving a copy for your own desk, that her "message" may often inspire you. Only a limited number of copies are left. Price 15 cents.

Special Summer Offer.

The Union Signal from the time your subscription is received until November 26 for fifty cents. This is our special offer, and deserves the earnest attention of every W. C. T. U. woman. Immediate subscription will insure your getting the report of the World's Convention, which meets in Geneva, Switzerland, June 9. This special offer also includes the enlarged and profusely illustrated Convention Number, which will make the Cincinnati convention of November 13-18 a reality to those who cannot attend it. Many timely articles and special issues of The Union Signal will appear during the summer.

In connection with this offer we are inaugurating a Roll of Honor. Upon the Roll will be placed the names, with the name of the president, of every union in the United States whose subscription list for The Union Signal is equal to its membership. All unions entitled to a place on the Roll should report the fact promptly. We hope for a long list to greet our editor-in-chief, Mrs. Stevens, when she returns to America July first. Which union will stand first? Will it be yours? Will your state, your district, your county be represented?

Sketches for Red Letter Days.

One is greatly assisted in preparation for the observance of the various Red Letter Days by the booklets prepared by Mrs. Mary W. Tomlinson, National Superintendent of Social Meetings and Red Letter Days. A "Biographical Sketch of Miss Anna A. Gordon" is the last booklet issued. It is attractively arranged and includes a historical and personal sketch, written by Frances E. Willard, with whom Miss Gordon was associated for twenty-one years. Appreciative words are given from Katherine Lente Stevenson, president of Massachusetts W. C. T. U., and Eva Kilbreth Foster, National Press Correspondent. A suggestive program for Loyal Temperance Legion Day, July 21, the birthday of Miss Gordon, is found on the second page.

Another booklet, prepared by Mrs. Tomlinson especially for Union Signal Day, March 1, is always timely, as it is a biographical sketch of "Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens," our National president. A program for Union Signal Day, a "March 1st" poem, by Anna A. Gordon, and a description of Mrs. Stevens' home in Portland, Maine, and mention of some of the many good things she has brought to pass are interwoven with interesting biographical matter. Price, ten cents each.

Michigan's Record of the Year.

R. M. Harwood, Correspondent.

PLAINWELL, Mich., June 15.—Adrian was at the front in the Crusade movement and the early history of our organization, the second and ninth conventions having been held in that city; and the twenty-ninth in personnel and accomplishment was a worthy successor.

The appreciation of representative citizens, and of the city press, which gave large space to each day's proceedings and sketches of our prominent workers, was very satisfactory.

Forty-two unions have been organized. The decided advance in the state is especially marked in the growth of the Y and L. T. L. branches—both given a place in the program—and the Medal Contest work. Two hundred contests have been held under the direction of Mrs. S. L. Jeffers, superintendent, who awarded the beautiful banner presented by herself to the state to Mrs. I. W. Sloan, president of the Third district, for the best work in the department. The county banner was reluctantly surrendered by Manistee to Ionia county, and the local union banner by Manistee City to Shelby, Oceana county, for largest gain in membership.

The excellent record made by our state officers was fittingly recognized in their re-election by a large majority. Miss M. J. Bilz, recording secretary, was also appointed a Y organizer.

The important subject, "Co-operation Between Parents and School Teachers, from a Parent's Standpoint," was ably treated by Dr. Mary Wood-Allen, and "From a Teacher's Standpoint," by Miss Pomeroy. Under the general topic, "Give Us a Remedy," Mr. C. M. Weaver, Dr. M. R. Worden, Mr. D. W. Grandon, Hon. H. C. Smith, and Hon. Walter S. Westerman presented their views, all emphasizing the work of our organization and the ballot for women. Suggestive and helpful was the discussion of "Our Principle, Our Aims, Our Needs, Our Achievements" in the delegates' open parliament.

Memories of Mary T. Lathrop were lovingly recalled by Mrs. Jane M. Kinney and others, awarding highest honor to this "pearl among women." Mrs. Kinney was also charged with the duty of presenting a handsomely framed picture of Miss Willard to the school library.

Among the resolutions was one requesting the re-appointment, by the President, of women inspectors at the port of New York, and one of commendation and thanks to the governor of the state for his stand against Sunday baseball playing. These were sent to President Roosevelt and Governor Bliss, respectively.

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, president of New York, rendered valuable service thruout, conferred diplomas on the class of eight L. T. L. graduates, and gave the address of the closing evening.

The honor of state membership was conferred on Mrs. A. S. K. Burton by the convention, and on THE UNION SIGNAL reporter by the Fifth district.

The visit of Mrs. Jewett, managing editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, and Miss Austin, of the W. T. P. A., was one of the pleasant surprises and bore fruit in renewed interest in the official organ.

As in Old Crusader Days.

Laura Delany Garst, Correspondent.

COON RAPIDS, Ia., June 19.—The McColls of Des Moines held three rousing temperance mass meetings in the Opera house June 14. They formed and led a temperance parade thru the principal streets of the city at 2 p. m. Over 300 men, women, and children with flags waving and glorious anti-saloon singing, paraded around until a circle was formed in front of the leading saloon, and Mr. and Mrs. McColl sang a touching temperance song, followed by a forcible address by Mr. McColl. The whole mob followed them to the Opera house, and the burning statements made against rum and the terrible traffic in it were encored to the echo. Over 400 signed the pledge during the day. At the close of the evening service Mr. McColl organized a W. C. T. U. with forty-one women and eighteen men. One notable feature being the very best people of the city took hold of the work and went into the union. Great anti-saloon sentiment was created, hundreds were made total abstainers, and scores of men declared themselves for prohibition voters.

Rev. E. O. Taylor in Florida.

Mrs. Alice C. Brown, Correspondent.

FORT REED, Fla., June 12.—The Florida W. C. T. U. deems itself very fortunate in securing a visit from the Rev. E. O. Taylor of Boston, the eminent lecturer on scientific temperance and American citizenship.

He spoke in ten different places, in five of which he gave his full course of five lectures, to the benefit and satisfaction of the citizens. In Tallahassee the legislators and the state convention of county superintendents of public instruction heard him, and the gratifying word comes from there that a fine impression was made, and that the result must be a permanent good.

The state W. C. T. U. convention also had the good fortune to hear Dr. Taylor's masterly presentation of "Citizenship in the Light of Christ and Paul" for its annual address, and to hear him on other occasions. In the enforced absence of the superintendent of Anti-Alcoholic Medication, Dr. Taylor took the topic and gave the convention an hour's interesting instruction on that important theme.

Ban on Patent Medicine Drinks.

ARDMORE, I. T., June 21.—United States Marshal Colbert has made one of the strictest rulings in regard to the enforcement of the liquor laws in the territory which has yet developed He proposes to shut down on patent medicine devotees, and his decree shuts out every preparation suspected of containing intoxicants.

"I believe in the states where woman suffrage has already been tried it has been accompanied with success. In the city of Philadelphia the election of women to the school board and their appointment to the board of control have been of great advantage. I am satisfied that in the educational administration of the state their admission to the fullest power and authority will be accompanied with the greatest advantage to the commonwealth."—Ex-Gov. ROBERT E. PATTISON, of Pennsylvania.

W. C. T. U. Work in Texas.

Personnel of Leaders—Encouraging County Conventions—Recent Prohibition Victories.

Mrs. Mattie R. Turner, Correspondent.

TERRELL, Tex., June 19.—Mrs. Helen M. Stoddard enters on her thirteenth year as president of the Texas W. C. T. U. The first years of her work were a time of seed sowing, and now she is rejoicing in the bountiful harvest which her patient, earnest endeavors have been the main factors in producing.

MRS. HELEN M. STODDARD.

Mrs. Effie Miller, recording secretary, has been "in the harness" only a year, but by her quiet, unassuming manner and faithful service have won the admiration and love of her comrades, as was demonstrated by her re-election.

Mrs. Curtis, state treasurer, will guard our exchequer another year. She enters upon her twelfth year of service in this capacity, and her record is above reproach.

Mrs. Ammerman, corresponding secretary, is new, but possessed of the three qualities that insure success—"grit, grace, and gumption."

Kaufman county convention was held in Forney, the president, Mrs. Herring, presiding. Terrell and Lawrence unions were well represented. Mrs. Mattie R. Turner, of Terrell, was elected recording secretary. Excellent papers were read by the various delegates. The symposium, "What can be done next," brought out many and varied suggestions from the teachers, ministers, physicians, and women. The entertainment by the young people was a decided success. Mrs. Ella C. Porter, superintendent of mothers' meetings, was present, and offered many helpful suggestions.

The Burnet-Llano bi-county convention met in Burnet, and was presided over by Mrs. Flora Moreland, president. Mrs. Stoddard, state president, and Miss Fanny Armstrong, state press superintendent, were in attendance and rendered valuable assistance. The program was an excellent one, and well executed. A medal contest was held in the evening, the contestants being six bright boys. Three medals were given for the best examinations on scientific temperance instruction. Lampasas county sent a delegation and was admitted into the organization, thereby forming a tri-county union. On Sunday afternoon Mrs. Stoddard addressed a young people's mass meeting.

The Hill county meeting was held in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Mrs. M. A. Culberson, president, in the chair. Mrs. Beulah Miller was elected secretary. A carefully arranged program was well carried out. Miss Fanny Armstrong, state press superintendent, Mrs. Nannie Curtis, state lecturer, and Miss Rhena Mosher, National lecturer, assisted in making this meeting a great success. Mrs. Culberson has been remarkably successful in medal contest work, and has just been appointed associate to the superintendent of this department. The boys in the Culberson Select School wear the white ribbon and are loyal to its principles.

Brown county recently held a convention in Brownwood, Mrs. Jesse Scott president, presiding. Mrs. Stoddard and Miss Fannie Armstrong attended and contributed to the meetings by addresses, drills, etc.

Since last report the following counties have voted the saloons from their borders: Milam, Rusk, Orange, Erath, Brown, Lampasas, Walker, Brazoria, Robertson, and Archer City precinct in Archer county. All these, save three, are densely populated, and a majority of them have a large negro population. Prohibition has won in every contest of this month. The summer months will, no doubt, bring many added victories to grand old Texas.

Delaware Notes and News.

Several New Unions and Many New Members—New Rest Room and Soldiers' C. T. U. at Delaware City.

Lila Wilson Aron, Correspondent.

WYOMING, Del., June 17.—Increased activity thruout the state is shown by the gain in members and the forming of new unions. Unions have been organized at Rehoboth and Hartley; a Thacher union in Wilmington; Farmington Y has graduated into a W with eight members. Magnolia and Harrington have recently organized a Y, the latter place having started only a few weeks ago with five active and two honorary members, now have forty-five and hope to have 100 by October. New L. T. L.'s have been organized at Kenton and Leipsic, that at Kenton having 30 members. Mrs. Thacher, in her month's itinerary, gained 128 active and seventy-one honorary members for the state; organized one Y, one Senior L. T. L., and three L. T. L.'s.

MRS. L. W. EMERSON.

From Delaware City we hear more glad news of the "rest room" and Soldiers C. T. U. The room now has all the necessaries for comfort, and both the C. T. U. and the W's meet there, the soldiers requesting also that the Y's meet with them. There are six pledged soldiers. Among the gifts for their rest-room are a piano from Mr. Donnell, president of New Castle county, a flag from Mrs. Thacher, and a framed picture of Miss Willard from Delaware City W. C. T. U. Most of the soldiers have gone to Maine for the summer, and before leaving gave a reception to the St. Paul and Silverbrook Y's, who were chaperoned by Mrs. Donnell, and Mrs. L. W. Emerson, the faithful president of Wilmington union. Her union also gave a fine entertainment recently and cleared for them $100. They have $170 in their treasury, with which they propose to remodel their headquarters.

Activity in South Dakota.

Jubilee Convention Planned—"No License" Cry.

Alice R. Gossage, Correspondent.

RAPID CITY, S. D., June 19.—South Dakota is making an effort to hold a jubilee convention in September, at which time it is hoped the state debt will be cleared. An honor roll of $1.00 per member pledges is expected to bring about the desired end. Several new W's and a number of Y unions have recently been organized.

MISS NELLIE REED.

Considerable interest is taken in the district conventions, and excellent programs are being planned.

"No license" was the war cry in many South Dakota towns last spring, and in several was successful. The exact number is not obtainable, but an advance has certainly been made.

Among the comparatively new workers in the field is Miss Nellie Reed, of Huron, superintendent of the L. T. L. branch. She brings to her work a consecrated devotion that will surely bear much fruit.

News Items from Jersey.

Emily Ruth Kirby, Correspondent.

WOODSTOWN, N. J.—Mrs. I. H. Demarest, state corresponding secretary, spoke at the reception recently given by the Orange union.

Plainfield union is wise in having Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing for a series of seven lectures in one week in four churches. Mrs. Mary D. Tomlinson, the county president, and National superintendent of Red Letter Days, organized a colored legion with twenty-eight members.

Verona W. C. T. U., not two years old, has presented a portrait of Miss Willard to their public school, together with the "Beautiful Life" to the school library.

Among the evening speakers of our spring schools of method, held in the different counties, have been: Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, Mrs. Emilie U. Burgess, Miss Belle Kearney, Mrs. S. S. Fessenden, Mrs. Kate Lunden Sunderland, Mrs. Anna M. Hammer, Mrs. Cora E. Seberry.

Somerset county rejoices in the success of a "matron's medal contest," instead of having the usual evening lecture, which brought excellent country talent into use.

MISS EMILY RUTH KIRBY.

MISS ELIZABETH H. GOODWIN.

MISS EMILY B. STOKES.

Polygamy has been a prominent topic in every county, treated by such lights as Dr. Sarah Elliott, Jennie Fowler Willing, and Mrs. E. B. Dickinson, daughter of our state president.

Our state superintendent of Peace and Arbitration, who is also Gloucester county's recording secretary, Miss Emily B. Stokes, has removed from Philadelphia to her summer home at Woodbury.

Miss Elizabeth H. Goodwin, the efficient Y leader of the state, sailed on the 20th inst. for a trip abroad too late, however, for the World's Convention at Geneva, to which she was appointed a delegate.

John G. Woolley and Miss Belle Kearney are the evening speakers at the famous Ocean Grove meetings July 22 and 23.

Good Tidings from California.

Mrs. Kuhl's Active Work—Interesting Boys and Girls in Temperance Literature—Franchise Work.

Mrs. Dorcas J. Spencer, Correspondent.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., June 12.—Mrs. M. E. Kuhl, of Chicago, has done some good work in California, as she passed thru on her way to Montana, having visited twelve towns, held twenty-five meetings and organized two county and four local unions, made thirty-two personal visits and enrolled fifty-five names for membership.

MRS. DORCAS J. SPENCER.

County conventions have followed each other rapidly, and have been uniformly of a high order.

The Tri-County union—Santa Cruz, San Benito and Monterey,—offered prizes for the best essays on "The Effects of Alcoholic Drink" and "The Effects of Cigaret Smoking"—$5 for each first prize and $2 for seconds; all others to have The Crusader Monthly one year. Fifty-three girls and forty-three boys, between ten and sixteen years old, competed.

The cigaret prize essays were all written by boys; the prizes for the drink essays all going to girls—and ninety-six young people have The Crusader Monthly next year; and what is better, all the training and influence it will give them.

The Franchise department of this state has two Red Letter Days, the birthday of the president, Mrs. Sturtevant-Peet, and that of Miss Sarah M. Severance, the state superintendent. The first occurred April 27, and was well observed by many of the unions. Miss Severance prepared an excellent program for a parlor meeting, which was published beforehand in the state paper, giving time to work it up well. The result was an unusual call for Franchise literature, and many successful meetings.

Action Postponed on the Philippine Opium Bill.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Secretary Root has decided that nothing further shall be done regarding the proposed opium act of the Philippine commission until it has had the most careful consideration here in Washington. The commission has been so informed by cable, and the opium bill, which had passed its second reading, will remain in its present condition until the Secretary of War reaches a conclusion. Many protests have been received at the department against the proposed law, and the Secretary has been urged to take steps to prohibit the sale of opium entirely.

Illinois Notes.

The Coming State Convention—Recent Cook County Institute.

CHICAGO, June 18.—Miss Marie C. Brehm, our state president, is at present filling dates in Indiana, thereby helping them to a "fighting chance" to catch up with Illinois. New unions are constantly being reported in our own state, the latest being at Kaneville, in Kane county, recently organized by the writer, with good prospects and fifteen members. Preparations for the state convention are going on briskly, with the prospect of 600 delegates coming to report all dues paid and a gain of 2,000 members. It is sometimes said that Illinois is in Chicago. Whether this be true or not, we expect that it will be Oct. 14 to 16, and will receive a royal welcome.

MRS. T. E. BASSETT.

The Cook county W. C. T. U. Institute, which, because of its importance, as representing the work in Chicago and suburbs, had been looked forward to with great interest, was held in Willard Hall, June 12. The meeting was well attended, more than three-fourths of the unions being represented. Mrs. T. E. Bassett, county president, occupied the chair, and Miss Brehm, state president, made many helpful suggestions and outlined plans for the coming state convention. The all-day meeting was full of interest. Mrs. Oliver Stewart gave some of her experiences while in Springfield attending sessions of the legislature, and made valuable suggestions as to best methods of working for measures in which we are interested.

Mrs. Jewett, managing editor UNION SIGNAL, gave a bright, hopeful talk in the interest of the paper, its attractions and needs, pleading for a reading constituency. Miss Bessie Palmer, state secretary Senior L. T. L., spoke of the convention to be held in Aurora in July, and also pledged help and loyalty of the young people to the work of the W. C. T. U.

The noon meeting was that day in charge of the Institute, and was an occasion of special profit and power. Dr. Driver, of the People's Church, gave one of his magnificent addresses.

Oregon Notes.

An Interesting Convention—Medal Contests Very Popular.

Special Correspondence.

NEWBERG, Ore., June 18.—Yamhill county held a very successful convention at Dundee Junction, May 26 and 27, the president, Mrs. Ida Montague Courtney, presiding. The reports show a good amount of work done in the county, the unions seeming to have gained in strength in the past six months. A gold medal contest was held in the evening. The convention adjourned to meet at Newberg in October.

Portland is holding a series of contests, having recently held two silver and one gold medal contests. Mrs. Harrison, superintendent for Central union, is wisely preparing for the diamond contest to be held at Chautauqua, Gladstone Park, early in July.

Newberg held a good contest in May, with two classes—oratorical and musical, the girls contesting for the oratorical medal while the boys contested for the musical medal. Flower Mission Day was duly observed by Newberg union, more than 100 bouquets being sent out. Mrs. Cutts, the newly elected president, is preparing to push the work the coming year.

Temperance Interest in the Old Dominion.

Successful County Conventions—Norfolk's Large Membership—A Splendid Temperance Church.

Mrs. Howard M. Hoge, Correspondent.

LINCOLN, Va., June 19.—On June 4 Henrico and Norfolk counties held their quarterly conventions. Henrico includes the city of Richmond with its many unions. The convention was entertained by the Newton union, which was organized in February by Mrs. M. W. Newton. Mrs. Otis H. Russell is the county president. There were forty-nine delegates in attendance. The ten unions in the county were represented.

MRS. LILLIAN A. SHEPHERD.

Mr. Norton and wife, traveling evangelists, were present and added to the interest. Mrs. Norton was one of the imprisoned Ohio crusaders. Flower Mission day was largely observed at the Penitentiary.

Norfolk county has the largest membership in the state. Sixty-eight delegates attended their convention held in Berkeley on the 4th. The corresponding secretary's report showed 688 active members. Last year this county paid dues for 451 members, so it is in a fair way to be a contestant for the National county membership banner. The county president, Mrs. R. H. Jones, who is well known as the former state president, writes: "Our women and preachers in Berkeley worked hard in the recent local option contest, but they were beaten by 126 votes. However, they are not discouraged as one man went out of the business voluntarily."

Southampton and Nansemond bi-county convention has just been pleasantly entertained by the Ivor Y. From Accomac county our state L. T. L. secretary, Mrs. Sue James, writes: "Our bi-county convention was held in the splendid new church at Wachapreague. I suppose this is the only church in Virginia that has temperance memorial windows in it; the W and Y have a large triple window with our motto, 'For God and Home and Native Land.' The L. T. L. has put in a double window with the state motto, and on this window hangs the county L. T. L. banner which they have held for three quarters.

Mrs. Unruh spoke at Danville, North Danville, and Charlottesville en route from North Carolina to Maryland. About forty new unions have been reported since our state convention. We fear all of these have not gone actively to work, but the general officers are doing their best to help get them established.

Virginia is fortunate in having a most capable corresponding secretary in Mrs. Lilian A. Shepherd. She sends out a package of helps and a letter to every union as soon as reported to her, and is very prompt in helping in every way she can.

YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH.

Conducted by Mrs. Clara Parrish-Wright, General Secretary.

Our New World's Secretary.

THE appointment of Mrs. Clara Parrish-Wright as World's secretary of the Young Woman's Branch, to fill out the unexpired term of Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, resigned, has been ratified by the World's Convention in her election to this important office. American Y's will rejoice at the honor conferred upon our beloved National secretary, and there will be an answering echo from the little sisters in far off Japan, to whom she is equally dear, and for whom she so eloquently pleads.

The Y's of the world owe much to Frances J. Barnes, and her name will ever be an inspiration to high ideals and glorious achievements. The strength of "the tie that binds" lies in its tenderness, its unfailing loyalty to cause and comrades. We salute our honorary secretary, who retires upon her well-earned laurels, and we pledge to her and to her successor our continued efforts for the grandest work the world has ever seen. We take special pleasure in announcing, in connection with Mrs. Parrish-Wright's election as World's General Secretary, the fact that the World's Y banner has been awarded to our American Y Branch. It has been in the keeping of the British Y's since the World's Convention at Edinburgh, and if we hold it on this side of the water, it will be by dint of hard work and faithfulness in paying dues, since the condition of award is the largest per cent increase in reported paid membership. With the new World's Secretary and the new World's banner in the States, we surely will not lack for the inspiration that engenders consecration and enthusiasm, the two strongest factors in the successful development of any organization. Let us rally round the flag and our intrepid leader, Clara Parrish-Wright.

THE EDITOR.

The World's Work.

MY DEAR YOUNG WOMEN:—I scarcely need tell you how gratified I am over the second report of Mrs. Campbell-Wells which appears elsewhere on this page. Nearly $200 have already been sent in as a result of the meetings on April 14, yet only a few dozen of our 1,500 local Y's have been heard from! When we began this special agitation, my faith did not reach a great amount this year—because it generally takes so long to "stir things up"—but now I am beginning to feel that many unions will be inspired by what others have given, and that in the next few weeks we shall receive an amount quite sufficient to cover the expense of Miss Smart's interpreter for the entire year. Isn't it delightful to contemplate?

Altho I sit here at my desk constantly these days my heart wings its way around the world many times each twenty-four hours and I have been so happy in studying the possibilities of a multiplication table in our missionary endeavor that I have dreamed of a time when the Y's of the States would support a representative altogether in the far East. Would you not be glad if this were so, and will you not all join me in this special effort and prayer?

I can hardly expect that all of you will see the need of this world-wide work as I see it, yet I know, too, that your hearts are strangely enlisted, and that thousands of you would make any sacrifice in order to bring our beautiful comrades of the Orient into closer and closer touch. The letters I receive from the girls of Japan speak of nothing so enthusiastically as of their admiration and love for our Kara Smart, and a heretofore unheard of work among them is possible if only we will do our part in sustaining her with our gold and our prayers.

I could not urge you to make so many sacrifices, my dear American young women, if I did not know that the more you give the more you have; that for every beautiful thought or wish you have for girls in other parts of the world a something comes into your own life that adds greatly to its beauty, enjoyment, and effectiveness. In fact, beloved comrades, there is no lasting beauty or enjoyment that does not come as a result of service; the desire to live and the living for others, the living outside one's self.

If you could only read between the lines of this message all that has really gone into it of "memories" of the days when I had the honor to be your representative abroad, our blessed Y chorus would have in it a new note of victory because every one would help.

Yours in the tie that binds,

CLARA PARRISH-WRIGHT.

Paris, Ill.

A "Working" Society.

[The following article in THE BAPTIST UNION contains so many helpful suggestions that we have adapted it to our own needs.—Ed.]

THERE are good and indifferent young people's societies; some are failures. Some seem to have died for lack of intelligent treatment, some because they were simply left to die. It is surprising to note how splendid young people, educated, in good social position, will sometimes permit a thing to go to pieces; it is also surprising to see how plain folks with little education, not much social position, working at hard, grinding employment every day, will take hold of such work and carry it on gloriously.

Plans will not work themselves. Some read splendidly on paper, but they require strong red blood to work them out. These "Ways of Doing Things" call for people who have red blood, and who are willing to spend some of it in this work. We will assume that a society has been organized, with a president, secretary, and various committees, etc., standing yonder waiting for orders. What shall we say to them?

What About the President?

You should be present at every meeting. You should carry a list of all the committees in your pocket, consulting that list often. See that the committees are at work, and all the members enlisted as they have been appointed. Keep after your chairmen. Hard work? The hardest you have ever tried, but it pays. Easy work may have large pay, but I have never known of it.

But here is a path for the president to walk in: Have a monthly committee meeting. Have all the committees meet at one time in one building, in separate places. Have them consider their work by themselves, preparing plans to report later that evening. After three-quarters of an hour of such consideration, bring them together as "a committee of the whole." The president is chairman of that committee. Ask each chairman to report what the committee has been talking about. Such brief report is itself a request for suggestions from the other committees. After each committee has so reported, have a free discussion of the entire work of the union. This plan will give a president a hold on the entire work of the union better than anything I know of.

See that the help given in THE UNION SIGNAL and the Y Year Book is wisely used; that helpers in various ways are secured. This plan is the best thing in the whole organization to bring about results. It gives help to timid leaders; assures the meetings of sympathetic helpers, for every meeting should have all these leaders in it. Take time to arrange your programs; have no papers read—if you can help it; give the people who take part time to absorb a few things, and they will give them much better. More "papers" have killed temperance meetings than have ever given them life. Do not have a long program. Make the meeting stand out bold and clear with one great thought—and have that driven home—the whole program completed in one hour. Do not rush about with a frantic air the Sunday before your meeting, urging somebody to help you out by reading "this." If you take time and lay out your work, people can be found to help you. It is a pity that people at large are frightened at a temperance meeting; but we have given them just cause to be. We have conducted the meetings after the manner of a department in dentistry, and most people do not like a dentist's chair. The trouble, is, also, that too often the skeleton of the program is the only thing displayed during the whole evening; people see where the joints are made, which is a poor thing—in a piece of furniture, a sermon, or a temperance program.

Then, scatter literature; keep scattering it. You might have a new, helpful tract every week, if you went after it. When you consider the help given each week in THE UNION SIGNAL, it is inconceivable how people can have dull meetings, or get at their programs too late to make them effective.

Gleanings.

The Kansas Y's are putting a window in the Frances Willard Hall on the Ottawa Chautauqua grounds.

Baltimore City has twelve Y societies. Mrs. Milton Stewart is the new city secretary elected to succeed Miss Emily Fullwood, resigned.

Under the head of Y engagements, the Young British Women's Temperance Association published a most interesting program for the annual meeting May 25.

The "Burger" W. C. T. U. of Edenton, Ohio, is the first parent society to contribute to the Kara Smart fund. We hope many other unions will follow their example.

Mrs. Lena Wallace, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, whose "Children's Band" appeared in this year's Y Almanac, bought and disposed of a hundred copies right from her own home.

The Y of Harrington, Delaware, organized by Mrs. Thacher in April with seven members, now numbers forty-two. The majority of these were secured on "May Day" by giving a May party.

In Colona, Colorado, a little country town without even a church, the Y secretary of the state, Miss Rose A. Davison, lately organized a Y. What may it not be to the young people of such a place!

North Dakota has secured the services of Miss Carrie Lee Carter and Mrs. Nelle Burger for several weeks' work each before the National, and Mrs. Grover is hopeful that many new Y's will be the result.

A prominent business man in a village of Wyoming county, New York, recently said: "The Y's are doing more for the young men of the place than anything else here." The society referred to has a large number of honorary members who help in the work by acting as superintendents of departments.

On the program of the Kent county (Maryland) convention June 4, appeared this topic: "Y graduating exercises." At the appointed hour the president of the society made a few remarks, at the close of which all the members stood while Miss Florence Hammond, state Y secretary, presented them to Mrs. Haslup, state president.

Miss Madeline Southard, while "waterbound" in the Indian Territory a few weeks ago, took advantage of the opportunity to revive the Ardmore Y's. At Norman, Oklahoma, she found that the society she had formed more than a year ago, was doing excellent work. They had had a course of lectures, had regular public programs with full houses, etc. They have also about three-fourths of the money necessary to build a reading room, and are an extremely popular society in every sense of the word.

OFFICE AND SITTING ROOM.

The Frances Willard.

By M. E. Gould.

Home for Business Women.

CORNER IN PARLOR.

VERY soon after the organization of the Chattanooga Woman's Christian Temperance Union the need was felt for a guarded home for the many unskilled girls who come to the city for employment fresh from rural homes and a mother's care.

For many years the desire to fill this need was the incentive in all the work of the Chattanooga Union. Many plans were undertaken, and in 1900 these resulted in "The Frances Willard," situated at No. 9 Oak street, Chattanooga, Tenn., a four-story building of pressed brick, erected at a cost of $14,000.

In the basement is a well equipped laundry, with stove, stationary washtubs, well lighted by day, and by electric lights at night, where the girls are at liberty to do their own washing without extra expense. In the front of the basement is a large room, designed especially for an industrial training school for those girls who would not otherwise be able to secure the benefit of such instruction. An efficient corps of officers and teachers, representing almost every church in the city, have charge, and teach reading, singing, sewing and physical culture, together with other branches of domestic training.

On the first floor are the beautifully furnished parlor, the office, and young ladies' sitting-room, matron's room, dining-room, pantry, storeroom and kitchen. The savory dishes of "Sally,'" the cook, are enjoyed by an appreciative family.

The rooms are completely and well furnished, and the parlor, office and sitting-room are always open to the girls and their friends. This is not a charitable institution, but a hotel, where everyone pays for her privileges and enjoys the society of her men and women friends, as in a well ordered home.

On the upper floors are the sleeping rooms, bathrooms, etc., all nicely furnished, and lighted by electricity. The cost of living is graded according to the rooms selected and the wages received by the occupants.

The home is presided over by a competent matron, but back of her is a board of nine directors, whose duty it is to see that the girls have proper care and oversight and that this institution is made a home in every sense of the word. A purchasing committee supplies everything needed in the home except articles for table use, and a visiting committee inspects all rooms from attic to basement.

The Willard is made self-supporting largely by the accommodation of transients and the excellent lunches that are served at fifteen cents a meal. If any surplus accumulates, it is turned into the furnishings or the comfort and convenience of the institution.

The home was built and is conducted for the avowed purpose of aiding those whose income does not allow them to pay hotel prices, and in order to surround girls with home protection, and it has proved a blessed work both to the promoters and to the girls.

A COURT SCENE.

HEREDITY FROM ALCOHOL.

By T. D. Crothers, M. D.

A YOUNG man from a good family committed an atrocious murder and was put on trial for his life. His grandfather had been an excessive drinker. His father and mother had both drank moderately at meals. His life and history indicated great brain feebleness and degrees of insanity for at least two years before the murder. Public sentiment was very strong against him at the trial. The district attorney had employed an able lawyer to assist him and he publicly announced that the cause of justice demanded the prisoner's death. Two distinguished physicians were retained to swear to the sanity of the prisoner. I was called as an expert in his defense. As the trial went on it was evident that the efforts of the state would be directed to break the force of my testimony as to the insanity of the prisoner. I answered the hypothetical question and explained it at some length for the defense, and then was cross-examined by the state's attorney, who was evidently determined to destroy the impression which I had produced on the jury.

The attorney was a man of keen intellect and a thoro master of the art of examining witnesses. After trying various methods to create confusion in my statements, he settled down to a scientific examination, insisting on exact answers without qualifications. As the examination progressed it was evident to both of us that we were surprising each other in questions and answers. There was in his questioning unmistakable indications of a very clear knowledge of the alcoholic mind and method of reasoning such as can never be described in books.

Altho two able physicians were seated at his side suggesting questions, it was evident that his knowledge of such cases was far superior to theirs, and the turns and forms of questions were revelations of familiarity with the subject that was a surprise to me.

At the close of the day's trial I concluded that a personal acquaintance with the attorney might give me an insight into his mentality that would be to my advantage in the next day's examination, which after a night of consultation and preparation would undoubtedly be still more severe. Upon being introduced by the judge, I, in an undertone, remarked to the attorney that I had never before been examined by any one who had such acute knowledge of the drink craze and its victims, and that I knew that this knowledge did not come from books. After a moment's hesitation he answered me with a quivering lip, "Yes, I know of this matter personally in my family and it has been a skeleton to me."

He asked me to come to his room at the hotel that evening for a personal talk. The interview lasted until midnight. He then told me of his only son who was expelled from college for drinking, and of how he had driven him away from his home against the advice of his wife, and that this son was now serving a life sentence for murder in a western prison. He spoke of his bitter feelings against the attitude his wife had taken, for she had insisted that the boy was diseased. This he himself could not believe, and he reviewed the heart burnings and sorrows which followed the death of his wife, and her steadfast faith in the mental sickness of the boy, and her disapproval of his own harshness; and how at her death he realized that she was right, but his pride and position made him fear to think of this subject seriously. He spoke of his own drinking days, and of his abstinence at his wife's request after the birth of his son. Even on this trial he did not dare to permit his feelings to assume the possibility of mental disease. I told him frankly that he made a mistake, that his wife was right, that his boy was a victim, the direct transmission of his own drinking habits.

We shook hands and parted with a cordiality which was not apparent in the next day's examination, and yet beneath the bluff and stern exterior I could see the real man struggling to put the question so that my answers would be the least favorable to his interest. The case was won. My testimony prevailed and the victim was placed in an insane asylum, where he died two years later. No one knew that our midnight interview saved this prisoner from judicial murder.

A few years afterward, this lawyer employed me as an expert in the defense of a similar case. At the close of the trial I went to his home and there was introduced to his son, a poor, harmless, half-idiotic man. No questions were asked, but I knew that he had only recently been released and brought home to die. The father's tenderness towards him showed this. The crime had been committed in another state and no one knew the facts of the case.

A year later this lawyer was found dead in his bed, and the boy was placed in a private asylum where he is now living. Fortunately, his mind is gone and he is unable to recall the past. This incident illustrates some of the startling facts not recognized, which can be traced through families of alcoholic heredity, followed by great misery and sorrow and often judicial murders. Poor alcoholized, insane men, whose parents and relatives are responsible, are constantly going to the gallows, and the harsh delusions of the law of sanity and reason are contradicted by every possible fact and condition.

Controlling all lesser things, this turbulent heart of mine,
He keepeth us under His folded wings in a peace serene—divine.

"So shall I quiet my heart, so shall I keep it still.
So shall I hush its tremulous start at tidings of good or ill;
So shall I silence my soul with a peacefulness deep and broad,
So shall I gather divine control in the infinite quiet of God.

He serves his country best
Who lives pure life and doeth righteous deed,
And walks straight paths, however others stray,
And leaves his sons as uttermost bequest,
A stainless record which all men may read;
This is the better way.

No drop but serves the slowly lifting tide;
No dew but has an errand to some flower;
No smallest star but sheds some helpful ray,
And man by man, each helping all the rest,
There is no better way.

Seth Brady's Freedom

By J. L. Harbour

A WOMAN and a little boy walked hand in hand down a country road at the close of a June day almost twenty years ago. They had left behind them a thriving little town, and had entered a long, wide lane, in which the grass grew thick and crisp and green by the roadside.

There were bluebells and "Johnny-jump-ups" in the shadowy corners of the zigzag rail fences; the sky was blue and cloudless; a soft, cool wind rose as the sun went down, and the shadows of the trees by the wayside cast longer shadows.

The woman was tall and thin, with slightly rounded shoulders. Her scanty black hair was lightly streaked with gray, and her face looked old and worn under the plain black straw hat she wore, but she was not an old woman. Her garments were worn and plain, as were those of the lad by her side. Perhaps he would not have cared to be called a little boy at this time, for he was now thirteen years old and he had a manly feeling on this particular day. It increased when his mother said, in the half-hesitating, rather awkward manner of one not much given to speaking words of compliment:

"You did splendidly this afternoon, Paul. I was right proud of you."

"Were you, mother?" said the boy, simply, but his face flushed with pleasure at this unexpected praise.

"Yes, I was, Paul. I had no idea you could speak up so well. I heard ev'ry word you said, and I set way back in a corner in the fur end of the room."

"I tried to speak up good and loud."

"Well, I'm sure ev'rybody heard you, and how they did clap when you sat down! It made me feel like—like—"

She did not finish the sentence, but she suddenly stooped over and silently kissed the boy, while her lips quivered and her gray eyes filled with tears. Paul glanced up in surprise. He was unused to such demonstrations of pleasure and affection on his mother's part, altho he knew that she was ready to make any sacrifice for his good, and that she cared for nothing more than his happiness.

After this little outburst of sympathy and affection Mrs. Brady and Paul walked on in silence until they came to a small unpainted house standing in the midst of a few cherry and apple trees a little distance back from the road at the end of the lane. This was their home, and here they lived alone most of the time, Paul's father, a carpenter, being away much of the year working at his trade in the neighboring towns and counties.

A little of Seth Brady's skill and some of his earnings spent in repairing and improving the old house would have made it a much more comfortable and attractive place than it was, for it had a leaky roof, rattling windows, sagging doors, loose floors, and boards were missing from all sides of the house.

There is an old and often true saying that shoemakers' wives wear unmended shoes, carpenters' houses are most frequently out of repair, and extended lengths of stovepipe take the place of chimneys in the homes of brick masons.

There was a sorrowful reason why this was true in the case of Seth Brady. Altho a man of many good and kindly traits, they were lost sight of or were kept in subjection by his fast increasing habit of drink. It was often said of him by his friends and acquaintances that Seth Brady was a good workman and a good man when he was not "in licker." But his appetite had become so strong that he was "in licker" most of the time.

Mrs. Brady had ceased to expect that any part of his occasional earnings would be used for the support of Paul and herself, or for the improvement of their home, which, poor as it was, would not be their own until several hundred dollars had been paid for the few acres of ground around it.

The public school in the town near which they lived had closed for the summer on the day our story opens, and Paul Brady had been invited to take part in the closing exercises. His mother had gone with him, and it was in regard to his declamation that she had spoken on their way home. She spoke about it again the next morning while they were eating their frugal breakfast.

"I intend that you shall go to school just as much as possible, Paul, and I want you to study hard and be a smart man. I lie awake nights thinking about how we must begin now to save and plan so you can go to college."

While they talked there came a knock at the door. Doctor Crane, who lived in the town, stood without.

"No, I can't come in," he said. "I am on my way to see a sick man over on the river road, and I just stopped to see Paul a moment. I found time to drop into the schoolhouse yesterday afternoon, Paul, and I heard you speak. You are quite an orator, sir."

"I am much obliged to you for saying so, sir," replied Paul politely, but with downcast eyes.

"Yes, you are," said Dr. Crane heartily; "and what I want to say is this: You've heard, I suppose, that we town folks are getting up a celebration for the Fourth of July. I am one of the committee on the program. Of course, we'll have the Declaration read, and the congressman of our district will make a speech, but we want the school children to take some part. They are to sing "The Star-Spangled Banner," and we want a couple of declamations, and I want Paul to speak one of them. You can do it, can't you, Paul?"

"Oh, I know he can," said Mrs. Brady quickly, intending by her words to give Paul confidence in himself. "What shall he speak about?"

"Well, I think he'd better decide that himself. He will know what he can speak best. Anything suitable to the day. I can depend on you, Paul?"

"Yes, sir."

"That's good. Don't be a bit afraid. You'll get along first rate, I'm sure," and Dr. Crane went on his way, leaving Mrs. Brady and Paul very happy in discussing this new honor that had come to them.

"They say the celebration is to be the biggest affair of the kind ever held in this county," said Mrs. Brady. "It won't be like speaking before your school. You are sure you won't be scared to stand up before such a crowd?"

"No,' said Paul decidedly. "I never feel a bit afraid speaking in public."

But what to speak was the question now to be decided upon. The celebration would take place in five days, and no time was to be lost.

Mrs. Brady finally suggested that Paul go to the town and ask his teacher to make a selection for him. His mother had but one fear regarding Paul's success, and of this she did not speak to him. She was afraid that, at the very last, Paul's father might "make trouble," a vague term, but one having a sorrowful meaning to the wives and children of drinking men who "make trouble" with every home-coming.

Mr. Brady was expected home on the day before the Fourth. It might be that he would not come, and Mrs. Brady could not help feeling that it would be better for Paul, perhaps, if his father did not come. He might, with the dogged intractability of a man made sullen and malicious by drink, positively refuse to allow Paul to attend the celebration at all. If he went himself, he would be almost certain to bring humiliation to his wife and boy while there. The day being one of jollity, would also be one of unusual temptation to a man like Mr. Brady, and his wife could not help being glad that the morning of the Fourth still found him absent.

A fairer day never dawned. The sun came up in a cloudless sky, and Paul was out while the dew was on the grass and the first notes of the birds were still ringing through the woods.

The ringing of bells and the booming of cannon in the distant town quickened the beating of his heart and filled it with boyish excitement and enthusiasm. He hurried through with his morning work, milking their one cow and driving her to pasture, feeding the chickens and turning old Whitey, the horse, into the pasture for a day of rest and freedom. Standing under a spreading oak, he recited his declamation with old Whitey and the cow for an audience.

"There, old fellow," he said, stroking old Whitey's mane when he had finished his piece in an outburst of boyish eloquence very creditable indeed, "don't you think I'll do myself proud today, sir? Wouldn't you like to come and hear me? Or would you rather kick up your heels on the grass or lie in the shade all day? Well, well, old fellow, when I am a little older I shall buy a younger horse, and you shall lie in the shade and browse on the grass all your days."

Strains of martial music coming from the town greeted his ears, and he hurried into the house to eat the breakfast already waiting for him. Then, dressed in old but neat and clean clothes, to which were added his first linen collar and a new blue necktie, he hurried into the town to join the other boys in the usual sports that preceded the regular exercises of the day.

It was a great day for Eldervale, a great day for the boys—a great day indeed for the boy of whom I write. His enthusiasm and his patriotism had reached their height when he took his place on the platform with the others who were to take part in the exercises. He was the most poorly dressed boy among them all. He did not mind that now, altho it was a little hard to have to sit on the platform among so many other boys whose new and handsome clothes made his own look still more shabby.

He caught sight of his mother sitting close to the platform, her gaze fixed lovingly upon him, and his loyalty to her made him forget everything but his determination that she should be proud of him that day.

When his name was called he stepped promptly forward, unawed by the sea of faces before him, but his lips almost grew dumb and his blood coursed hotly through his veins as he suddenly caught sight of one face upturned to his own—the red, bloated face of his father!

Unknown to his wife, Seth Brady sat within three feet of her, partly concealed by a tree. She leaned eagerly forward as she saw the sudden change and the signs of fear in Paul's face and manner. She tried to catch his eye, but could not, and she was greatly relieved when, after a moment's hesitation, his face grew calm, his voice steady and clear, penetrating to every part of the grove.

In that moment of hesitation Paul recalled a time when his father's face was frank and open, his eyes clear and his voice steady; a time when his father walked as a man among men, unfettered by the chains of intemperance. In that time, Paul remembered, his father had loved him tenderly and had been proud of him. He wondered if that love and that pride were all gone, and there came into his boyish heart a longing to kindle that affection anew, to make his father proud of him again.

His teacher, a man of a great deal of literary ability, had written an original oration for Paul, entitled "Freedom." It was a strong and eloquent appeal to men and women for freedom from all the follies and vices and belittling things of life. As all men were created free and equal, so should they live free from the slavery of unbridled human passions. The sorrowful slavery of the drunkard was not forgotten, and Paul had need of courage to speak such words with his father's eye upon him.

He could not see that those bleared eyes were filling with tears, and he did not know that his father's heart was throbbing wildly within him, touched as it had not been touched for years. His lips were quivering, his hands trembling, and he hardly knew what he was doing as he rose and walked toward the platform where he stood before them all. Reaching up until his hand touched Paul's, he said in a choking voice:

"Paul—Paul—my boy! You have set your father free! I'll not be a slave to the demon of drink another day! I'm going to be a free man. I—I—"

His words were lost in the shouts of applause that rang through the woods, for altho his words had been heard by but few, hundreds in the great audience knew who he was, and they rightly guessed what he was saying. Some of the best men in the town gave him a hearty hand grasp and spoke kindly words of encouragement, while they praised Paul and told his father that he should be proud of such a son.

Again a woman and a little boy walked down the long lane leading out of the town, but this time a man walked with them—a free man, for Seth Brady's freedom from intemperance began that day and continued thru all the years of his life that followed.

Children's Cozy Corner

Two Famous Old Homes. By Olive Clark.

IF anyone were to ask the children what is the most historic city in the United States I am pretty sure they would all with one accord shout "Boston!" And I think they are pretty near right, for I must confess to a heart-thrilling enthusiasm whenever I think of it. The most enjoyable visit of my life was made to this city of sacred and delightful memories.

Here the youthful patriots defied General Howe, and the older ones dumped the hated British tea into the harbor. Here is Bunker Hill monument, and quaint old Copp's Hill burying-ground, where British cannon balls played among the tombstones, and just a block or so away the old North Church, from whose tower warning lanterns were hung out for Paul Revere, who was watching for the signal to start him on his famous ride. Then there is the old South Church where so many thrilling Revolutionary speeches were made, and Fanueil Hall, whose walls have echoed to so many arraignments of wrong; and Boston Common, with its memorial monuments, where so many great and gifted people have walked and talked.

One might go on and on telling of interesting places and the memories connected with them till one would think present-day Boston did not possess much to talk about.

One of my pleasantest memories is my visit to Cambridge, now a suburb of Boston, and notable as the seat of Harvard University and the home of some of America's greatest writers. The beautiful old town, with its quiet, shady streets, is a dream of peace and the ideal home of genius. Here our best-beloved poet, Longfellow, lived and wrote for nearly half a century; and James Russell Lowell, the author of that wonderful poem, "The Vision of Sir Launfal," and many others, was not a far-distant neighbor.

I first went to Craigie House, the Longfellow home.

"Somewhat back from the village street Stands the old-fashioned country-seat."

And a lovely, restful old place it is! Beautiful tall trees shelter it on every side, and an old-fashioned garden is at one side. I had a letter of introduction, which was my passport to the interior of the house; so I marched up the broad steps to the front door and boldly lifted the great knocker, for you must know that Craigie House is very old, and that General Washington made it his headquarters when in Boston, and it was old then.

The great hall into which I was ushered contained an "old clock on the stairs," but it was not the one about which the celebrated poem was written—that was in the Plunkett mansion in Pittsfield, Mass., where Mrs. Longfellow's maternal grandfather lived. But we fancied we could hear the "voices soft and sweet" as "Descending the broad hall stair,

Grave Alice and laughing Allegra,
And Edith with golden hair,"

ELMWOOD, THE HOME OF LOWELL, CAMBRIDGE, MASS.

The library contains a rich collection of books and gifts from many friends and climes. In the center of the study was the round table where he worked, and on one side of it a small desk, with an opened letter and the writing materials just as he had left them a few weeks before. The inkstand once belonged to the poet Coleridge, and in the pen is a link from the chain of Bonnivard, the prisoner of Chillon. A desk was attached to the wall, for he often stood when writing. And there was the great, beautifully carved armchair, made from the "spreading chestnut tree" and presented to the poet by the school children. An orange tree in the window filled the room with fragrance, but it possessed a still sweeter and subtler fragrance—the memory of other days. In that room Washington held his war councils, and in Longfellow's time it was the meeting place of the Dante Club, to which James Russell Lowell, James T. Fields and other celebrated literary men came.

After my visit to Craigie House I went to Elmwood, the home of James Russell Lowell. When Craigie House was Washington's headquarters, Elmwood was a colonial hospital. This fine old house was built by a British lieutenant-governor. On September 2, 1774, the freeholders of Middlesex county assembled on the steps of this house and demanded the occupant, Thomas Oliver, to resign his commission under George III as lieutenant-governor. He complied with the request, but added to his signature the significant words, "My house at Cambridge being surrounded by five thousand people, in compliance with their command I sign my name." When he left for England the house was confiscated by the state.

Elbridge Gerry, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, once lived in it, but the children of this generation love it as the home of the poet Lowell. Although the estate comprises but a few acres, it gave the Lowell children opportunity to study birds, trees and flowers. To them it was a little world of wonder and beauty. They divided the land into different cities, and journeyed from one to another—a geographical play other children might use to advantage. Lowell was born in Elmwood and spent most of his life there.

1.—*What Is It?

I've a curious thing in my mind as I write;
A strange and mysterious thing;
And I oft think I've grasped it "to have and to hold,"
But it goes like the last snows of spring.
I will spell you the word if you listen with care:
A vegetable, common, comes first,
And then you must step in to help; then two crooks,

Old Mr. Brown's love for his daughter amounts almost to 1-2-3-4-5-6-7-8. Yet, in spite of his great wealth he is very 2-1-4-5-6-3-7-8 about supplying her with spending money. She has, however, a happy faculty of 5-2-7-3-1-6-4-8 winning from him whatever she likes.

3.—*Conundrum.

I sat and mused and thought and thought,
And mused and thought again.
I thought if Edward VII were tall
And lank and slim—what then?
If he, as I before remarked,
Were lank and slim, you see,
Why would this tall and slender king
Be very much like me?

My FIRST is seen in festive halls,
Where all is bright and full of play;
And yet its mournful strains are heard
Where sad-eyed sorrow holds her sway.

In brilliant garb and tinsel show
It marches on with drum and fife;
For e'en the humblest soldier boy
Is honored by its peals of life.

And when the Queen is laid to rest,
With tolling bells and cannon's roar,
In both processions comes my FIRST,
Proclaiming loud her reign is o'er.

Dick's Flower.

THE teacher asked, one soft spring day,
When slowly drag the study hours,
And healthy children long for play,
"My dears, what are your favorite flowers?"

Said Marion slowly, "I suppose
My favorite flower is the rose."
"Mine is the lily," answered Sue.
"I love," said Bess, "the violet blue."

"And I," laughed Jim, "the hollyhock."
But Dick replied, with rougish look,
Tossing aside his slate and book,
"Give me the four-o-clock."

Worker and Shirker.

COME on!" cried the brook, as it hurried along,
"There's ever so much that waits to be done;
There are meadows to water, and mill-wheels to turn,
And more things to work as the farther I run!"

"You can go if you choose," said the pond; "as for me,
I will stay where I am; I hate effort and strife:
I've no fancy for work—no, indeed, not a bit!
I shall lie here in comfort the rest of my life."

"Well, good-bye!" said the brook, and was off and away,
To play with the children and freshen the earth;
It dimpled and rippled and sang at its work,
And brightened the land with its toil and its mirth.

But the pond lay there idle' and slept at its ease,
And thought itself clever, until, one fine day,
The farmer espied it, all stagnant and green,
And—alas for its comfort! he drained it away.

Latter Day Patriotism.

HAS our American patriotism become such a weak and anæmic affair that it needs to be stimulated by alcohol in order to maintain an existence? Such is evidently the opinion of the citizens of Bay City. The state of Michigan has upon its statute books a law prohibiting open saloons upon legal holidays; but Bay City, feeling that their patriotism was not equal to the effort of a celebration of Independence Day without the aid of alcoholic stimulants, passed an ordinance, under the authority of a charter amendment contravening the state law, permitting the saloons of their city to remain open upon national holidays. The argument advanced in favor of this somewhat high-handed measure seems to be that Independence and Labor Days would prove to be very tame and dull affairs for the workingmen if they were denied the privilege of the dramshop to aid them in their celebration.

Time was when our patriotism contained within itself such superabundant vitality that not only was it self-sustaining, but it furnished to an entire nation an elixir which impelled the people to deeds of heroism and self-sacrifice, which put iron into the blood and fire into the eye, and transformed a company of untrained farmer boys into an invincible army before which the British forces quailed. Can it be true that in these latter days our patriotism, instead of imparting strength, must be coddled and nursed?

While patriotism thrives in all zones, and is as vigorous and full of vitality in a community whose people live in hovels as in mansions and palaces, there are certain hygienic conditions which need to be observed in order to insure its preservation.

First, it must have proper nourishment, regularly administered. In many a land where the treasury is full to repletion, patriotism has slowly starved to death from sheer neglect. Nothing so nourishes patriotism as memory of past glories and victories, a review of the days when our redemption was purchased with the blood of brave, true men. For no other reason have there been placed upon our statute books laws regarding the observance of stated days and periods for the fostering of this love of country. If, in the place of these national love-feasts, we shall come to substitute days of "Self-indulgence," and "Slavery to appetite" we are by slow starvation putting an end to our patriotism.

Altho the spirit of patriotism easily adjusts itself to the varied civilizations of the world, there is one atmosphere in which it cannot breathe—the atmosphere of self-indulgence. In those countries where men have enslaved themselves to evil passions and appetite, altho in a governmental sense republics, we shall find a stunted, impoverished, and dying patriotism. A city or nation which tampers with its days of national inspiration is exhausting the vital air which gives it life, and substituting in its place a noxious gas.

And, lastly, there may be reason to fear that our latter day patriotism is growing somewhat sluggish and torpid for lack of vigorous and constant exercise. The field for such exertion is broad enough without encouraging international complications. Let it engage in a strenuous boxing contest with the saloon power. Let it develop its muscle in downing the gambling trusts. Let it improve its circulation by a hand-to-hand encounter with the social evil. Let it continuously and persistently grapple with those forces of evil which menace our country, and its fibre will grow firm and hard, and its form expand, and it shall become a choice expression of our national life.

Our Navy and the Saloon

THE anti-saloon element of Bremerton, Wash., are fortunate in having none other than the government of the United States as an unusually strong advocate in their efforts to reform their town. Even tho Acting Secretary Darling of the navy department disavows any intention of instituting a temperance campaign in the town, the fact remains that the action of the department has been a strong factor in bringing about safer and more wholesome conditions. Word having been received at Washington of the immoral conditions in the vicinity of the navy yard, it was decided not to send any more ships to that yard. As nearly $250,000 was to have been expended at the navy yard during the following six months, this decision proved a strong argument in favor of the anti-saloon movement.

It was Ruskin who said that the architecture of a nation was certain to reflect that nation's weaknesses and vices, to be read by all future generations. The United States government evidently does not intend to give the powers of Europe an opportunity of discovering in the architecture of its navy any trace of its great national vice. Says Secretary Darling: "We will not submit to the existence of numerous saloons at the approach to the navy yard, as experience has shown that under such conditions only inferior work can be done on ships in dock." Every element of skill and strength available must be secured for the construction of those ships which shall sail the high seas and be scrutinized and tested by the nations of the world. Each and all of them must be strong enough to weather the severest tempest, fleet enough to outrace the swiftest enemy, stout enough to withstand the shell and shot of attacking forces. The workmanship and the material must be the best the country affords, for by our navy are we judged.

While no one can question the sagacity of our navy department in its precautionary measures, there is other building going on in this commonwealth which deserves equal consideration and protection. In the great cities of our land are being builded other craft, and whether the workmanship be true or false, heedless or careful, by it we as a nation shall be judged for time and eternity. Down in yonder city night and day there never ceases for a moment the character-building process. Where the air is full of the taint of liquor foundations are being laid in child life; where the saloon and the brothel and the gambling house form the boundaries of the life in its youth, the superstructure of manhood and womanhood is being reared. Is it not a pertinent question to propound to government—national, state, and city—whether "under such conditions anything but inferior work can be done"; whether in such an environment these little vessels, so richly freighted with immortal souls, can be builded strong and swift and safe to sail upon those tempestuous seas for which they are destined, sure to be beset upon every hand by dangerous shoals and rocks of temptation, certain to meet and engage in encounter with the pirates of appetite and impurity and vice? Our great and wise government fears to trust its fleets in the process of making in such localities; how much greater the danger to those delicate and intricate structures by which the strength of our country is some day to be tested.

If as a nation we are more anxious to pose before the world as a navy-building nation than as a man-making nation; if we prefer to be judged by the ship rather than by the manhood test, we are adopting a logical course. But if, as in the past, manhood is to be the standard by which we rise or fall in the estimation of all time, let us put about the building of young lives the same safeguards and protection demanded for our navy.

The Opium Monopoly Bill. A bill is now pending in Manila for a monopoly in opium joints in the Philippines, to be sold to the highest bidder. The officers of the National W. C. T. U. have already memorialized President Roosevelt on this subject, as no doubt other societies have done, and an order has been given to delay action on the bill. Let no one be blinded by the proposition to use the proceeds of this sale in bringing young Filipinos to this country to be educated, or by any proviso in regard to the manner of sale or to whom sold. The trade is wholly vile, degrading and unchristian, and the results of a monopoly as seen in India under the British government, are so monstrous that the system is now being gradually abandoned. Such a procedure would be an open shame to the United States and a source of untold misery. The W. C. T. U. officers of our several states and of all of our unions are urgently asked to protest at once to the President of the United States. Do not appeal to the War Department but direct to the President. Get churches and various assemblies to act. Get voters to act. Ask all to send a letter at once, or better still, a telegram, to the President, urging him to exercise his fullest power for the defeat of the opium monopoly bill now pending in Manila, P. I. Do not delay a single day or this infamy may be fastened upon the United States government.

Miss Slack Bereaved Following close upon the announcement of the re-election of Miss Agnes E. Slack as honorary secretary of the British Woman's Temperance Association, comes the news of the death of her beloved mother, Mrs. M. A. Slack, of Ripley, Derbyshire, England, this sad event occurring while the annual council meetings of the B. W. T. A. were in session. Despite her grief Miss Agnes Slack proceeded to the World's Convention at Geneva, the call to duty being her first consideration. Miss Slack's long service as World's secretary has made her name familiar to American white-ribboners, who will join their comrades of other countries in tendering her the sincerest sympathy.

Our Losses by Flood. While our readers have been made acquainted through the daily press with the distressing features of the terrible flood that has devastated portions of several of the western states, they will read with interest the extracts we print on another page from letters sent us by our workers in the afflicted states. Their graphic pen pictures invest the disaster with the realism of an account by eye witnesses. It is gratifying to note that our devoted women are among the foremost and most active in giving relief, proving that they are always ready for every good word and work.

World's Convention Number The complete report of our World's Convention will be issued immediately after our special L. T. L. number, July 2. We believe that the excellence of this World's Convention number will compensate our friends for the delay in its appearance, which is due to the length of time required to get reports and photographs from Switzerland. Lady Henry Somerset's address will be a feature of this number.

Kansas to the Front. The first union to win a place on our Roll of Honor is Spring Creek, a country union in Kansas. This result was accomplished by the faithful work of Mrs. Fannie Whitney, the president of the union, and THE UNION SIGNAL superintendent for the Sixth district. Hurrah for Kansas!

Pathetic Stories by Eye Witnesses.

Reports from Our Workers in the Flood Districts.

W. C. T. U. Women Homeless.

MRS. Belle C. Kimball state president of Missouri, writes us a long, newsy letter from Kirkwood, from which we make the following notes:

The terrible floods in the state have seriously affected W. C. T. U. work. Many of the speakers could not keep a number of their appointments, owing to the railroad tracks in some sections of the state being so deeply submerged as to prevent the running of trains. Flower Mission Day was to have been observed at the state penitentiary at Jefferson City, and quantities of flowers had been collected in various parts of the state for this purpose; but the observance had to be postponed for lack of transportation. After speaking of the danger of famine in coal and food in St. Louis and vicinity she sympathetically says:

"But we have scarcely thought of these things for our hearts have been stirred with the loss of life and distress of the thousands of people who have been rescued from the flooded districts of Missouri and Illinois and are coming into St. Louis and vicinity to be clothed and fed. So our W. C. T. U. women are now working for their relief. We are busy packing boxes and barrels of clothing to send to St. Louis, East St. Louis and Arkansas. We are also making collections of money and bedding. * * * * With all this distress around us, Kirkwood had a big local option fight last Saturday, and won the day."

Miss Ellen D. Morris, corresponding secretary of Missouri, writes from Savannah, that while not suffering from the flood our women there are "lending a hand" to help provide for the flood sufferers.

Mrs. Sarah J. Blackman writes from Ottawa, Kan., giving some interesting particulars. While not suffering from the flood to any distressing extent, still it was near enough to give a realizing sense of its horrors. For a distance of 200 miles farms along the Kansas river suffered more or less.

The Ottawa Republic gives a graphic description of the work our W. C. T. U. women have been doing for the helpless victims of the flood:

"A right busy place is the W. C. T. U. headquarters. There are several rooms in the suite and numerous sewing machines are clattering in each one of them. Engrossed women are bending over benches and tables, cutting, fashioning and arranging garments.

In an ante-room is a monster pile of other garments that have been turned, completed, from the hands of the workers. There are dresses, big and little in prime condition; there are skirts, and robes, and jackets, and shirts, and even a great pile of men's clothing. For this is the headquarters of the W. C. T. U. collection of supplies for the flood sufferers, and all ages and condition of mankind were reduced to the same level of distress and the needs of all must be supplied.

"Goodness! We've never counted. We have been too busy to enumerate garments," she explained. "There is so much need of great haste in getting these supplies into the hands of those suffering for them. We have just cut, and sewed and repaired, too glad to have the articles come to stop and count them."

"How did you get them?" asked the curious reporter.

"The papers did it; they and the telephone. Some of us have kept the wires busy asking our friends for garments and material. And there has been most generous response. Everybody has been glad to give. We have a host of things besides clothing; bedding, good, warm comforts and blankets and sheets and—and—everything. * * * * * It is the intention to send the bulk to Topeka and Kansas City, Kans., and little, neglected Argentine will not be forgotten."

Mrs. I. H. Ewalt collected a box of clothing to send to Manhattan which suffered severely.

The W. C. T. U. at Le Loup, Kans., raised over $25 and gathered a quantity of clothing which will go to two or three families of farmers whose farms lay along the valley of Kansas river, and who lost all by the flood. A most commendable act, as the isolated farmers are often forgotten in the larger sympathy compelled by suffering in cities.

The Hutchinson News draws a temperance lesson from one of the incidents of the flood. It says: "Among the items of news of the flood district that come from Kansas City, Kansas, is that the joints are closed. The order is issued by the chief of police and is the same that is always issued when there are times of great trouble, When men are out on strikes and trouble is threatened, one of the first acts of the authorities charged with preserving order is to close the saloons. If it is best for public safety to have them closed at that time why should it not be best to have them closed at others? No such order is issued against any other places of business. The facts are that they are recognized as breeders of lawlessness whether at such times as these or when society is in its normal condition."

GETTING OUT OF THE FLOODED DISTRICT AT KANSAS CITY.

Dr. A. M. Hutchinson, of Hutchinson, Kan., husband of our Kansas state president, writes a long, newsy letter, in which he gives a description of the flood in that locality, which, while doing great damage to crops, was not destructive of human life. The water came up to the first floor of the Hutchinson residence, and the family were taken on horseback to higher ground. Mrs. Carrie Hill, state superintendent of Temperance Literature, and Mrs. M. C. Gillette, superintendent of Social Meetings, both had their houses flooded. The musical jubilee at Hutchinson was postponed for two weeks.

"The history of this awful flood can never be written. * * * * * Twenty thousand people are homeless. Armourdale is completely swept away, a city of ten or twelve thousand people, and some say it will never be rebuilt. The suddenness of the flood is what caused so many to be caught. Saturday evening people left their places of business in "the bottoms," thinking that, of course, the water would not reach them, to return on Sunday morning to find that from six to fifteen feet of water raged through their offices.

"What a sight! Houses, freight cars, droves of hogs, sheep, cattle, going down the river in a boiling, roaring current. On the drift were dogs piteously howling, cats mewing, pigs squealing, and rats, all doing their best to cling to the shifting timbers, while all about people, caged in the second stories, were shouting, shooting guns, waving white signals, all crying for help.

"To add to the disaster, the brick buildings, founded mostly upon sandy foundations, began to crumble and fall. And worse still, cars filled with lime caught fire and set fire to the cars. The trestle work of bridges caught fire, and at one time the black smoke so covered the elevated structure upon which we were that we feared we were cut off from the bluff a mile away. This happily proved untrue.

"Our city has no water, no gas, no electricity, no street cars. The police force has been enlarged by the addition of the Third Regiment Guards. The government has ordered a number of soldiers from Fort Leavenworth, thirty miles above, to patrol the two cities to protect them from fires and burglaries. The great convention hall and the churches are opened to house the thousands of homeless. Nearly $40,000 was at once raised for the care of the destitute. Food and clothing are provided. A famine has been narrowly averted by the possibility of getting in trains with provisions from Chicago and St. Louis."

Mrs. Fannie Holsinger, state recording secretary, gives a pitiful picture of the destruction at Argentine. She says:

"Argentine is in a dreadful condition. The destruction is awful. I was over there a few days ago and the sight is sickening, the odor worse. People were digging furniture and household goods out of the mud—chairs, sewing machines, tables, pianos—all mud and hardly recognizable. While I was looking on Mrs. Way, who was our county treasurer for many years, came to me. I was so glad to see her and asked her where she lived. She said with a faltering voice, 'I did live over there,' pointing to the place, "but everything is gone."

"The destruction is so terrible. It is indescribable. The river extended from bluff to bluff, and houses toppled over and went down the stream like toys. Just think what it meant to have all those large factories and packing houses stopped. No smoke, no sign of industry, nothing but water and desolation; for many days no light, no drinking water, no street cars, and only two lines of railroad out from Kansas City. * * * * * "I went to see some of the people this morning whom we have supplied with tents. They can live, but it is poor living. One family had for a stove a piece of sheet iron on top of some stones; another had a grate out of a gasoline oven, each end supported by a stone. Some have beds, but neither pillows nor sheets; some have a few dishes; some have rescued a few pieces from the flood; some find the remnant of their houses blocks away; many no trace of them. Many of the stone and brick buildings are settling in the mud and are unfit for use because unsafe and must be torn down."

Non-Alcoholic Medication

THE prize contest in this department was something of a disappointment. Only twenty entries in all were made; four of these were entered as humorous articles; two as orations, two as poems, and the remainder as stories. In addition to these several sent stories to help the work, without entering them in the contest. To all the kind friends who sent articles I wish to here express my sincere thanks. The best of these will be published in leaflet form later on, and will, I hope, add to the interest of department meetings.

The judges chosen to award the prizes are not members of the W. C. T. U., yet are in sympathy with the spirit of our work; they were unacquainted with any contestant, hence could not be accused of partiality. The prize for the best story was unanimously awarded to "A Life's Tragedy," written by Mrs. Lora S. La Mance, of Pineville, Mo. As none of the four humorous entries exactly meet the requirements, and yet all have merit, the judges desire a little more time for decision upon them. One entry of these is from Tennessee, one from Indiana, and two from New York. These four contestants will be notified by letter of the judges' decision as soon as possible after it is given. The judges regret that the two poems and two orations entered do not meet the requirements, so there is no contest upon them.

It seems strange that so few entries were made with such good prizes offered. Possibly the condition of purchasing the department book was the main hindrance. Yet it should not have been a hindrance, for it is well worth more than its price in any home, and certainly it should be in every W. C. T. U. home. Think of the dollars saved if its warnings regarding patent medicines were known and heeded! Think of the lives that might be saved if all its teachings were followed! It may interest some to know that this book has been deemed worthy of a place in the library of Harvard University. I should be glad if superintendents of literature, or conductors of institutes, or presidents of counties would correspond with me about the sale of the book. It is not doing any good packed away in boxes, but would do marvelous things for total abstinence if used for study in all our unions, if only for ten or fifteen minutes at each meeting, and loaned to physicians, ministers, teachers, and other leaders of thought.

Dr. Cordelia A. Greene, of Castile, N. Y., has written, at my request, a very helpful and much-needed leaflet entitled "Special Medical Directions for Women." It is for private circulation among young women or mothers of girls. Price, single copies, two cents; seventy-five cents per 100.

How many of you know that you can get a sample package of department leaflets for fifteen cents? The package contains one of each of the following: "Safe Remedies in Illness," compiled from writings of well-known physicians; "Is Alcohol Useful or Necessary as Medicine?"; "The Danger of Patent Medicines," edition of 1903 has a page of new matter; "Reasons Why Alcohol is Dangerous as Medicine", "Alcohol and Children"; "European Opinions of Alcohol"; "Alcohol Not a Food"; "Comparative Death-Rates With and Without Alcohol"; "Alcohol and Nursing Mothers"; "Give No Alcohol to Children"; "Special Medical Directions for Women"; a large pamphlet by Prof. Kassowitz, of Vienna, Austria, suitable to give to physicians, and a copy of the last report of the department, showing what is being done, also a descriptive circular of the book, "Alcohol a Dangerous and Unnecessary Medicine." Any union possessing the book and the sample package has abundant material for adding interest and zest to its regular meetings by brief selected readings.

It would be of great service to the department if any who know of persons becoming addicted to drink habits through the medical use of alcoholic drinks, or through patent medicines, would furnish me with the facts of such cases briefly written. Our arguments can be greatly strengthened by the publication of facts of this kind. No names need be given. Physicians might be willing to tell of those who have become victims of patent medicines if assured that no names are required.

World's W. C. T. U.

Tenth Annual Meeting of the Japanese Union.

THE Japanese Woman's Christian Temperance Union held a most interesting and profitable National convention at Kobe, April 2-4. All sessions were held in the Kobe Congregational Church, a large building, which had been very prettily decorated in honor of the occasion.

Over forty delegates and visitors from distant towns and cities were in attendance, besides a large number of the ladies of Kobe. The evening meetings were most enthusiastic, and the main audience room, together with the galleries, were packed with those who came to hear.

The society has thirty-seven local branches, with a due-paying membership of 2,206, and reports from these show that much earnest work has been done during the year, especially in the departments of Social Purity, Rescue, Mothers' Meetings and Literature. Nearly thirty societies have contributed to the temperance work at the Osaka Exhibition.

The society at Asahigawa, Hokkaido, has rescued twenty-five erring sisters, of whom three have been converted and are to be baptized soon. Through the efforts of the members of the society at Nagasaki thirteen saloons have been closed.

Under new literature published this year we find three leaflets: "Is there Need of a Y?"; "Why Should a Christian Girl Sign the Total Abstinence Pledge?"; and "Arsenic in Beer." Two small pamphlets entitled "The Mother," designed especially for mothers' meetings, and "Women Prominent in Temperance Work," containing short biographical sketches of Frances Willard and the white-ribbon missionaries sent to Japan, have also been published. Two songs from the White Ribbon Hymnal have been translated and were used at the annual meeting. Other helps are under way. Thirteen hundred copies of the society's national magazine, "Woman's Herald," have been printed and distributed. The debt on this has been reduced to sixty yen.

The total receipts of the society for the year were 220.61 yen, of which 166.68 yen have been disbursed. One society, Kobe, reported over 250 yen as raised and expended during the year.

Lengthy discussions were held on the following subjects: "What to do when first organized:" "How to increase circulation of temperance literature:" "How shall we increase our finances?" "How can we increase our membership?" "Our difficulties, and how to solve them;" "Best methods of work."

Your World's representative gave a long and suggestive talk on department work, or what to do and how to do it.

A part of the Saturday afternoon session was devoted to a social meeting, at which an interesting program was given in honor of Mrs. Yajima's seventy-second year, and she was presented with a very nice gold watch by the National society. The Tokyo and Yokohama local societies gave her a beautiful white satin banner upon which a white-ribbon bound globe and the motto "For God and Home and Native Land," in gold letters, had been artistically painted.

Mrs. Yajima made a beautiful response to all these expressions of respect and love, and the convention closed with the singing of the national anthem and prayer.

The meeting voted to send an invitation to the World's organization to hold its next bi-annual meeting in Tokyo, Japan. It also decided to send to the Geneva meeting the national flags and a native dress, inasmuch as it was impossible to send anyone as a delegate to that gathering.

Many plans were made and outlined for this year's work, chief among which were those for increasing the membership and becoming more firmly grounded in the foundation principles of the organization. In order to accomplish this last department work will be pushed with vigor, especially in those departments that relate to scientific temperance education, anti-narcotics, purity work, which includes rescue work, mothers' meetings, and work for the children and young people.

A program outlining a program for each monthly meeting for the year has been prepared and printed for the use of the local societies.

The delegates pledged themselves to do all possible to get subscribers for Mr. Ando's temperance text-book, "Health for Little Folks"; to enforce the anti-cigaret law and disseminate information in regard thereto; abolish beer-halls; to abolish smoking-cars on the railroads; to prevent the employment of young women on the railroads; to stop cruel treatment of factory girls; to encourage reforms in the home and better customs in the nation; to be strictly temperate; to keep the Sabbath and get others to do so; to cultivate a taste for music; to try to maintain peace in society; and to improve the finances of the organization.

The delegates and officers expressed themselves as greatly helped by the meeting and well satisfied with its results.

The outlook for a year of hard work and progress is encouraging and hopeful.

Promoted.

The pure soul of Deborah W. Brown, of Barclay, Kan., peacefully went home on the morning of May 20. Mrs. Brown was reared in the Friend's church and for twenty years was a member of the W. C. T. U. She had been for several years the faithful state superintendent of the Peace department.

Mrs. Emeline Hicks, the oldest member of Rensselaer County, N. Y., W. C. T. U., passed away at her home in Lansingburgh at the ripe age of eighty-seven years. For twenty-three years she had been identified with the temperance movement and particularly interested in the enfranchisement of women. Mrs. Hicks was a writer of marked ability, and to the end of her life showed remarkable interest in all reform work. She will be greatly missed, and her memory will be tenderly cherished by all who knew her.

BRAIN BUILDING.

How to Feed Nervous Cases.

Hysteria sometimes leads to insanity and should be treated through feeding the brain and nerves upon scientifically selected food that restores the lost delicate gray matter. Proof of the power of the brain food Grape-Nuts is remarkably strong.

"About eight years ago when working very hard as a court stenographer I collapsed physically and then nervously and was taken to the State Hospital for the insane at Lincoln, Neb., a raving maniac.

"They had to keep me in a straitjacket and I was kept in the worst ward for three months. I was finally dismissed in the following May but did no brain work for years until last fall when I was persuaded to take the testimony in two cases. One of these was a murder case and the strain upon my nervous system was so great that I would have broken down again except for the strength I had built up by the use of Grape-Nuts. When I began to feel the pressure of the work on my brain and nerves I simply increased the amount of Grape-Nuts and used the food more regularly.

"I now feel like my old self again and am healthy and happy. I am sure that if I had known of Grape-Nuts when I had my trouble 8 years ago I would never have collapsed and this dark spot in my life would never have happened. Grape-Nuts' power as a brain food is simply wonderful and I do not believe any stomach is so weak that it cannot digest this wonderful food. I feel a delicacy about having my name appear in public but if you think it would help any poor sufferer you can use it." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

There are desserts and desserts. The delicious health-giving kind are told about in the little recipe book found in each package of Grape-Nuts.

W. C. T. U. Notes.

The Arizona Territorial convention will be held at Mesa in October.

The W. C. T. U. of Philadelphia, Pa., has bought real estate costing $6,700.

The Pennsylvania L. T. L. holds its state convention at Lancaster, June 29-July 2.

The Y at Pulaski, Ill., numbers about fifty members. It meets each week, and the meetings are always interesting.

The union at Chincoteague, Va., has held mass meetings, circulated petitions and are now working for a local option election in July.

The union at Amarillo, Texas, presented the county judge a petition more than ten feet long against the liquor traffic in the town.

The union at Stamford, Texas, is entertaining the young people of the city one evening each month. The meetings are very successful.

A curfew ordinance has been introduced in the city council of Scranton, Pa. The measure is being vigorously supported by the W. C. T. U.

The North Side, Central and Brainerd unions of Denver, Colo., have asked for the reinstatement of Mr. F. M. Irish, former superintendent of the Industrial School.

The Allegheny county, Pa., convention was held at Homestead. A discussion of patent medicines resulted in the adoption by the convention of a resolution against their use.

"School Savings Banks" was the topic discussed by the Owosso, Mich., union. A Morris chair was presented to the janitor in appreciation of the many courtesies extended by him.

The union at Eldorado, Kan., holds a Mother's Conference each month. "Non-Alcoholic Medication" was the subject of the last one. The program was well prepared and the meeting very interesting.

Fort Worth, Texas, will place water barrels upon the principal streets as was done last year. This beautiful work of giving a cup of clean ice water to all who are thirsty is the work of the W. C. T. U., of course.

The union at Verona, N. J., supports an L. T. L. During the past year a picture of Miss Willard has been placed in each room of the public schools and "The Beautiful Life of Frances E. Willard," by Miss Anna Gordon, in the school library.

The union at Lansingburgh, N. Y., held an oratorical gold and silver musical contest, which was a social and financial success, netting over fifty dollars to the treasury. Arrangements are being made for another double contest to be held July 1.

During the Michigan State convention held at Adrian, Dr. Mary Wood-Allen, Mrs. Ella A. Boole and Mrs. Annie Andrus addressed the young people of the city at a special meeting. The church was beautifully decorated and the interesting program was enjoyed by the many school children present.

Mrs. Lucia F. Additon, of Portland, Ore., National organizer, is at her old home in Abington, Mass. The local union observed Flower Mission day by holding an institute with Mrs. Additon as leader. Her tact, keenness of perception, and brightness of manner makes her a good institute worker.

The union which was organized last February at Quincy, Mass., has done much work in the four months of its existence. It holds its meetings regularly, and has secured the signatures to the anti-tobacco pledge of over one hundred boys. It has also contributed $1.00 each to Ft. Strong and Ft. Revere for ice, and $5.00 to the Frances Willard settlement.

Hochelaga county, Canada, held its annual convention at Montreal. It was voted that greater prominence should be given to Y work. The plan of work looked to a five-fold increase in membership. Mrs. Ella Boole, president of New York, was the principal speaker. Mrs. Boole has recently closed a two-weeks' lecture tour in Canada. The press gives appreciative reports of her addresses.

Mrs. Stoddard, state president, and the state press superintendent, Miss Fanny Armstrong, attended the first convention of Brown county, Texas, June 6-7. The convention was very interesting. The closing meeting in the First Baptist church of Brownwood on Sunday night was a fine success in every way. The crowd was large, the collection good, and the number of new members gratifying.

Miss Belle Kearney, National lecturer, is now at 109 Bowen street, Providence, R. I., where she will remain until July 16 for a season of rest. From that time until the last of August she will speak at summer meetings in Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia During September and October Miss Kearney will be in Pennsylvania. Dates can be secured by addressing Miss H. Frances Jones, 812 N. 20th street, Philadelphia.

In an article on "Law Enforcement" in "The Kansas Issue," the organ of the Kansas State Temperance Union, mention is made of the different forces which have caused the present activity in law enforcement in the state. The editor says: "The W. C. T. U., with its numerous local organizations and its unceasing round of work under able leaders, has also helped unspeakably to produce the present bettered condition in Kansas."

The West Side union of Guthrie, O. T., entertained the husbands and friends of the members not long ago. A pleasing program was given and three-course luncheon served. About sixty-five were present. One new member was added to the union. This union celebrated Flower Mission Day by a special program. About a hundred bouquets were taken to the jail and many flowers to the children in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum.

The annual convention of the Tolland county, Conn., W. C. T. U. was held at Ellington. Owing to the illness of Mrs. Fitch, the county president, Mrs. Cornelia B. Forbes, state president, presided. Mrs. L. K. Fuller, editor of the "White Ribbon Banner," read a paper on the power and influence of the National and state papers. Mrs. Forbes spoke of "some things we need to keep in all our W. C. T. U. thoughts." Mrs. Fitch was made an honorary life member of the state union.

At Washington Barracks, an army post situated in Washington, D. C., thirty-five men have taken the White Cross pledge. This was accomplished through the earnest efforts of Wm. Roderick Leimbach of the engineer corps. After attending a W. C. T. U. meeting he made application for White Cross literature and pledges to Mrs. Clinton Smith, district president. These were sent him and during the next thirty-five days the thirty-five signatures were signed. Mr. Leimbach is to be sent to West Point Military Academy, to perfect himself as an engineer.

The W. C. T. U. of Maricopa county, Arizona, held an interesting and helpful convention at Tempe April 25. The local unions were well represented. Good work was reported by each, with quite a gain in membership. Mrs. M. B. White, a former territorial president, gave some enjoyable reminiscences of early W. C. T. U. work in the territory. In the evening a medal contest was given by the L. T. L. Mrs. Etta B. Johnson, of Tempe, was elected president; Mrs. Anna Thompson, of Phoenix, secretary; Mrs. Ella A. Hutchison, of Mesa, treasurer.

Chehalis county, Wash., held its annual convention at Oakville. Many delegates were present and two L. T. L.'s participated in the program. Mrs. Mary M. Wade, of Seattle, state treasurer, was present and was very helpful. A county banner was adopted with the motto "In His name we pledge our allegiance." A headquarters building is to be erected at the beach on the lot owned by the W. C. T. U. Each union was represented in the gold medal contest. Miss Olive Mannerman, of Oakville, was awarded the medal. Rev. W. E. Thompson gave an inspiring address the first evening.

Flower Mission Day was observed by many unions. At New Orleans the union held a song and prayer service and carried the contributions of flowers, fruit, cake, fans and perfumes to the various "Homes," the prison, almshouse and hospitals. At Fort Worth, Texas, the jail was visited, a short gospel service held, and flowers and reading matter distributed. The union of Mobile, Ala., distributed flowers and other articles to the sick and poor of the city. Adrian, Mich., union sent out over 400 bouquets. At the county infirmary each inmate received a banana and an orange, and each child a bag of candy, as well as flowers to all. A good store of patchwork was also left. Fruit was sent with flowers to the sick of the city. Beautiful cards were sent to the girls at the Industrial school.

Miss M. A. Carr, a member of the Hanson, Mass., union and superintendent of the Sunday-school in the Congregational church, recently arranged a children's concert upon the subject of "Purity." The "Purity of Nature" was told in song, recitation and decoration. The "Purity of Innocence" was seen in the baptism of ten infants. The "Purity of Personal Habit" was presented by the Anti-Cigaret program, found in a former issue of THE UNION SIGNAL, followed by an address by the pastor, Rev. Roland D. Sawyer, along the same line, and the circulating of the anti-cigaret pledge cards. The program was very successful and is worthy of imitation. It is an effectual way of bringing the anti-cigaret work before the Sunday schools. Miss Carr was greatly assisted in the preparation of the program by Rev. Sawyer.

Women from the Saloon's Standpoint.

Sometimes an honest doubter says that woman suffrage would not help the temperance question. The liquor papers seem to fear that it would, and we clip the following extracts from liquor papers: "If a liquor man wishes to commit business suicide, let him vote for the woman suffrage amendment." "Treat your wives and daughters as good, true women should be treated, but don't forget that they are women. Don't give them edged tools to play with. They may not cut themselves with the ballot, but they will cut the ground from beneath your business." "The Prohibition papers are nearly all run by women. They all support the suffrage amendment. Liquor men, do you tumble, or must a house fall upon you?" "Now, boys, if you want the license question handed over to the tender mercies of women, vote for the suffrage amendment."—The Liberator.

Chapter XVII.

THUS was brought to naught, at any rate for the present, Hugh's hastily formed scheme of disappearing from the scene of his devoted labors. The day that was to have witnessed his flight witnessed his triumph instead. As for himself, while the excited village rang with his heroism, he passed the hours in bed, by turns flushed and shivering, but as happy and contented as a child. A scalp wound proved to be his only serious injury, but in view of possible complications, Dr. Mann insisted upon absolute rest and quiet. Still, it was impossible effectually to barricade the sick-room against the mighty wave of admiration and sympathy which swept the entire neighborhood. From time to time the nurse would come in smiling, with a sheaf of telegrams, already answered, which would serve to amuse her patient by and by. For the information of anxious parishioners, it was necessary to issue periodical bulletins, and more than one of the county families sent special messages of inquiry. Two enterprising reporters from Milborough were early on the scene, and before invading the vicarage, secured interviews with Enoch, Tummas Windle, and, by good luck, with Sam Widgery himself. Long before the close of that final interview they were simply satisfied with "copy," which was none the less piquant because of Sam's resentment at finding himself interviewed at all. It mattered little that at the vicarage they were politely denied access to Hugh; indeed, the interest of the situation was immeasurably enhanced by the fact that his condition might be reported as "still serious." In addition to the rough sketch made of Sam in his mining dress, they secured the latest photograph of Hugh. These duly appeared in the morning papers above lengthy and graphic accounts of the disaster, and the heroic rescue of Mr. William Sellers by a brave curate and a stalwart young collier. "Mr. William Sellers" was represented as an aged saint of patriarchal aspect, such being the artist's charitable interpretation of the fact that having imbibed frequent potations "to get the cold out of his bones," Billy had become maudlin.

Hugh was well enough to laugh over the illustrations, but he quickly flung the paper aside at sight of a letter from home. Foreseeing the probability of publicity, Mr. Boyd had himself written to Hugh's father on the night of the rescue, giving a brief account of the occurrence, and Dr. Mann's assurance that neither the rescued nor the rescuers were in any danger. He had added his warm congratulations to Mr. and Mrs. Brotherton on the gallant conduct of their son. The letter now in Hugh's hand had been written in the first flush of a reserved man's pride and exultation in his only son. Hugh read through the pages to the last word, then, being alone, hid his face in his hands and groaned. He had barely recovered himself when Dr. Mann paid his evening visit, bearing the information that Sam was waiting below. By special favor he was the first visitor to be admitted to the sick-room.

"For my own part," said the doctor gruffly, "I prefer Sam in the rough; but from what I hear, I am sadly afraid that he intends to reform. He was actually heard to refuse a drink yesterday. Think of that, Brotherton!"

He intently watched his patient for some sign of flinching, and perhaps the eager answer took him by surprise.

"I can understand that. I can understand exactly how he feels. Somehow he feels himself to be a better man because of what he has done. For the matter of that, so do I," and he laughed nervously. "Perhaps that is why I understand."

"You?" and the doctor affected great surprise. "I thought it was understood that you were already a full-fledged saint."

"Meaning that you thought that I wished it to be understood," said Hugh flushing. "Well, as Boyd says, you may be right, though I don't know that I have given you any special cause to think so."

Such passages were frequent between them, but the almost womanly tenderness of the doctor's ministrations more than made up for the roughness of his speech. With a caution, he left Sam endeavoring to give an accurate account of his past sensations and present position.

"It ain't that I've got converted, nor yet that I've made up my mind to turn teetotal. Nowt o' t' sort," said Sam firmly. "It's just that I somehow feel that I couldn't let myself down to taste again. You know summat o' what I were afore I went down?"

Hugh nodded.

"'Beery Sam,' that's what I were; behind my back they all called me so. Well, I've got that sort of a feelin' as if Beery Sam got drownded and buried in that there pit, and Sam Widgery had somehow come to life again a different man."

Hugh put out a trembling hand, and grasped the horny fist that alternately opened and shut itself expressively on Sam's knee. He could not bring himself to say that he knew not only the mood of exaltation, but also its evanescent nature, and Sam interpreted the action as conveying the encouragement of sympathy. He was but a novice in the narrow way.

"I do, I tell ye. For all I put such a bold front to it, I felt kind o' queer to be goin' to my death like that. You bet I did. When you pulled off your coat and axed me for a mate, I comed forrard because somethin' in the look of ye seemed to pull me on; but while they was makin' ready, if I could ha' backed out anyway, I would ha' done it, I tell ye. Then I kinder looked at you to see if ye meant goin', and you'll excuse me, sir, but it comed over me that happen there wasn't so much difference as I thought, for you seemed to be feelin' pretty much the same as me."

"Thinks I to myself, 'Hanged if I don't believe that he funks it every bit as much as I do, but he means goin' all the same, and him knowin' nowt about the job,' so wi' that, I buckled to, and after a bit it seemed as if somethin' outside o' myself got holt on me and pulled me right out o' myself, till I clean forgot as I was Beery Sam, wi' a blackish character o' my own, and felt as if I had nowt to trouble my mind about but just what I was bound to do. It was queer, I tell ye, sir, but it's the truth."

"I know. I felt pretty much the same. What did you make of the something from outside of yourself that got hold of you in the very moment of your need?"

Sam looked mystified, then a light broke over his face, and he gasped:

"Ye don't mean that it was God Almighty. Well, I'm blessed!"

Not another word passed between them until Dr. Mann returned, and with a resounding slap on Sam's shoulder sent him peremptorily away.

"You've been talking twice as much as is good for you, I'll be bound," grumbled the doctor, as he prepared to take Hugh's temperature.

"On the contrary, Sam has done all the talking," retorted Hugh.

"Makings of a fine fellow in that young tippler," remarked the doctor, laconically.

"I'm sure of that," said Hugh, rather sadly.

"Then see to it that you keep him up to the standard of the start he has made. That's my advice, for all it's worth. There's no earthly reason why any man should be a sot. Tell him to put that in his pipe and smoke it."

He looked at the thermometer without comment, shook up and rearranged his patient's pillows, examined the medicine bottle, and went down to the vicar's study.

"No; he's not getting on as fast as one has a right to expect of a steady fellow of his age. There's no particular cause for anxiety, but things are not altogether as they should be. There's Widgery, a pretty hard drinker, little the worse for his experiences, and this other fellow, who couldn't consistently touch a drop of alcohol to save his life, has all the symptoms that t'other chap ought to have had. How do you account for that?"

Mr. Boyd shook his head.

"Happily, my friend, it is your business to account for it, not mine. You don't think that there is cause for anxiety?"

"Oh, no; but he must be kept quiet, mind that. I'll look in again in the morning."

But a little later, when Mr. Boyd looked in to say good night to his guest, Hugh at once started up in bed.

"Are you alone? That's right. I have something to say to you, and I want to get it said tonight."

"You'll have to let it wait until the morning, Brotherton. I've got my orders from Mann, and I mean to carry them out. He says that you have had more than enough excitement for one day."

He spoke cheerily, but with secret alarm, for Hugh's manner was agitated, and his eyes feverishly bright.

"It's what I have on my mind that is exciting me. I do not deserve the good opinion that everyone has of me. I—I—"

The nurse, who had quietly entered the room, looked significantly at Mr. Boyd as she put down the little tray she carried on the table beside the bed. She was a stout person of authoritative manners, and Hugh secretly held her in considerable awe. Nevertheless, having swallowed the medicine she held to his lips, he summoned up courage to say:

"Would you mind giving me ten minutes alone with the vicar, nurse? I have something of importance to say to him that ought to be said without delay."

His determination not to risk delay was increasing his agitation, and after rapidly exchanging glances with nurse, Mr. Boyd answered him soothingly:

"It's all right, old fellow, whatever it is. Don't bother yourself over it just now. You see, we think you of more importance than anything else at present."

"And in the morning you will be more fit for business. I cannot allow any more talking tonight," said the nurse firmly.

Both she and Mr. Boyd believed him to be suffering from slight delirium, and recognizing the fact, Hugh submitted impatiently.

When morning came, Mr. Boyd took care that the doctor should be the first visitor to enter the sick-room. As usual, when his professional work was done he settled down for a brief chat, and the nurse left him and his patient together.

"I have something to say to you," began Hugh, turning suddenly paler than before. "I tried to say it to Boyd last night, but he and nurse took it into their heads that I was wandering, and shut me up. I must say it to someone. I ought to say it, but if I don't say it soon, God knows whether it will ever be said at all. Do you remember a conversation we once had in your surgery—about alcohol."

"Hold on!" said the doctor suddenly. He was convinced that he knew what was coming, and he wanted time.

Hugh had been speaking impetuously, but he stopped short, with a harsh, unsteady laugh.

"What? You, too?"

"Oh, no; you're not wandering. You know well enough what you are talking about, but I want you to give yourself—and me—time."

"I won't take time; I will speak this very day," said Hugh impetuously, "for my own good."

"H'm." The doctor examined his finger-nails with a deliberation that was arresting. "Is a man's own good invariably to be his first consideration?"

"What do you mean?"

Another pause.

"There seems no question about it," began the doctor, with the same deliberation, "that you have made considerable impression upon the parish. Those wonderful sermons and addresses, which have been so much appreciated" (Hugh winced), "have been the means of doing a lot of people good, and can the best of sermons do more? I've listened to a good deal of parochial gossip this last day or two," pursued the doctor, in a meditative way, "chiefly about you, and I think it all goes to show that the results of Boyd's experienced and, as I think, wise ministrations are as nothing in comparison with the results of yours. I don't pretend to explain it," he added resignedly, "but such is the case."

"You cannot think more contemptuously of me and of my work than I—"

"Stop a bit," interrupted the doctor. "I never said that I thought contemptuously either of you or your work. I may have classed it, mentally, with the wood, hay, stubble and so on; but if it serves your day and generation, and that so well that your fellow-creatures grow the better for it, what right have I to complain? And this is just what seems to be the case. I am not likely to over-estimate the results of your work, but I must recognize facts. Brotherton," and his tone became emphatic, "I know of men and women who are leading better lives today because of your influence over them."

Hugh, deeply ashamed, hid his face in his hands without speaking. Leaning forward, the doctor lightly touched his chest to emphasize what he was about to say.

"Suppose that anything should happen—or shall we say transpire?—to destroy the faith that these men and women have in you, what would be the probable effect upon them?"

Hugh listened intently, but neither moved nor spoke.

"Just now," pursued the doctor, "you wanted to speak—for your own good. There are times, I say, when a man's own good—even his own soul's good—is not to be his first consideration. I say that it is not to be the first consideration with you. You have pulled some of these people out of the mire, and not for your own soul's sake have you the right to plunge them into it again. I don't know what it was that POWERFUL.

A Pure Food Drink Has Great Sustaining Power.

The sustaining power of Postum Coffee when properly cooked is greater than most people imagine and it is well illustrated in the story told by a young Texas woman who says: "I almost lived on Postum Cereal Coffee for over a month and there was over a week I did not eat anything at all but just drank the food drink Postum and yet I grew stronger and gained weight.

"Our family physician examined Postum and decided to use it altogether in place of coffee. We all think it has no equal as a nourishment for the sick for beside being pleasant to the taste it is so strengthening. My father and mother have always been coffee drinkers and suffered all kinds of troubles from the coffee until about a year ago a neighbor was praising Postum and mother decided to try it.

"They improved at once and have drank Postum ever since and mother, who used to be bothered with nervousness and sleeplessness particularly, is in splendid health now. She says the change came entirely from drinking Postum and leaving off coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

A "Night Up" at the London Hospital.

"THAT telephone bell again," just when one was getting to bed at 2 a. m., after having been out to a bad case, and was looking forward to a good rest.

"Hallo! Yes!"

"You're wanted, sir."

"All right, I am coming," and so hastily slipping on one's clothes again, it did not take long to get down.

There in the great empty hall, with its massive pillars and rows of empty seats, a man is waiting to escort us to one of the homes of an East End slum where someone has been taken suddenly ill, and is too bad to be moved.

I wish some of you boys would come with us as we step out into the broad and brightly lighted Whitechapel Road. Come along, we must turn down a by-street tho, and then another and another. The silence is only broken by our hurried footsteps on the cobbles; the moon and stars are looking sadly and silently down from a cloudless sky; the lamp-posts shed a flickering light in the narrow streets, and occasionally one is startled by a couple of policemen, who suddenly appear round a corner, or are standing half-hidden in a doorway.

At length Booth street, Spitalfields, is reached, and we turn into a doorway. A candle upstairs reveals the staircase, rotten and filthy.

Mind your head as you ascend; and half-way up you must step across the legs of two lodgers, who, with a sack thrown over them, are lying on the platform at the angle of the staircase, and who are snoring heavily. At the top one of the doors opens, and we enter.

It is not hard to describe the furniture—the bed on which the sick person is lying, covered not with clean sheets and blankets, but with a filthy old feather bed; a table, two wooden chairs and a chest of drawers. On the mantle-shelf are a few little ornaments. There are no pictures nor carpet; in fact, nothing else except dirt. In one corner is a child of five asleep.

This is the only room of this "home" of an East-ender, where the soap and hot water for us to wash in before leav : has to be borrowed from Mrs. Somebody next door, that is, in the next room.

It is awfully sad work to see these poorest of English homes, and on reaching the hospital again another message is waiting. This time the case is sadder still: a tiny single room in Twine Court, Shadwell. Mother is ill, but three of the children are in the same bed, while two others are sleeping on three chairs put side by side. The walls have been stripped of pictures because father is out of work, a tiny fire is burning which the neighbors have kindly supplied. The bedstead and six chairs are going to be fetched away the next Monday, if the next installment of hire-purchase money is not paid.

"Doctor, could you give us a milk supply ticket, as I pawned the last pair of the children's boots to-day for food?" asks the mother.

We wonder how the crowds of little children brought up in these benighted homes can live, badly fed and clothed, a whole family in one room, and surrounded by filth and squalor, because the parents are literally too poor to keep things clean.

What happiness can these poor little things have in life, children of the gutter, with only the streets to play in?

One woman told me that her husband gave her five shillings a week for herself and the children, and she had to pay four shillings out of it for rent for that one room!

"How is it? why is it?" you ask.

Ah! in most cases it is the old story—the drink. We may talk lightly of the evils of intemperance, and say what fools men must be to take too much, but what about the poor little fellows who live on a couple of crusts a day and run about shoeless, in nothing but a ragged pair of knickerbockers and shirt? What about these little innocent sufferers of their fathers' folly, dying in hundreds through want, starvation, and exposure?

Let us do what we can to remove the one great cause of the terrible misery and sadness of these boys and girls of the East End by doing all in our power to destroy the drink traffic in this our land.

Can we do otherwise than this when we read such words as these: "Whosoever shall cause one of these little ones that believe on Me to stumble, it were better for him if a great millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea."—R. L. Ridge, in "Our Boy's Magazine."

Lincoln and Topeka.

A Tale of Two Cities in 1901 Which is Good Reading for the Voters of 1903.

Lincoln, Nebraska, has forty saloons, each of which pays the city $1,000 license yearly. Total revenue, $40,000.

Lincoln has numerous unlicensed joints and low dives. High license has not suppressed them. High license never does suppress them.

Lincoln declares she must have her saloon revenue to pay her public school teachers and keep up her schools.

Notwithstanding Lincoln's income from taxation of vice, her average levy to pay the expenses of her schools is nearly two mills higher than that of Topeka. Her levy for city purposes only is thirty-seven and one-half mills.

Lincoln pays in annual salaries to her city supeerintendent of schools and to her principal of the high school, $4,200.

Lincoln, despite her boasted saloon revenue "for school purposes," pays her

(1) High school teachers an average per month (nine months) of but $75.

(2) Principals of graded schools an average per month of but $70.33.

(3) Graded school teachers an average per month of but $52.73.

Topeka, Kansas, has not had a licensed saloon for nearly twenty years. Total yearly saloon revenue, not a cent.

Topeka at the present time, June, 1901, has very few, if any, joints or dives. Prohibition has reasonably well suppressed them.

Topeka absolutely refuses to be a partner with the unrighteous traffic in order to keep up her schools.

Topeka's total levy, without resorting to the protection and taxation of vice, is but thirty mills. This for city purposes only, exclusive of the school-tax levy for the support of her public schools.

General average for prohibition Topeka $76.56.

Monthly excess in favor of Topeka's teachers $10.58.

Wherein does saloon revenue "for school purposes" profit the teachers of Lincoln, Nebraska?—Prohibition in Kansas.

"The Supreme Criminal."

By Clara C. Hoffman.

The Union Signal of June 4 reprinted from The Chicago American an article entitled "How Shall We Solve the Problem of the Drink Evil?" by Bishop Fowler of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The article is interesting from several points of view.

Every white-ribboner will endorse all the bishop says of the drink evil, even when he terms it the "supreme criminal of all time." But the liquor traffic is not mentioned, tho to most minds it is very intimately associated with the drink evil. Is this because our government is in partnership with the deadly traffic, sharing most largely in its profits?

When the good bishop calls on all "workers for human good" to unite against this evil, the "Amen" that wells up from every W. C. T. U. heart can be heard around the globe. When he tells us "the churches must be held to high accountability" cordial assent is given.

"They (the churches) are indeed more constant in their teaching and practice of temperance than any other forces in society," he claims. Now comes inquiry. More constant than the W C. T. U.? More constant than the little army of Christian prohibitionists who talk, and pray, and vote against this evil? Is this really true? Strange, we have not discovered it. The bishop very frankly admits that "if all the churches presented a unity of teaching against this evil, and a solid line of total abstinence, there would be left no room for saloons and drinking places." Exactly so! Alas, and alas for that "if."

"This is final authority—public opinion. Whoever shapes public opinion makes the laws, fixes the pursuits, and dictates the amusements. The pulpit and press united and aroused would cure 90 per cent of this evil in one year." This is an admission of appalling responsibility, and by one high in authority. When this has been charged by those of lower estate, great offence has been given.

But how is this public opinion, so greatly to be desired, and so necessary to victory over the "supreme criminal of all time," to be created, cultivated, and crystallized until it makes the laws, fixes the pursuits, and dictates the amusements?"

None will deny that the pulpit and press are mighty agencies to this end—if they are seeking this end, and intend to attain it. Do they? Let us see.

From a majority of the evangelical pulpits of this country go forth "preachers of righteousness," who in their capacity of sovereign citizens and rulers, uphold and perpetuate the policy and system of licensing that which produces the "supreme criminal of all time." Hereby it lives, and moves, and has its being.

The membership of the church will never rise to higher planes of thought and action while its leaders and officials declare "the liquor traffic cannot be licensed without sin" and then vote for its continuance.

The church easily, without the aid of the press, could combat and overcome this supreme evil, but never while its words and deeds are at variance. Most of the secular press upholds and defends the political agencies by which this criminal is entrenched in law—law enacted by the agents whom church and press help to elect. "What the law declares right, is right." Thus are church and press helping to form and educate public opinion.

The liquor traffic has had the right of way, protected by law and public opinion, for which church and press are jointly responsible to the full extent of the influence of each, until it has acquired a vast capital and corrupted our entire civic, political, and religious life—making it possible to buy, sell, and control vast numbers of citizens until our great cities, and smaller ones too, are reeking centers of bribery, gambling and robbery.

Yet the good bishop does not seem to recognize this as a force in society. Why not?

Reference is made to the evil and crime of slavery. It, too, was called a moral question, and the attitude of church and press concerning it was not unlike the position of those powerful bodies today toward the liquor traffic.

Slavery was settled as a political question and by political methods. So, too, will be settled this question of the "supreme criminal of all time." No other method of settlement is possible because it is entrenched in law by politics.

The cry of the world grows louder and louder, "How can we reach, capture, and destroy this supreme evil?" In spite of church and press, the world will see at last that it can be done only by pulling down the political bulwarks behind which it has found safety so long. God speed the overthrow of the bulwarks!

Knox, Mo.

Hot Weather Reflections.

What gastronomic crimes are committed from April to November in every kitchen and dining-room! It is the same with heat-producing drinks. What schooners of beer are drained off with the vain delusion that beer is cooling and refreshing. And what crowds throng the soda fountain for nerve tonics. If every saloon were closed down and every drug store were cast into the midst of the sea in 999 cases out of every 1,000 the people would be vastly cooler and stronger and healthier from April to November and from November until the following April. There is nothing healing or cooling or refreshing in anything that has in it the heating and consuming fires of alcohol, whether it be in the form of beer or ale or wine or brandy or whisky or any of the ornamental concoctions of the soda fountain or the misleading compounds of the physician's or druggist's case.—Dr. John Merritte Driver.

you were going to say, and I don't want to know; but if you will take time to think it over in the light of what I have said, you will never say it, either to me or to any other man."

"And suppose that, while some of the disasters of which you hint might come of my speaking, worse things are still more likely to come of my silence?" said Hugh presently.

"Why should worse things come of it?" asked the doctor roughly. "You can play the man if you choose. After last Tuesday, who could doubt it? Go ahead, and do it! Besides, I don't believe in your having anything to say that would not be better left unsaid. Give yourself time. Every speck is seen through a magnifying glass by a sick man. You'll think better of it when you are about again."

Hugh sat up among his pillows for some time after he was left alone. Then he sighed heavily, turned over on his side, and went to sleep. For good or ill, the tale that had trembled upon his lips remained untold.

CAMERON, Tex., June 11.—The Commissioners' Court this morning made a canvass of the returns in the recent prohibition election in Milam county, and there were 1,797 votes for prohibition and 1,587 against it, making majority of 210. The prohibitionists are delighted at the result in our neghbor county, Robertson, yesterday.

BONHAM, Tex., June 13.—Fannin county stepped into the prohibition line today by a majority of nearly eighteen hundred votes. The campaign was waged earnestly and a larger vote was polled than was anticipated. The total vote for the county was nearly six thousand. Out of thirty-one voting boxes in the county all but three gave prohibition majorities. The Bonham boxes gave a prohibition majority of 195.

A number of ladies were at the polls here today working for the prohibition cause. It is the general opinion here tonight that so emphatic have the citizens of the county spoken on the question the law will be allowed to go into effect at once without interference.

No Liquor While on Duty.

Canton (O.) Firemen May Drink Only Fourteen Days a Year.

CANTON, O., June 20.—The board of public service has adopted a resolution that city firemen must not use intoxicating liquors while on duty. Canton firemen have one day in seven off, but are subject to call then, and the prohibiting order includes the off-day. The only chance the firemen would have to indulge in liquor without violating orders is during a vacation period of fourteen days in a year.

Clubs Must Pay License.

Illinois Supreme Court Decides That Liquor Selling Clubs are Saloons.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., June 17.—The Supreme court yesterday decided that Elks' clubs and all clubs where liquor is dispensed are saloons and must pay the regular dram shop license fee, which in this state is $500 a year or more as each municipality may decide.

The decision was in the case of the People vs. the Law and Order Club of Randolph county. The supreme court decides that it makes no difference if the club sells its liquor to its members at cost, it is violating the law.

The character of the club or the objects for which it was formed also makes no difference, and the license fee must be paid if liquor is to be dispensed in the club rooms.

Mayor Harrison has called for a list of all the clubs in Chicago, with a view to ascertaining which of them sell liquor and to compel these to pay the regular liquor license of $500 a year.

The number is said by close observers to be surprisingly large. Collector Lahiff says they number perhaps 5,000. It is not expected that a very large percentage of these can pay the license, and therefore the effect of the court's decision will be to cut down the number.

The Foresters took a firm and pronounced stand for temperance and against all handlers of liquor. If the sentiment of the state gathering goes through the national convention, to be held in Dubuque in August, an amendment to the constitution will be made which will exclude in the future from membership to the fraternity all saloon men, liquor dealers, bartenders and, in fact, anyone connected either directly or indirectly with the sale or traffic in liquor. It was the sense of the convention that such men are hazardous risks and not desirable members.

And to the man, or woman, who has twice been convicted of criminal tendencies it should say: "You shall never marry to bring forth a race of criminals to burden the earth."

L., taking up its various departments, required readings, anti-cigaret work, etc., there will be added bright illustrated stories and anecdotes together with a nature study class and many other new and exceedingly interesting features, making it one of the leading periodicals for our young people.

The price is only 25 cents a year. Send us the names of your young friends and the members of your L. T. L., that sample copies may be sent to them.

Anti-Cigaret Helps.

Now that people everywhere are becoming awakened to the evils which follow cigaret smoking, we should push our campaign in this department with redoubled energy. Two effective helps are "An Anti-Cigaret Program," price five cents, and "The Anti-Cigaret Speaker," price ten cents, both prepared by Mrs. Ida B. Cole, associate and lecturer for the Anti-Narcotic department. The "Program," which is to be given by the boys and girls, presents the subject effectively and would make a pleasing entertainment. The numerous recitations mentioned in the program are found in the "Speaker." This book should be in the hands of every mother or teacher, who is called on to furnish "something to speak." The recitations are suited to all grades, are easily memorized and will be welcomed by the children, for whose use the book is prepared.

New Prohibition Ammunition

"The Prohibitory Law: Facts," by Lillian M. N. Stevens, President of the W. C. T. U., is replete with evidences attesting the value of prohibition, notable decisions of the Supreme Court favoring prohibition, testimonies of Maine governors for the past forty years, and the prosperity of North Dakota under prohibition law. Incontrovertible proof is shown regarding the saving power of prohibition to the nation.

Another valuable leaflet by the same author is "The Dispensary or State Control System of Managing the Liquor Traffic." Abundant data are given to show the failure of the dispensary as a temperance measure and the wrong resulting from an effort to compromise with evil.

Price: per package of ten, 10 cents; per fifty, 50 cents; per hundred, 75 cents.

Unanswered Prayer.

The true relation of the child in the home, his rights and the evil effects of hereditary tendencies and impure environment, thrills the heart as one reads "Unanswered Prayer," a book by Mrs. S. M. I. Henry. It answers the question, "Why do so many children of the church go to ruin?" Fathers, as well as mothers, will find in it the arrest of thought so often needed. Cloth bound, price 30 cents.

The Legion Band. By Helen G. Rice.

Tune: "Robin Adair."

[The first and second halves of verses 1, 2, 3, 4 may be sung responsively, the entire Legion joining in verse 5, the last line of which may be emphasized by clapping the hands.]

WHAT'S this great company
On every hand,
Whose shouts ring cheerily
Throughout the land?
These are the children true,
Young men and maidens too,
Eager to dare and do,
The Legion Band.

Why to this loyal band
Do they belong?
Why do they fill the land
With shout and song?
Truth is their sword and shield.
They die, but never yield.
Their Legions are a-field
To right all wrong.

Lo! on their banners bright,
Greeting the sky,
Blazoned in words of light,
Their purpose high.
"Ours is the future. We,
Climbing heights far and free,
Lift others, till they see
Sweet Purity."

Strong is the foe they fight,
Fierce is the fray.
How shall they banish night,
Bring the new day?
Pledged every heart and hand
All evil to withstand,
For Home and Native Land
They work and pray.

Come, join this Legion Band,
Help fight the foe.
For Home and Native Land
Enlist, and so
Hasten the tyrant's fall,
Shout loudly, one and all,
Tremble, King Alcohol!
Saloons must go.

THE BOY.

By Alice M. Guernsey.

L. T. L. Secretary of New Jersey.

"ONCE on a time" there lived a genuine boy—alive from his finger-tips to his toe-tips, running over with energy, the embodiment of perpetual motion. Unfortunately for his peace of mind—and for the peace, both of mind and body, of the rest of the family—the laddie's home was in the city. Alas, for the children who have only city streets for a play-ground! When kept within the house, as he must be at times, what could he do but rush wildly back and forth, from one end of the flat to the other? Oh, the pity of it, a flat for the operation of a steam engine under full headway, and without safety valve!

Was this an abnormally active child? On the contrary, I take him to have been a typical boy, a boy like those in our homes, a boy like those in our Legions.

This, then, is the problem before us: Given a dozen, more or less, boys like this to be held and interested and taught and trained "for God and home and native land," what shall we do with them? The problem would be less complicated if we had these boys alone, but we must care for them at the same time with many others—with, for instance, the boys who would be good and quiet if by themselves, with the girls of the same sort, and the girls of other sorts—and all this to be done, perhaps, by a teacher without special experience in work of this kind.

Let us look at this matter of the teacher a little. It is self-evident that where so much is required, one should have certain qualifications for the work. What are they?

First, it seems to me, is a distinct, clear sense that the work must be done. This does not involve an overwhelming sense of personal call to do it—rather a negative conviction that "if no one else will, I must." I met the other day an earnest little woman, president of a union, who was facing the fact that better work could be done by organizing three distinct sets of children. There were Juniors and Seniors in her Legion, and the latter clamored to be by themselves. There was still a third set, boys and girls just enough older than the Seniors, to make them unwilling to be classified with them, and yet it was most important "to have and to hold" this latter set. To see the need was to do with this brave leader. Today she has a Junior, a Senior, and a Somerset Legion, has personally found leaders for several home classes, and her last letter says the Somerset Legion is horrified at the thought of inviting some young people of twenty-eight and thirty years old to join them, and yet these ought to be reached. "What would you do about it?" she asks.

What could I say, except that only the limits of one's time and strength and other duties can determine one's answer to the call to service. With the consecration that says, "Here, Lord, am I, answer my prayers by sending me, if such is thy way," must come a love for the child, as a child, a love that cannot pass a ragged, dirty little urchin in the street without seeking to bring the response of a smile in return for your own; the love that sees in the mischief-making boy the making of a man; the love that knows the difference between mischief and maliciousness. The malicious child would better, in most cases, be dismissed from the Legion. A mischievous child is simply on the wrong track, and needs—not the application of the switch in the old-time use of the term, much as we may feel like doing it occasionally—but, carrying out the railroad figure, the turning of a switch. His motive power is asserting itself on the wrong side. It is capable of doing great service, and it is our blessed privilege to transfer that energy to the right place. Consecration and love will lead to study of the boy and his conditions, and this, in turn, to tactful treatment of him and his.

MRS. HELEN G. RICE.
National General Secretary of the L. T. L. Branch

It is obviously impossible to cover all conditions of this problem in the limits of a single paper. The only thing that can be done is to name certain elements that may enter into success along this line. One of these is surprise.

On the eve of a national election, when every boy on the street had marched in a parade, or longed to do so, a lesson on the ballot box was given before a company of children and young people. Slips of paper on which were written such words as alcohol, tobacco, opium, good habits, public schools, clean thoughts, etc., were presented, and the boys and girls were called upon to decide which should be placed in the ballot box. It was soon evident that the center of rapidly spreading disorder was in one corner of the room, and the experienced teacher quickly discovered that a half-grown lad there was the ring-leader in the disturbance. In such a case rapid action is necessary, but it must be action whose cause is entirely unsuspected by the victim. Quite as a matter of course, this teacher called the troublesome boy to the front to place the next ballot in the box. Somewhat to her surprise, I admit, he came promptly, with a half-ashamed air at being paid such a compliment, but with a face clearly showing that he had no idea it was anything more than a compliment. Recognizing her success, the teacher quietly asked him to remain there, so as to render further assistance. Whether it was the awakened sense of responsibility, or the unconscious reverence felt by the boy for the flag wrapped around the ballot box, I know not, but certain it is that there was no more quiet or respectful lad thru the rest of that session, nor was there any farther disturbance in the room. But the boy never dreamed why he was called to the front that day.

Noblesse oblige is a good old French motto we are fond of quoting, perhaps because our American tongue gives no fitting translation of the musical phrase. But if we can awaken in the mind of the fun-loving boy the sense of obligation implied in the motto, we have placed the fatherland under obligation to us, at least so long as that boy lives.

How shall we do this? "Tactful treatment of him and his" was mentioned. Thoughtful study of the boy and his conditions will help at this point. Is he fond of animals? Make him the organizer of a pet show, gaining him by the responsibility thus conferred upon him and gaining the pennies of the neighborhood for the treasury at the same time. Can he whittle? You must be in pressing need of a gavel for Legion use, and know no other way to get one. Racks for the singing books, rods for papers and pamphlets must be an absolute necessity; and there are other things in this line that you must have—until you have won your boy.

Is he military in his tastes? Appoint him to arrange a gymnastic or an emergency drill; tell him about the first aid to the injured packet that each United States soldier carries. Encourage him to master its principles, and then have practical demonstration in the Legion of the treatment of a drowned person, the proper method of applying bandages, etc.

The teacher of such a boy needs to have endless appreciation. This is not the same thing as patience. It is a finer, more delicate quality of mind, that sees what the boy means when he, blundering as all young things do, does not know himself. It recognizes his crude, imperfect attempts, that seem only failures to the superficial eye, to measure up to the standard set by his teacher, and, all unconsciously, by himself. The wise teacher knows the boy by sight and name, and never fails to recognize him on the street with as courteous a bow as she gives to my lord mayor or the aldermen. Ten to one, he is equally deserving of her courtesy, to say the least, and when the boy conquers his fear of ridicule from his associates enough to lift his hat on meeting her, she knows that it means real victory, and shows it—not by word, oh, no; but the boy understands that she appreciates it.

Any study of boy nature would be incomplete if it failed to recognize the value of the "togetherness" that is inherent in growing lads. I use a homely word, because no other exactly expresses my meaning. The street arab is a member of a gang bent on mischief that is a training school for crime. Let a Colonel Waring organize the gang into a street-cleaning brigade, auxiliary to the city department; or a David Willard, teaching in the Tombs school by day, act as the power behind the throne in a boy's club at night; or a Francis Tabor marshal a small army of East Side hoodlums in the fine club building on St. Mark's Place, New York City, or at their summer encampment; or, that most practical of object lessons, the George Junior Republic, teach that citizenship does not consist in being "agin the government"—let agencies like these be multiplied a thousand fold in our land, and we have gone far toward solving the social problems of the day.

In this work we, as Legion leaders, cannot do much—we can do a little, and what we can do we ought to do, and what we ought to do we must do. I am firmly convinced that we shall go on failing to hold the boys as we long to do thru the most critical period of their lives unless we adapt to our own use this clannish instinct of boyhood.

How can we do it? And when? and where? First, by enlisting the boys themselves, especially those who are the leaders of all the mischief in the Legion. Ask their advice and help. I use the word "ask" deliberately. Organize, for instance, a Legion base-ball nine; granted that you know nothing about base-ball—the boys will be only too glad to teach you, and you can look interested, if not wise, even if you do not understand all about bases and pitchers and fouls. In all team play there is opportunity for the learning of numberless lessons of patience and forbearance and community of effort.

Basket-ball may be a greater novelty, and so more successful. It is more than possible that you can enlist the services of some young Prohibitionist, or some man who has the real love of boys at heart, to help in this work; but the one essential is to select a game that involves working together, and to make membership in such a team possible only to those who belong to the Legion.

Frequent pertinent suggestions are in The Men of To-Morrow, published monthly at Albany for $1.00 a year. It is a good magazine for boys to read.

We may be cranks, but we cannot, by turning around, manufacture leaders. I have often wished we could; and yet if such process were possible we ourselves would lose thereby much of personal delight, much of opportunity for the self-sacrifice that brings its own reward. Not so does God work his miracles of regeneration, but thru the warm, personal heart-to-heart touch that blesses the giver equally with the receiver.

You are busy women—but over your dish-washing think of the boy; when you give the good-night kiss to your own laddie, after his evening prayer, ask for help to teach that other boy whose life rests, in a measure, in your hands—yes, and ask to be shown how your own boy may help him, too.

And when, by-and-by, perhaps from the heavenly city, you hear the glad cry, "We are coming! We are coming! the boys from hamlets and cities, the boys from sheltered homes and neglected places, the light of a clean life in our eyes, its songs upon our lips, America's hope, America's salvation"—will it be nothing to you, then, that you helped to save even one boy?

Suggestions About Games.

1. Carroms for four players; cost about $2.50.
2. Crokinole, $1.25.
3. Table Tennis, or Ping Pong, 75c to $1.00.
4. Pillow-dex, 25 cents.
5. Egg foot-ball—An egg with the contents blown out is placed on a table with blocks or books at each end, ten inches apart, for goals. The players are divided into sides; the object is to blow the egg thru the goals, each side defending its own.
6. Basket-ball—For directions, price of sets, etc., send 10 cents to American Sports Publishing Co., 16-18 Park Place, New York City, and ask for "Spalding's Athletic Library No. 106" (Basket-ball for Women).
7. Whack—The game consists in driving a foot-ball over a line by kicking or batting with the hands. It can be played by any number on any sized field. A booklet explaining the game can be had for 10 cents from the Success Club Bureau, Washington Square, New York City.
8. Tether-ball—See "Spalding's Athletic Library No. 116."
9. A pretty exercise for girls is the winding of the May pole. By using stout cords instead of ribbons, the girls may get fine athletic exercise by hanging from the cords, and swinging a greater or less distance, according to the initial force.

FRANCES E. WILLARD SETTLEMENT L. T. L.

By CAROLINE M. CASWELL, Superintendent.

THE L. T. L. of the Frances E. Willard Settlement, formerly the Willard Y Settlement, has this year 438 members, of which 423 are pledged. Of these pledged members 300 have paid state and National dues, and have been in regular attendance during the year. This simple statement means more than it would first appear when it is considered that meetings have been held weekly from September 1902, to June 1903.

The unique feature of the Settlement L. T. L. is the banding of the different divisions into group-clubs. The nineteen groups varying in number from twelve to forty-seven, are classified according to age, nationality and friendship. Each division of the company has its own president, secretary and treasurer and conducts its own business under the leadership of its teacher. This gives a confidence and an interest in the club or division such as no other method can possibly stimulate.

Each division pays dues to its own club treasury at the rate of from 1c to 5c per week according to age and ability; thus money is at hand when most needed for dues or for general club work. It is much easier to vote that the collection of a regular meeting be used to pay the dues, than to bring the individual members to the point of paying or to the task of giving an entertainment. One club or division who did not have a sufficient amount in the treasury, gave an entertainment, charging their brothers and sisters 5c admission, and another division had a medal contest, charging 10c admission. The Settlement L. T. L. has this year given eight medal contests.

Each member of the oldest division, known as the Pearson Literary Association, pays ten cents besides the regular division dues. The weekly payment of a definite sum, though that sum be small, stimulates toward the payment of the required amount.

In combination with the temperance and band of mercy work some manual training or other special instruction is given as an added attraction to the club. The Pearson Literary Association, which especially encourages good citizenship, has had regular coaching by a Harvard student, and it has considered in debate with the Franklin L. T. L. subjects of national interest, such as "The Rothschilds," "Trusts," "Monroe Doctrine," "Municipal Aid for the Unemployed," etc. The Union Knights have made baskets, the Temperance Stars, carpet slippers and trinkets in Venetian iron; the Livermore L. T. L. has practical drawing; and the Caswell Chapter has had a punching bag to relieve mental effort. As all the children are allowed to come once a week to play games besides their regular L. T. L. meeting, the interest in the Settlement and the L. T. L. does not have time to grow even lukewarm.

Among the girls the Sunshine and For-Get-Me-Not Kitchen Gardens are taught to do housework by means of toys, the Wideawakes are taught to cut and make the little extras which all girls enjoy adding to their wardrobe, and the Dr. Louise and Junior Willard have had instruction in physical culture. The Junior White Shield Club, numbering twenty-two, is the oldest division of girls, and as its name signifies, it has taken the white shield pledge and considers besides Purity, the subjects of temperance and physical culture.

This is but a brief outline of the unique work of the Settlement L. T. L., which this year won the county banner and will doubtless stand first in the state. Stories, songs, compositions, entertainments, games and various other educational methods are employed to make a possibly dry subject interesting and enjoyable. All the L. T. L.'s, as well as other club work, for the Settlement has ten other clubs embracing one hundred and twenty-four children, are under the direction of Miss Nellie Frank Hill, whose love for the children and fitness for the work has brought it to its present excellent state. We have a circulating library, traveling art gallery, stamp saving station, flower mission, and literature distributing bureau, all for the benefit of the little ones. During the summer the interest is kept alive by picnics for all and by the playground, which is open daily.

Some of these latter attractions may not be feasible for all L. T. L.'s, but the group-classes officered by the girls and boys are possible for all and will be found especially attractive to the older boys and girls.

That the Settlement is most important in the mind of at least one of the children is proved by the following extract from an essay on Frances Willard written by Etta Rich, eight years of age: "When she died the people were all so fond of her that they made a club and named it after her. It was called 'The Frances E. Willard Settlement.'"

National Dues.

By Helen G. Rice.

WHILE no edict has ever been issued making National L. T. L. dues binding, yet the recommendation for the payment of such dues, sent out from one of our National W. C. T. U. conventions, should be construed as amounting to an obligation. Even had no such recommendation been passed, we could hardly fail to recognize the fact that the W. C. T. U., which inaugurated and has sustained, thru all the years of its own existence, this L. T. L. Branch, has a right to expect that auxiliary dues will be brought, as a willing offering, to the National W. C. T. U. treasury.

At present only Pennsylvania is at all approaching the standard which should be reached in the amount of National dues paid, and Pennsylvania has no thought of resting satisfied with past records. New York and some other states have swung into line, and are bravely climbing; some of the smaller and the newer states and territories have made a good beginning; but others which are large and well-organized have, up to this time, done almost nothing in this direction, and some are making the mistake of asking National dues from the Seniors only.

When we consider that the amount asked is only five cents per member annually, and that it requires only one thousand members, each paying this very small sum, to entitle a state to an L. T. L. delegate of its own to the National Convention, it would seem that every state should be thus represented. We are convinced that each state could accomplish this by an expenditure of effort commensurate with the importance of L. T. L. work.

We find many local superintendents fearing to ask dues, lest they lose members, but we believe this to be a needless fear, since it is a well-known fact that people always have an especial interest in an object in which they have invested something. If this matter is skillfully managed, the dues may be made a means of lending dignity to the Legion in the estimation of the boys and girls, and of increasing their interest.

As to its being any hardship financially for the Legioners to pay five cents annually, let us, once and forever, rid ourselves of an idea so absurd. A certain local superintendent, recently making a financial appeal to her Legion, asked whether they had not all spent five cents for candy during the past week. One girl replied: "I have spent five cents today." And she was, by no means, a rare exception.

Most of the young people, even from the poorer homes, spend quite an amount during the year in self-gratification. The too-fearful superintendent is unintentionally defrauding those under her care of the practical training they should be receiving in the joy of giving, thru some effort of their own, or some denial of self.

The wise superintendent will insist that the money for dues be earned or saved, so that it will be an offering to the temperance cause from the Legioner himself, rather than from his parents. The wise superintendent will also suggest ways by which the money may be earned, such as securing a certain number of honorary members, selling tickets for an L. T. L. entertainment or medal contest.

Some leaders use, with excellent results in local Legions and in county and state W. C. T. U. and L. T. L. conventions, the Honor Roll as a stimulus to the payment of dues. A wall roll suitable for this purpose can be procured for 25 cents from W. T. P. A., 184 La Salle St., Chicago.

Each state is a law unto itself in the matter of state L. T. L. dues; but we strongly recommend, as has the National Convention, that state dues be also fixed at five cents per member. Of course it is only a matter of simple justice that Legions paying state dues, should, following the precedent of the National W. C. T. U., have representation by voting delegates in state W. C. T. U. conventions.

By all means let every Legion, if possible, contribute, from the proceeds of an entertainment, or otherwise, to one or more of our L. T. L. benevolences; but, first of all, let the dues, state and National, be secured.

"First, just; then generous."

Keep Away.

My boy, keep away from temptation,
It may conquer you ere you think;
'Tis a perilous thing to dally
And toy with the demon, drink.

Many stronger than you have tarried,
They were safe and secure, they thought,
Yet they yielded, one fatal moment,
And wide-spread ruin was wrought.

So keep away from temptation.
'Tis your safest plan, my dear son;
Do not sully your life's fair record
Ere your manhood's well begun.

For there's nothing but sorrow follows
In the wake of a man's first drink.
Do not take the first step, it may plunge you
Down over perdition's brink.

E. P. WENTWORTH, Superintendent.

OFTEN and truly is the plea made that the sin of intemperance, like many other sins, comes to a person as an "Angel of Light" and does not throw off its disguise until its victim has been bound hand and foot by the invisible but relentless bands of habit and appetite. But this plea can not be made, as a rule, for the boys in the State School. A large proportion of these boys have seen for themselves the misery, poverty and degradation resulting from the use of intoxicating drinks and they need only a few suggestive questions to make them realize that intemperance is the chief cause of want and crime in their own homes and in the homes of many of their associates. Were they asked "What is the greatest curse of our land today?" such answers as these, "Intemperance!" "Alcohol!" "Strong drink!" would greet one on every side.

The problem, with us is not so much how to convince the boys of the evils resulting from the use of intoxicating drinks as it is to help them to form habits which will enable them to resist the evils that they have so much cause to fear. In this important work, the comradeship of those whose lives have been blessed by temperate thinking, speaking and living is of inestimable value.

Temperance instruction has doubtless had a part in the curriculum of the State School for Boys since its opening in 1853; but the first temperance society on record is the "Garfield Cold Water Battalion," organized Sept. 2, 1881, with the assistance of Rev. H. A. Hart, of Portland. So long as the battalion was under the direction of Mr. Hart, it accomplished much good, but his death, together with changes in the school, made it difficult to continue the meetings, which, after a period of intermittency, finally ceased.

The Temperance Sunday School lessons have been productive of great good in the schools, as the boys are always interested in the practical lessons drawn from the Scripture text. When our state law was passed requiring that temperance physiology be taught in all the schools of Maine, the study was begun by the boys, and it has been of much value in keeping before them the scientific facts concerning the evils of intemperance.

The history of the growth of temperance sentiment in the State School for Boys would not be complete without mention of the valuable aid so freely given in lectures, entertainments and sermons, by the Rev. Samuel F. Pearson, the founder. Until his death in 1902, Mr. Pearson was at the head of the Gospel Temperance Mission in Portland, and from 1900 to 1902, he was known as the famous temperance sheriff of Cumberland county. In all of Mr. Pearson's addresses at the school, the evils of intemperance and the blessings of temperance living were faithfully portrayed. The visits of no other speaker were more eagerly anticipated or more highly appreciated. The good he accomplished is beyond estimate.

In 1899 the Annual School Exhibition, held the last of June, was a temperance entertainment. Miss Willard's picture tied with white ribbon and decorated with a bouquet of white pinks, was the central adornment of the stage, and two boys sang as a duet "There are Bands of Ribbon White Around the World" and held large pasteboard hemispheres crossed with bands of white ribbon as they sang.

All of these temperance movements were leading forward to the glad hour when temperance thought and effort at the State School were to be crystallized into a Boys' Loyal Temperance Legion. August 29, 1899, there was organized the Anna A. Gordon L. T. L. No Legion could have had a more beautiful and auspicious beginning, for Anna A. Gordon, the dearly-loved World's superintendent of L. T. L. work, was present to organize the Legion, and as if that were not honor enough for one day, the esteemed president of the National W. C. T. U. and the beloved neighbor of the school, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, was also present and assisted in the exercises. Miss Elizabeth Gordon was also an honored visitor that day. No member of the W. C. T. U., or no reader of THE UNION SIGNAL needs to be assured of the feast of good things enjoyed, or of the enthusiasm and inspiration of the occasion. The memory of that day yet remains with the legion, constantly encouraging its members to further effort. No boy officers were chosen at the organization meeting, but later all the boys voted for a boy president and a boy secretary.

The school is divided into four classes, under four teachers, and there is an L. T. L. platoon in each class. Each platoon elects its own officers, a captain and a vice-president, and the teacher appoints a Lookout committee and such other officers as she may consider needful. The vice-president of the platoons are also general officers. The platoons hold meetings once a week, with one of the boy officers in charge, under direction of the teachers. As often as possible, general meetings are held, to which each platoon carries a banner of blue bearing the name of the Legion and platoon in yellow. A white silk banner has been given to the Legion to be the special banner of the platoon having the largest proportion of active members. All the boys are considered members and those signing the pledge are called active members.

The L. T. L. at the State School for Boys usually numbers over a hundred active members out of about one hundred and fifty boys. It is the business of the Lookout committee to bring in recruits for the L. T. L. from the general members and new boys to take the places of those who go to homes.

At all the Legion meetings, the Pledge, Company Rule, State and National Junior Mottoes and State Rallying Cry are repeated in concert. At platoon meetings there is an opportunity given any one who wishes to sign the pledge, and often visitors as well as the boys sign. In one of our general meetings at which Miss Elizabeth Gordon gave her interesting talk on "The Story of a Bundle of Wheat," the pledge was presented for signature, but usually in a general meeting the signing of the pledge would take more time than can be spared.

All four numbers of Marching Songs are used. For badges, the boys wear the L. T. L. stick-pin in the form of a Maltese cross, the boy officers adding the red, white and blue ribbon badges. The folding L. T. L. card, containing the triple pledge, is used.

When a boy goes out from the school, he receives the pledge card and the L. T. L. Certificate of Membership which are procured of the W. T. P. A. and he is encouraged to ask others to sign the pledge. Often the boys do not wait until they go home but write home that they have signed the temperance pledge and send a written pledge in their letter for their friends to sign. What results have been obtained from their missionary efforts is not easily determined, but we do know that one of the boys was the means of converting and reforming his father, who for years had led the life of an outlaw in one of our border towns.

At the state W. C. T. U. convention held in Portland, Maine, in 1899, the Wentworth Cottage L. T. L. platoon sang three songs at an evening meeting and one of the boys sang "There's a Shadow on the Home" with great feeling.

The Legion's latest appearance in public was at the National Convention held at Portland, Maine, Oct. 16-22, 1902, when sixty of the active members sat on the platform during the opening night and sang three of Anna Gordon's marching songs. Led by their boy president, they repeated with good spirit mottoes and the state rallying cry.

While the boys at the school lead a comparatively busy life, they find time to learn temperance songs and recitations for their Legion meetings. Last winter a prize being offered for the best temperance story, eighteen boys competed for the prize, which was awarded at a pleasant little afternoon reception held for the competitors in the superintendent's sitting room.

The Legion is now looking forward to Medal Contests and other good things in the near future. They hope to have Mrs. Rice, the National superintendent of L. T. L. work, honor them with a visit, also the state L. T. L. superintendent; but best of all, the boys are giving promise that in the coming years the members of the Anna A. Gordon L. T. L. will make life purer, stronger and nobler for themselves and for others because of the good seed sown in their hearts at the Legion meetings at the State School for Boys.

"Quimby's Senior Ten."

By Faye Huntington.

Selected from the Senior L. T. L. Post Graduate Reading Course.

A WHITE church, a drab school house, a few comfortable homes with well-kept lawns, a few more not so comfortable with uninviting surroundings, the post-office, the one store with a rusty sign, "General Merchandise," a blacksmith shop and a saloon. We all know the place, a typical country village.

A summer day, blue sky, fleecy clouds, air laden with the breath of red clover and meadow grasses, glints of blue and gold and scarlet as summer birds flit thru the sunshine. A quiet scene and one would not dream that in some of the homes were aching hearts, and that under the cover of the night reeling forms often passed along the street.

But that summer morning by an unconscious hand a force was set in motion which would in time revolutionize the place.

The morning mail was in and a small crowd waited while the sleepy postmaster scrutinized each letter and postal card. But patience was rewarded, in one case at least, and presently Ethel Schuyler rushed into one of the happier homes like a small whirlwind. It was not an unusual way of coming home. A very slight matter served to send that young woman off into spasms of delight or to plunge her into abject woe. This time it was a joyful excitement and the occasion was explained by her first remark:

"A letter from May Marcus! And you couldn't imagine what she wants!"

"I presume not; if her wants are anything like yours they are quite beyond the imagining!" The sarcasm was good natured and Ethel did not mind but went on with her explanation: "She wants me to visit her next week! She says there is to be a convention in Wilton and it will be a good opportunity—get reduced rates and all that; the ticket good for a week and the convention only lasts three days, so there will be time for other things. See, Marmsie?"

"I see!" replied Mrs. Schuyler. "What is this convention that is so accommodating as to give the opportunity for you and May to bring about such a desirable event as your visiting her?"

"I don't know; can't quite make it out; looks like L. T. L., and I am sure I can't guess what those letters stand for. Life, Truth, Liberty,—dear knows what it can be! The last 'L' probably stands for League. I suppose it is something May belongs to. In fact, she says she hopes I will get interested in the L. T. L.—if those are the letters. But I can assure her I'll be interested in nothing beyond a visit with her!"

A little talk about the matter and it was settled that Ethel should accept the invitation. Going at the earliest possible time when she could take advantage of the reduced rates, she did not fall in with other delegates, and either by accident or otherwise May did not talk much about the convention previous to the opening. And it was not until Ethel was settled in the church with a program in her hand that her curiosity was re-awakened as to the meaning of the mystic letters. She turned over the program and read, "March of the Alumni," then, "March of the Graduates." She turned to her friend, "Why, May, what is this? I thought it was just a convention—is it a school commencement?"

"Why, dear child," responded May, "don't you know about it? I thought everybody knew about the L. T. L.! It is a society—the Loyal Temperance Legion."

"O-h, temperance!"

"Yes, and we have courses of study and diplomas and seals, like the C. L. S. C., and this is our 'Recognition Day!'"

"I see!" was Ethel's response, but to herself she was saying, "I'll keep still now and find out what I can by my wits without making any further exhibition of ignorance. There's a lot of things I'd like to know, but I am ashamed to ask questions about what everybody else seems to have a perfect understanding of."

Ethel Schuyler learned several things in those two days. The enthusiasm of the crowd of boys and girls did not surprise her. She was easily enthused herself; but the topic was such a novel one to her—that a company of young people could find so much of interest in the subject of temperance was a marvel. O, yes, they were temperance people at home, of course; but she did not know there was so much of it! Here these boys and girls had found enough to fill a two-days' program! And it was all so interesting and some of it so startling! If these things were true it was time she waked up. Slowly the conviction came upon Ethel Schuyler that she was called to a work like this, which was so graphically presented. And after this thought was fixed in her mind how eager she was to seize upon every scrap of information; how she treasured every paper and leaflet; how she filled her note-book and her memory, as well as her heart, and all was carried back to Quimby. Two days after her return, through a driving rain, in storm cloak and cap, with rubber boots, she rushed through the village asking the girls and boys to meet at her home that evening and get some new ideas she had brought home with her from Wilton.

"Ethel is out on one of her campaigns," said Lou Baker; "we must all go and find out what she has in her head this time!"

There were only a very few young people in the neighborhood and sometimes these few found rather dull times so they were quite ready to take hold of anything which promised to stir them up.

Ethel's usual volubility did not desert her as she rehearsed the things she had learned and she really succeeded in imparting some of her own enthusiasm to at least three or four of the girls. But Lou Baker was ready with objections.

"I would just as soon join so far as I am concerned, but there will not be enough of us to do anything. The boys won't join, I know, and I don't see any use in having just a girls' temperance society."

"Now don't throw a whole bucket of cold water all at once. I can stand quite a shower, but like to have it come down gently like rain!"

"Better have it all in the beginning and if your zeal isn't put out by it you'll know what it is worth!" responded Lou laughing, adding, "I suppose the first thing will be to have an entertainment to raise money to carry on the society and I am sick of the very thought of entertainments. We work like galley slaves for a week and when it is over and we count up the receipts and balance accounts we take the upper figures from the lower and write a minus sign before the grand result and there you have it! That is the way entertainments pay in this village! So if the object is to make money you can count me on the minus side!"

"But this is a different thing. It will not take much money to meet at each others' homes once a week and have a temperance lesson with a short program of original papers, recitations and songs with now and then a parliamentary drill."

"But the boys won't join such a society," persisted Lou. "I know they won't and you know they won't!"

"I think some of them will—in fact Archie Frink and George Harris have already promised. They will be here to-night if they get home from the city in time."

"But you can't count on more than a dozen. I don't believe you can get a dozen, for there are not more than that number of girls and boys in the whole neighborhood, all counted."

"Well, suppose we can't get more than ten? There was a class represented in the convention—they called themselves 'The Senior Ten.' That just fits our case. We get ten and then if more want to join, we take them in until we have fifteen. Then five branch off and each securing another member, they form a second 'ten'—a sort of self-propagating arrangement. There are six of us here and we ought to be able to get four more. I think I can count on Lynn, and some of you have brothers you might persuade to join."

It turned out that ten names were easily secured, but Ethel's brother Lynn was not one of them. He refused out and out.

"You don't catch me with any such sugar coated affair!" he said. "If you will get up a series of dancing socials or something that promises some fun, I'll go into it with all my heart, but as for pinning myself down to study and namby pamby entertainments of the goody sort—excuse me!"

Lynn Schuyler was sixteen, a year younger than Ethel, but he had the look and manners of a youth of nineteen or twenty. Ethel had in childhood and in the earlier years of their girlhood and boyhood been the leader, but somewhere on the road he seemed to have come up with her and even to have passed beyond her, in leadership at least, and she had in a great measure lost her hold upon him. She sometimes asked herself where and how it happened that they had changed places.

Three years before, Ethel, standing at the altar, had taken upon herself the vows of the church. Looking on from a seat in the gallery, Lynn wondered how it would be; would he lose his old-time comrade, or would he go along with her? He had always gone everywhere with her, and it was hard to be left out; perhaps next time he would be ready for the step she had just taken. But as days and weeks passed, he, from his point of view saw but little change in Ethel's purposes or interests and he said within himself, "Well, there doesn't seem to be much in it after all. I may as well keep along with other boys. I don't suppose Ethel cares; she has never asked me to go along with her and I won't bother my head about being a Christian." And when Ethel came home from a year at school with her pretty little boarding school airs, which were really very becoming, had Lynn but known it, the brother and sister drifted more widely apart. And when one or twice, detecting about him the odor of cigars or liquor, Ethel expostulated, Lynn laughed scornfully and said:

"Don't you worry! I don't interfere with your ways and I can't see that they are very much better than mine, seeing you are a girl and I am a boy!"

And now that he had so decidedly refused to have anything to do with the new movement, Ethel was more troubled than ever. "Yes," she said to herself, "I have lost my influence over Lynn. There is a great deal said about a sister's influence, but either they are different kinds of sisters or different kinds of brothers. Lynn used to think everything I said or did was just right but it is not so any more. To be sure he is always glad to take me to the city, to concerts and entertainments or to any thing that is going on here in Quimby, but I do not suppose he could be hired or coaxed to go to prayer meeting or Sunday School with me."

"When did you ask him?"

Was there some one in the room who asked the question?

Ethel was almost forced to believe so, though she knew that it was a voice in her own heart that put the startling inquiry. When indeed? On the rare occasions when she went to prayer service she would sometimes ask Lynn to call at the church door for her to escort her home, but she could not remember that she had ever asked him to go with her and often she went with him to the city on the same evening of the church service. She wondered now if he ever thought of the things which were pressing themselves upon her conscience. Was she part to blame for the habits which she felt were fastening themselves upon her brother? Was there any way to regain her hold upon him?" "And it isn't my brother only," she said, still communing with herself. "There are others—Harry Kimball and Jack Wells, who stand with him and I feel perfectly sure that unless we can get them to join our 'Ten' they will get to spending their evening at Perkins. They are not the sort to be got in by leaving them out in the cold until they are chilled so as to want to come in. If they can't go with our set they will find a lower down set to mix in with."

It was a Sunday afternoon when these thoughts persistently troubled the girl. Mrs. Schuyler was away for a fortnight; Ethel went to church in the morning with her father and at dinner time Lynn, who had been kept in by a sudden cold, complained that it was horribly lonesome and yet his sister did not think of helping the long afternoon to pass more quickly and more pleasantly, until she came down stairs ready for evening service. One of those sudden changes in the weather had taken place and a cold drizzling rain was falling, making it seem more like November than August. Lynn, from the depths of an easy chair, said in a husky voice:

"Going out again? Seems to me it must take a great deal of religion to carry one through this storm to hear Mr. Smith say over again the things he has been saying for the last hundred years or so!"

"Sometimes it takes more religion to stay at home than it does to go to church, even through a driving rain," said Mr. Schuyler pleasantly. Ethel looked up wondering if there was a meaning in her father's words beyond what appeared and if they were meant for her, though addressed to her brother. She walked over to the window and stood looking out into the storm. Presently she said, "I think I won't go after all; that is if you don't mind?"

"It is a wise decision, I think," was the reply, and the brother and sister were left alone. "You needn't mind about staying down stairs with me," said Lynn. "I shall do well enough."

"'Well enough' is all right when you cannot do better. I will go up stairs with my wraps and get into a tea gown and slippers before I settle down for the evening." She flitted away as tho she were doing the most natural thing in the world, yet she had never done anything that seemed more unnatural to her. She hastily changed her street dress for a crimson tea gown, saying to herself: "Whatever will I do? If Lynn should imagine that I am trying to get a hold upon him he would resent it at once and matters would be worse than now. I think papa never said anything truer than in saying it might require more religion to stay at home than to go out in the storm. I shall need more than I possess to get thru without being swamped in the breakers. I wonder if I'll offer to read or sing or what? I think I'll just loll around and watch for the 'signs of the times.'"

Returning to the sitting room she noticed how exceedingly hoarse her brother was growing and she said:

"You are very hoarse?"

"Yes, and getting worse. I suppose if mother were here she would fix up something, but I don't know what to take."

The discouraged tone struck Ethel more painfully even than did the huskiness of his voice, but she said in a cheery way:

"I know of a good thing for hoarseness. I'll go and see if we have the things in the house to fix it."

It was only the work of a few minutes to whip the white of an egg, mix with it the juice of a large lemon and add a few lumps of loaf sugar, making a frothy mixture which filled a goblet.

"There," she said, reappearing in the sitting room, "you are to take a spoonful of this ambrosial mixture a little oftener than often; that is, about every fifteen minutes."

JUVENILE TEMPLARS OF ICELAND.

MISS EDITH WILSON,
L. T. L. Sec. for Great Britain.

THE BIRDS' NEST

Action Song by Miss Gertrude Davies

[The Birds' Nest is a summer home for poor children from the slums of London, maintained by Lady Henry Somerset, in connection with Duxhurst, the Industrial Farm Colony for inebriate women.]

Speeches.

FIRST GIRL.

Ladies and Gentlemen.—We beg to introduce ourselves to you this evening as members of the "Loyal Legion." We are banded together against England's deadliest foe—Strong Drink.

We have taken a pledge not only to abstain ourselves, but to do all in our power to make the children of Great Britain members of the Temperance Army.

Our motto is "Lifting others as we climb."

Tonight we are going to ask you for your sympathy and interest in one of our efforts to lift the helpless little ones of Darker London, for a few weeks in the year, into a haven of bliss.

SECOND GIRL.

'Tis the Merrie Month of May; the trees are putting on their gayest summer dresses. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds has come. From out the trees and hedges we hear the "Chirp, chirp," of the sparrow, and the robin is singing a carol to his mate, as she tends the wee birdies in their nest, her heart full of joy and thankfulness for all the gifts of life.

It is our spring-time, and we too have our Nest; where the little waifs and strays of London, who have never heard the birds sing, or seen the grass growing round their squalid loveless homes, may eat good food, breathe pure air, and know what it feels like to be loved and cared for.

THIRD GIRL.

The little birds who go up week by week to our Nest do not come from gilded cages or bright homes. We seek out the poorest of the poor, living in squalid alleys, crowded courts, and dark underground cellars. Those little men and women who have no toys, no gardens, and to whom joy is an unknown word.

None are too poor, too wretched, or too naughty for our Birds' Nest.

We take them all in, and for a brief bright space, lift them from their wretchedness into a Paradise of Happiness.

FOURTH GIRL.

We are told that tiny streamlets lead to mighty rivers.

Every year we hope to make our Nest grow bigger, not with wool and hay and moss, but with gifts of gold and silver.

Last year the good Sisters in the Nest tended and cared for one hundred of these worse than homeless human birds.

Here they found rest and food, and green grass and bright flowers; and here the naughty ones grew good, and the good grew better.

But our Nest is small, and we sigh to think of the many little children who cannot come because we have no room for them, and we are impatient for the time when our stream shall become a mighty river.

FIFTH GIRL.

We are only children, and though our hearts are large our purses are small; we cannot earn because our time is spent in learning. Money we must have, or else the Nest must again be closed before its time, and many little ones be disappointed of their holiday.

The Nest is open from May till October. Last year our funds were low, and so we had to close the Nest in September.

We can see those tiny pleading faces cloud with bitter sorrow, and as we shake our hands and show our empty purses, the tear-drops trickle down the grimy cheeks, and we turn away lest we should hear their sobs. Only three weeks of bliss in one long, weary year. Will you not help us? remembering that "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto these My little ones, ye have done it unto Me."

SIXTH GIRL.

Our speeches are ended; we thank you for your kind attention, and hope that you will give your practical help and sympathy to our Birds' Nest. We feel sure that you, like ourselves, will be the gainers by your gifts.

We need at least £150 every year to carry on this noble work. We are young in years, but strong in hope; we mean to do all that is in our power to lift others as we climb, and we ask you by your gifts to aid us.

Love divine will fill your storehouse
And your handful still renew,
Scanty fare for one will often make
A royal feast for two.

For the heart grows rich in giving;
All its wealth is living gain.
Seeds which mildew in the garner
Scattered, fill with gold the grain.

L. T. L. GIRLS OF LONDON.

Directions.

Six girls dressed as Birds' Nest Nurses, in dark blue or black dresses, with white starched cap and tippet, and red or white apron (red most effective).

LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

Each girl has in her hand a money-box, on which is printed "L. T. L."

The girls enter together and stand in a row. Each girl advances when it is her turn to make the speech, holding up her money-box, and at the conclusion of each speech all unite in singing the chorus: "Please to give."

It helps greatly if others are ready to join in the chorus.

It is quite necessary that the speeches should be said clearly and distinctly.

CHORUS.

We are merry little nurses,
Begging you to ope your purses,
Loyal maidens, members, mothers,
Help as sisters, help as brothers,
Show us that your hearts are true,
That is what we ask of you.
Please to give, O please to give,
Please to give, O please to give,

We would not your purses rifle,
But would ask you for a trifle,
Just to fill the Birdies nest,
With small waifs from East and West,
Help us with these, men and ladies,
Help us with these helpless babies.
Please to give, O please to give,
Please to give, O please to give,

The Legions' Red, White and Blue.

(Tune: Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean.)

By Ida B. Cole.

LIST, friends, to the good news we're bringing,
Let it sound over valley and sea,
The voices of youth now are singing
The song of the saved and the free.
The tyrant we fight now shall tremble,
Wherever our banner's in view,
And maidens and youths all assemble
'Neath the folds of the red, white and blue.

CHORUS.

'Neath the folds of the red, white and blue,
'Neath the folds of the red, white and blue,
And maidens and youths all assemble
'Neath the folds of the red, white and blue.

Strong drink, crime and evil are breeding;
It threatens the land to destroy,
It lists to a mother unheeding,
For to ruin it leads her dear boy.
With the license of nation protected,
It defies both the just and the true,
But in time 'twill be bravely ejected
From the folds of the red, white and blue.

CHORUS.

From the folds of the red, white and blue,
From the folds of the red, white and blue,
But in time 'twill be bravely ejected
From the folds of the red, white and blue.

Our Legion shall ne'er faint nor falter,
While drink fills this land with such shame;
We bring our young lives to God's altar,
And go forth now to work in His name.
Our true union no discord can sever,
To one pledge we will always be true;
We'll drive rum and whisky forever
From the folds of the red, white and blue.

CHORUS.

From the folds of the red, white and blue,
From the folds of the red, white and blue,
We'll drive rum and whisky forever,
From the folds of the red, white and blue.

What "The Crusader" Meant.

By Alice M. Guernsey,

First Editor of "The Young Crusader."

DURING a session at Chautauqua, in the summer of 1886, Miss Willard "interviewed" me. With that faculty of setting everybody at work that she possessed to a remarkable degree—adding thereto the power to make one willing to attempt the seemingly impossible—she planned W. C. T. U. duties for me on the Assembly ground, and then added, "We are thinking of starting a paper for the children. f we do, I want you for its editor."

We discussed the pros and cons of the matter for awhile, but there was nothing definite to be said. With the beginning of the fall term I went back into the school room, and no word came from Chicago until a week before the Christmas vacation. Then a telegram came:

"We start the children's paper in January. Will you come?"

As may be easily seen, the new editor had but little to do with the anxious thought and planning that preceded the venture. Indeed, the kindly hands of others—Miss Willard, Miss West, Mrs. Andrews, and Miss Ames—did most of the work on the opening issue of the paper, and some one of them probably—I wish I knew who—christened the little sheet. But what it meant to us, what we hoped it would mean to the boys and girls who should come under the motherly care of the W. C. T. U., was expressed as best I might in the opening greeting. I can give no better statement of its purpose, in response to the request of the editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, than as thus set forth:

Come, fearless invaders,
From near and from far,
Come, join our Crusaders,
Arrayed for the war.
White cross on your buckler,
As purity's token,
Sure presage of triumph,
And faith never broken.

Not now for the city
Encircling a tomb,
For the risen Redeemer
Has scattered its gloom.
Jerusalem olden
Was hallowed and blest,
But through all the wide world
Are the shrines of our quest.

O troops of the Legion,
O children "afield,"
Before your oncoming
The foemen shall yield.
Smite down the oppressors,
Shame, sorrow and sin,
For the Master's true shrines
Are the hearts He would win.

Brave sons of brave mothers,
Crusaders by prayer,
Fair daughters who honor
The names that you bear,
Fling out your white banners,
With watchword bedight,
"Tremble, King Alcohol!
God for the right!"

As I look over the bound volumes of those early years, I wonder why we did not do a great many things that, in the light of today, I see we might have done. But the Loyal Temperance Legion has taken long steps forward in the last sixteen years. The things it does today were not so much as dreamed of then. But I am glad to see that in all these years, The Crusader has stood for that for which we said it should stand at the beginning—the whiteness of pure lives and the undying hate for that which enslaves body and soul.

The Crusader should be the exponent of the Loyal Temperance Legion—that we meant from the very first. And in so standing it should do its utmost to develop that all-roundness of character that we wanted to see in stalwart manhood and earnest womanhood, as our boys and girls grew up. And in this purpose, putting myself back, as best I may, to the days of its infancy, I reach glad hands across the years to those who stand as guardians now that it has almost attained its majority, and say, "The beautiful things you do now were all meant then, tho we could not do them; the bud must grow into the flower."

Red Letter Days.

By Mrs. H. B. Wisner,
L. T. L. Secretary of Ohio.

WE celebrate, this month, the birthday of Anna Gordon, the children's special friend. She bears them in mind in all her travels, by land and by sea. We can do her no greater honor than by suggesting to every childless union that on the 21st of July you organize an L. T. L. to be your special charge, and that on each recurring anniversary of its organization, you make it the special Red Letter day, not only of Anna Gordon, but of your L. T. L. Let it be Children's Day. Make your meeting place bright and beautiful with flowers and singing birds and appropriate music.

This day has a significance in it above all other days. It has to do with the future. The L. T. L. is the reserve force of the mother society. It is the power of what is to be, and not of what has been. The boys and girls of the L. T. L. have in their grasp the destinies of society, and of the state. They are banded together to resist evils and the force of this resistance largely depends on the efficiency of the instructions they receive in scientific temperance truths, and in their comprehension of them.

We have high hopes as to the future of our Junior Legioners, who are coming to the front, and of our brave Seniors, who are climbing "higher and higher," and lifting others as they climb. The time is not far distant when they must assume the cares and responsibilities of society and state that are now placed on older shoulders. If the observance of this Red Letter Day does nothing more than call the attention of the church and the world to the future power of the young, it will have accomplished its mission.

She brought an afghan and wrapped it about him, moved up a foot-rest, and then settled herself in another easy chair and waited further opportunities of making herself either useful or agreeable. Lynn tried to talk, evidently thinking he ought to make some return for her effort in his behalf, but Ethe said:

"Lynn, I think you ought not to talk. Suppose I read to you, or shall I sing?" Without waiting a reply she opened the piano and picking out a favorite of her brother's she tried to dispel his weariness. Presently she said: "Lynn, here is the little hymn that you used to play the violin accompaniment. If I bring down your violin do you think you can play it for me? It is a long time since I sang it."

After he had played a few pieces Ethel said: "Why, Lynn, you play a great deal better than you did the last time I heard you! Have you been practicing lately?"

"O, I practice some with Tom Perkins and his sister."

Tom Perkins and Tom Perkins' sister! Why should Ethel have been disturbed? Anna Perkins was in her Sunday-school class and as for Tom, she knew little of him, but they were the children of the saloon keeper and lived over the saloon and the thought of Lynn frequenting the house, was unpleasant.

"Why do you go there?"

"Why not? They are not to blame for their father's business."

"I suppose not—yet—"

"'The sins of the fathers,' I suppose you are thinking of, and I know it is true, but it does not seem fair that Tom should be blamed for something he can't help. I wouldn't join the Senior Class on his account, if I had no other season. Of course he don't drink and he hates the business, but sometimes he has to stay in the saloon when his father is away, and I suppose you wouldn't take in a liquor seller."

"It would not seem to be just the thing, but if he is a temperance boy at heart some way ought to be thought out to have him share our good times."

"Good times! Now, Ethel, do you mean to say that you have good times at that circle of yours?"

"You ought to be there to see for yourself." After a moment's silence, Ethel asked: "Say, Lynn, do you suppose we could have Tom and Anna here some evening to practice some songs with piano and violin accompaniment?"

"Why, would you? I wish you would; I don't know as they would come; they are rather proud about going where people look down upon them, but we might ask them."

The next time the program committee met Ethel Schuyler said:

"I can promise a treat in the way of music for our next public meeting. Lynn and two friends of ours will take two or three numbers." There was much questioning and guessing as to who and what, but Ethel only laughed and said: "All I can tell you is, they are prospective members."

The months sped away. The Senior evenings became quite the thing. Once a fortnight a public was given which everybody was glad to attend, and there was more temperance sentiment set afloat in the community than had been preached there for years. One evening towards the close of January Lynn stood at the foot of the steps leading to the private entrance of the Perkins house. He was waiting for Tom, and as that young man appeared Mr. Perkins came across the street from the post-office.

"You two young fellows seem to be doing considerable temperance diddling this winter!" he said, good humoredly. "Tom, do you belong to that society that you are helping boom?"

"No, sir," was the quiet reply.

"Well, it seems to me I wouldn't run after a lot of young folks if I wasn't good enough to be taken into full fellowship. I never knew a Perkins for a hanger-on!"

"Why, father, it isn't the fault of the members that I do not belong to 'The Senior Ten.'"

"Whose fault is it?"

"Well, yours, I guess! I am not complaining, but if I never had to sell another glass of liquor I should join to-night."

Mr. Perkins stood for a moment regarding his boy. Finally he said: "Well, Tom, go ahead! I give you my word of honor that you shall never be asked to serve a customer."

"Father, do you mean it?"

"I have said it! A Perkins never goes back upon what he has said. My boy is as good as the rest, and I am not going to stand in his way."

Telling Ethel about it afterwards Lynn said: "And if you will believe it the great boy sat down on the stairs and cried like a baby. I got him away as soon as I could, fearing a crowd would gather. Of course that took away my last excuse, and I had to join, too. I suppose you are satisfied with your winter's work? I don't know as you will get the credit of it but I tell you if you had sneered at Tom and Anna that Sunday afternoon it would have turned out very differently."

Lynn and Tom took up the study of the course and by putting in extra time and effort were able to graduate with the Class and I doubt if among our Alumni there are any prouder possessors of the L. T. L. Diploma.

A Noble Legion.

By Mrs. Lenna Yost.

L. T. L. Secretary of West Virginia.

D. C. ARNOLD.

THE Elk Garden L. T. L. was organized in 1889 and has had regular meetings six months in each year ever since its organization This is a mining town and has a population of about 1,500 in both town and suburbs. The first superintendent of our Legion was Miss Lou McIntire, who held that office two years, when she was called to her reward. Since then there have been two other superintendents, with D. C. Arnold, principal of the public school, as leader the entire time. The influence of the L. T. L. children in this mining town has been such as to lessen the amount of drinking, and a number of homes have abandoned strong drink entirely.

Temperance entertainments were the special feature of the Legion's work in its earlier years. Later these have given way in part to Fourth of July picnics, Decoration Day observance, gospel temperance meetings, medal contests, and graduating exercises. This will be the fifth year of class graduation, fifty-four having received diplomas in the past four years. This year's class numbers about twenty.

Seventeen of our graduates were teachers at the time of receiving their diplomas. Twelve of them are still teaching. They are now scattered in four counties and in two states, preaching the gospel of temperance with increased power. Three of our teachers (graduates) are now attending a distant school and have written home for manuals and pledge cards for student friends whom they have interested in temperance work. One of our lady graduates moved to an adjoining town two years ago and interested six young people in the study of the manuals. They were all in our graduating class last year. This kind of work is continuing, and we expect good results this year.

Just before Christmas, for several years past, our Legion has supplied the entire town with temperance literature by a house-to-house distribution. Eighteen thousand pages of temperance tracts and papers have been distributed the past year. We employ a librarian and two assistants in giving out this literature to the Legioners, and they in turn pass it on.

During the fourteen years of the existence of our Legion over 500 have taken the triple pledge. Legioners from this town may be found in twenty other towns, and while a few have been faithless, nine-tenths of them show by their lives that they are faithful apostles of temperance.

The Ethel Gilley L. T. L.

By Mrs. Alice M. Bowman,

L. T. L. Secretary of California.

SOME years ago a happy little girl lived in the town of Santa Rosa, Cal. When only four years old she became a member of an L. T. L. and most heartily did she enjoy the meetings. After a time the family removed to San Francisco and Ethel soon found a place in church and Sunday-school, but, alas! there was no L. T. L. to which she could belong.

Now what did Ethel do? Did she think herself too small and young to accomplish anything? Not she. Instead, she wrote a letter to Mrs. Eyster, asking her to come to her home and organize a Legion.

Mrs. Eyster replied at once that she would do so if Ethel could find sixteen boys and girls who would unite with it.

At once Ethel went to work explaining, inviting, till on the day appointed, twenty children met in Mrs. Gilley's parlors, and were organized by Mrs. Eyster, with Mrs. Jenness as leader, and Sally Kerr as president, in April, 1897.

For some time the Legion met at Ethel's house, and then the family removed to another part of the city. Ethel's stay in the new home was very brief, for Jesus called her to the home above. "I'm a child of the King," was the song on her lips and in her heart, till she saw the King in His beauty.

Before her illness, Ethel had secured the names of several boys and girls near the new home. After her death these were organized by Mrs. Eyster into a new Legion, named by her the "Ethel Gilley L T. L."

The original society then met at the home of Mrs. Helbing, who, assisted by Mrs. Shehan, carried it on for some time. The Legion increased greatly in numbers and usefulness, till illness in both families compelled a change of leadership. The two branches were then united, under Mrs. Bainbridge, assisted by Miss Patterson, who still has charge.

Many circumstances combine to cause constant change in the membership, so that from first to last, many scores of young people have come under the influence of the L. T. L. for varying periods. But it may be truthfully said that no boy or girl has attended even one meeting without hearing some plain lesson on right thinking and right living, which, we trust, will bear fruit in after years. The Legion numbers at present about thirty, having recently lost many by removal.

The members are earnest workers and are active in distributing L. T. L. literature and flowers. They obtained about 200 signatures on tobacco pledge cards.

Many interesting gatherings are held apart from the regular weekly meetings. And so our little Legion marches on, bearing our motto, "Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up."

Miss Willard's sweet face looks down on us from the wall, the Ethel Gilley banner shines on the platform. We strive to follow in their footsteps, and do what in us lies, for "God, and home, and every land."

Abbie A. Eyre,

L. T. L. Superintendent.

JOHN W. SHRIGLEY.
President Williamson Free School of Mechanical Trades.

THE Williamson Free School of Mechanical Trades has an L. T. L. composed almost entirely of young men between the ages of sixteen and twenty. Sixty-four of these young men have graduated in the manual course since its organization in 1895. Reports from these, and from others who have graduated from the school, show that its influence has spread to other parts of our state.

One graduate writes that he has organized two Legions since leaving the school; another of the need of an organization in the town where he is employed. Many testify of the help and strength received in the school, enabling them to resist the many temptations which beset them.

When the Legion was first organized, the superintendent had no union near at hand, hence arose the necessity of a parent society, and the Middletown W. C. T. U. was the result—a case of child adopting its mother.

The Legion has made the Flower Mission its chief work. The flowering shrubs and plants on the school lawn are all devoted to that purpose. The near-by woods furnish large quantities of ferns and wild flowers, which are gathered by the members.

Public meetings, with an occasional lecture, form a prominent feature, but the chief interest is centered in the weekly lesson period, when one of the adult members takes charge of the lesson and directs the discussion of the topics.

By Helen G. Rice

THIS program, prepared for the celebration of the birthday of the World's L. T. L. secretary, aims, by setting forth the dignity of labor, and the grace of giving, to honor Miss Gordon, whose "strenuous" and consecrated life has continually exemplified the admonition: "Not to be ministered unto, but to minister."

A Labor Operetta.

(From The School Journal.)

[This little operetta will require twelve persons to act it. All should be singers; there should be a piano or other musical instrument.

A farmer clad in overalls and blouse, wearing a broad-brimmed straw hat, and shouldering a hoe, first comes upon the stage, and, after using his hoe, looks up and with appropriate gesture sings:]

I'm glad I am a husbandman
My acres broad to till;
And in the autumn of the year
My many barns to fill;
How happy is the farmer's life,
'Tis one of peace and joy,
To reap and sow, to plow and mow,
And thus the time employ.

(Uses his hoe.

The entire Legion join with the farmer in the following chorus, which they repeat after each verse):

CHO. O, happy is the one who works,
To him the day brings joy;
When evening shadows gather round
He rests without alloy.
Yes, happy is the one who toils,
His heart is always gay,
For he is doing useful things
Thruout the livelong day.

(The farmer's wife, dressed in calico dress and large apron, comes in bringing a large mixing pan, filled with cotton, which she places on a table. She kneads as she sings):

I'm glad I am a farmer's wife,
The wheaten bread to knead;
And when the men come home from work,
Their hungry mouths to feed.
I'm glad I am a farmer's wife,
Her heart is always gay,
And merrily her song rings out
Thru all the livelong day.

(The farmer and wife join in the chorus, she kneading and he hoeing. The farmer's boy carries a rake, and, looks as if he meant work, acts jolly and gay. He rakes, and then faces the audience and sings):

I'm glad I am a farmer's boy,
I'm happy all the day.
I'll rake and pitch and hoe and dig,
And sing my merry lay;
Hurrah, then, for the farmer's boy,
He's happy all the day;
He rakes and pitches, hoes and digs,
And sings his merry lay.

(The farmer now hoes, the wife kneads, the boy rakes, and all sing the chorus. The farmer's girl is dressed in a neat print, and has a spinning wheel; this she turns round a few times, and then sings):

I'm glad I am a farmer's girl,
I love the farmer's life,
And if I ever wed at all
I'll be a farmer's wife;
My wheel makes such nice music
I'm happy all the day;
While with its merry, busy hum
I sing my roundelay.

(Now all do their work and join in the chorus.

The dairy-maid, with pail and milking stool, steps on the stage and sings):

I'm glad I am a dairy-maid,
My butter is so yellow;
And oh, the lad that catches me
Will be a lucky fellow.
How happy is the dairy-maid,
Her heart is always gay,
And merrily her song rings out
Thru all the livelong day.

(The maid stands, her arms akimbo; the rest work, and all join in the chorus. The artist carries a camera. He sings):

I'm glad that I an artist am,
I take off people's faces;
I deal in cameras and curls,
And set off maidens' graces.
I am a photographer gay,
In negatives delight;
I play with pictures all the day,
And sleep in peace at night.

(The artist pretends to take a picture, the maid swings the pail, etc., etc., and all join in chorus. The blacksmith enters and puts a pair of irons on the table or chair, and strikes blows on them, keeping time to music. After a few blows he sings):

I'm glad I am a blacksmith,
The noble horse to shoe.
With forge and anvil always hot,
With music rare and true.
I'm glad I am a blacksmith,
With all my might and main
I'll work away from day to day,
And honest money gain.

(Now all work and sing the chorus.

A teacher enters with two pupils who are mischievous and have to be reproved. She stands them in a row, and they say, "Ten times one is ten," etc. She waves her hand, and they stop, and she sings):

I'm glad I am a teacher
With book and slate and rule,
I'll fan the flames of genius
And keep a happy school.
'Tis a joy to be a teacher,
No idle dunce for me;
I'll sing with scholars round me
A tune of merry glee.

(They all set to work and join in the chorus.

A wood-sawyer enters with a saw-horse and log of wood and saws. After sawing a few times he sings):

I'm glad I am a wood-sawyer,
And all must see my worth
As they surround the cheerful fire
That glows upon the hearth.
I'm glad I am a wood-sawyer,
My heart is always gay,
While song and saw their music make,
Thruout the livelong day.

(He saws, the rest work and sing the chorus.

A dressmaker enters, sewing on a dress. She sings):

I'm glad I am a dressmaker,
With such artistic taste
To cut and fit I'm sure to hit
Without one bit of waste;
I'm glad I am a dressmaker,
I'll make a useful wife,
For wear spoils every kind of thing
Along the way of life.

(All set to work and join in chorus.

A grandmother enters. Her hair is powdered, and she wears glasses, a cap, and has a little shoulder shawl. She should seat herself in a rocking-chair in the center, and knits and rocks; then she sings):

Oh, I'm a happy grandmother,
I knit from morn till eve;
I have a thought for many another,
As you, indeed, perceive.
My life is free from heavy care,
I sing, and smile, and pray;
I joy in blessings everywhere
Thruout the livelong day.

(All make movements and sing the chorus.

(A washer-woman enters, dressed in calico garments and apron; she should have her sleeves rolled up and speak with a broad brogue. Her tub is put on a bench by a boy, and she pushes it to the front. She finds a wash-board and clothes (no water), and she rubs a few times and then sings):

I'm glad I am a washer-woman,
Ye'd know me by me look;
I'll wash and starch yer snowy clothes,
And fold them like a book.
So bring along yer orders quick,
For I've no time for foolin',

(Spoken), "And I'll dispatch them to the best of my ability, shure!"

(All make movements and join in the chorus.

The chorus may be made very amusing. Each one keeps time with the music by his or her appropriate gestures. When the last chorus is finished all begin to make a noise. The farmer hoes, the wheel whizzes, the milk-maid thumps on the pail—this will continue for a short time; watching the teacher they raise the right foot, and as it comes down they all say "Bang!")

(Additional stanza supplied by Young Crusader):

We joy in honest labor, now,
And here we tell you true,
No work of ours shall ruin men
In souls and bodies, too.
No cider from this farmer's press.

Boy.— "No rum or beer for me!"
Girl.— "No drunkard's wife I'll be!"
All.— "The work we do shall bless the world,
From evil set it free."

(There is a perfect silence for a moment. Then the grandmother starts softly, "The Old Oaken Bucket." Then curtain drops.)

(Taken from Young Crusader of August, 1893.)

Comfort Bags.

(The Legion's superintendent, after a brief description of the object of the Comfort Bags and their value to soldiers and sailors, will say:)

Our National superintendent of this work makes this earnest appeal: "Very few comfort bags are coming in: I have two hundred, without any filling. Oh! that the L. T. L.'s would send me the necessary articles or money to buy them. I am almost heart-broken over being without these things, and more than 200 pledged boys waiting for them."

We are now, in the name of Miss Gordon, whose whole life has been given to helping others, to bring our offerings to aid in filling these two hundred comfort bags for these pledged soldier boys. Those who are not prepared with the required articles can have the privilege of aiding by contributions of money.

(Following the orders of the Captain, the Legion first, and then all others in attendance, may form in line, and, marching to music, deposit their offerings in a designated spot, preferably near a picture of Miss Gordon. At the close of this exercise the Legioners, drawn up in parallel lines, will salute the flag, and sing the following song:)

The Home Guard.

By Kate Lunden Sunderlin.

(Tune—"Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean.")

Who will stand for the homes of our nation,
The homes that were built by the brave?
Who will save them from Rum's desolation
And dig for the tyrant a grave?
Who will sweep from the folds of Old Glory
The clouds which are darkening its stars?
Who will blot from our world-honored story
The word which its pages now mar?
Who will stand for the red, white and blue,—
Our star-spangled red, white and blue?
Who will sweep from the folds of Old Glory
The clouds which now hang o'er its blue?

We are coming, the scions of heroes,
To prove that they died not in vain;
And we challenge the sin-hardened Neros
Who play o'er the graves of the slain.
Away with the laws of protection
Which shelter their infamous trade!
We are coming to show by our action
The strength of the vows we have made.
We will stand for the red, white and blue,—
Our star-spangled red, white and blue;
We will sweep from the folds of Old Glory
The clouds which now hang o'er its blue.

We're the Home Guard that never surrenders,
The Legions of honor and truth;
We're Columbia's Loyal Defenders
Who have pledged her our unspotted youth.
For God, who is marching before us,
For Home, whose protectors we are,
For the glorious Country that bore us,
We've enlisted for life in this war.
We'll unfurl the red, white and blue,—
Our star-spangled red, white and blue—
And we'll sweep from the folds of Old Glory
The clouds which now hang o'er its blue.

Exercise by Older Girls.

(Each of these twenty-five girls should wear across her breast a band bearing the name of the state whose president she represents.)

L. T. L. SUPT.: I shall now present to the audience, in turn, the W. C. T. U. presidents of several states, who will give us their reasons for believing that each local union in the land should organize and maintain a Loyal Temperance Legion. I have the honor of presenting first the president of Michigan.

MICHIGAN: "The L. T. L. work is not second in importance to any in our organization. The pertinent question is: How can the number of Legions be largely increased, and manned by enthusiastic, competent teachers?"

(The other presidents are then presented in the following order, and respond with the quotations given below:)

NORTH DAKOTA: "There is only one training school for the boys and girls, which turns out trained, equipped, enthusiastic temperance workers, who will fight the liquor traffic to the death, and that is the L. T. L. In this society we have the key of the future."

NEW YORK: "If Legion work was done by every local W. C. T. U. we should have fewer unions languishing, and fewer people asking the question, 'What is the W. C. T. U. doing, anyway?' "

TEXAS: "Our L. T. L. organizations and the truths taught in the matchless manuals must reach the minds and hearts of the children or our cause dies with us. May a wave of revival sweep over our country, pushing our L. T. L. work!"

SOUTH CAROLINA: "The children are so enthusiastic that in some places they actually keep the temperance work alive because they will not allow you to forget or neglect their meetings. I pray that God may give to us older ones the loyalty, the earnestness and enthusiasm of the L. T. L."

WEST VIRGINIA: "Perhaps no department demands as much sacrifice as does the L. T. L., therefore in no department is it more difficult to find capable leaders, but it pays to persist. Thru the children we can often pre-empt the home for total abstinence."

VIRGINIA: "Many of our young men and women who are the most interested workers in our state today in the temperance cause, are those who have had the L. T. L. training. The drink problem will be solved when the W. C. T. U. can envelop the children of the nation with the L. T. L."

MISSISSIPPI: "If every department of W. C. T. U. work except the L. T. L., were discontinued and the whole energy of the organization were devoted to the education of the boys and girls, we should win in the end just what we are seeking—total abstinence for the individual and prohibition of the liquor traffic. The L. T. L. is the most interesting, and most satisfying, and it ought to be the most successful branch of our work."

OREGON: "No union accomplishes the most it can unless it has a Legion. May the day speedily come when not one union can be found that has not a wide-awake L. T. L."

FLORIDA: "I am on my way to Miami—almost at the tropical end of America—to see one hundred boys and girls who are pledged total abstainers and enthusiastic Loyal Temperance Legioners. They are the hope of the century, the youths who are reverently making the most of themselves, the vanguard of the great army of the free."

NEW JERSEY: "When a W. C. T. U. is organized in New Jersey, the state president says, after officers are elected: 'We must have a superintendent and a Loyal Temperance Legion, because that organization outranks all other work.' The county presidents and state superintendents agree to this. How I wish we might have a tidal wave of pledge-signing and L. T. L. organizing all over the country."

L. T. L. OF SANTIAGO DE CUBA. ELMA GRACE GOWEN, Supt.

WISCONSIN: "Wisconsin is reaping her reward from the seven hundred Senior L. T. L.'s in her state who are everywhere leading the Juniors. Wisconsin would say, 'Multiply the L. T. L.'s and encourage them all to study for a Senior diploma.'"

INDIAN TERRITORY: "I wonder how I, as a true white-ribboner, did not realize until the last few years the importance of placing stress upon the L. T. L. work. A number of the children in my own Legion have brought out and influenced their parents, who are now members of the W. C. T. U. The contests of the L. T. L. draw parents and friends, and the Junior organizations create more sentiment and gain for our work a larger percentage of the older people than any other means used, at the same time educating in our principles our future lawmakers and citizens."

VERMONT: "I am sure no work done by the W. C. T. U. counts for more than the L. T. L. with their battle cry, "Saloons must go." These young recruits, pledged and intelligent, are developing total abstainers to do aggressive work for our cause. Their energy and enthusiasm will give zeal to the wearied and worn workers, as they keep step with us in the march that will never end until victory comes. Money invested in work for the children will bring large returns in the tomorrow of our new century."

COLORADO: "The L. T. L. is the future incarnated—all ready to be moved upon by the forces that make for civic righteousness; all ready to be stirred to possibilities of every-day heroism in fighting the very real devils intrenched behind greed and law. And yet we do not seem to realize the magnitude of our opportunity."

WESTERN WASHINGTON: "We should have no childless unions in our organization. It would do some unions good—infuse new life into them—if they had to hustle around and raise the money with which to pay the right woman to lead one or two Loyal Temperance Legions. The present and future influence of a well-taught L. T. L. is immeasurable."

MARYLAND: "In the army of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union no division fills a more important place than the Loyal Temperence Legion. Its course of study, its drill and its enthusiasm should develop most capable recruits. The possibilities of its influence in the home, the social circle, and even in political life, cannot be measured. In our state we hail with grateful hearts the growing interest in this branch of our work."

GEORGIA: "It was the L. T. L. that brought me into the W. C. T. U. I realized the possibilities of every child, and began the work, the fear of God in my soul, and His promise in my heart. It is twenty odd years ago that I took up the L. T. L. work, and there are no words to express what I feel in regard to its importance."

DELAWARE: "To me the L. T. L. seems to be one of the most important departments we have. A thoro and systematic training of these children means purer homes and government and more W. C. T. U.'s in the future. We believe that thousands of fathers and mothers have been converted by the lessons learned in the L. T. L."

RHODE ISLAND: "The children must early be taught the value of total abstinence to themselves and their never-ending influence in that direction. They must be taught the principles and methods of the W. C. T. U., the history of the organization, the work of past and present leaders, and that to be a part of this great organized body is not only an honor but is helpful to the world at large. From the junior organizations must come the future leaders and workers of the W. C. T. U."

NEW HAMPSHIRE: '"When you save a man or woman, you save a unit, but when you save a boy or girl you save a whole multiplication table.'—John Wanamaker. We should remember this fact when disposed to think lightly of the importance of the L. T. L. Branch, which is the training school for those who are to carry on the temperance reform, and is as essential to the W. C. T. U. as the Sunday school is to the church."

IOWA: "No previous age has demanded trained workers along all lines as has the present. There can be no more efficient school for the training of the temperance worker of the future than our Loyal Temperance Legion, and from its ranks will surely come the men and women who, with earnest purpose, strong convictions and fearless courage will finally overthrow the liquor traffic."

WYOMING: "It is most important that every union in our land should mother an L. T. L. and count it a blessed privilege to do so."

MISSOURI: "A union without an L. T. L. society lacks the inspiration and cheer that children's voices, songs and enthusiasm give to both the home and the W. C. T. U. Our largest appropriations in Missouri have always been made for these departments."

MINNESOTA: "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union that neglects to make a strong and continuous impress upon the children of its community, thru the Loyal Temperance Legion, is laying a sure foundation for a continuous need of temperance work, with no plans to supply the workers."

INDIANA: "I have observed that the ebb and flow in enthusiasm in our work in the local union depends very much upon the interest taken in the children. No union can be at its best without an L. T. L."

All standing join in National, state and local rallying cries, led by the captain. Full members join in repeating pledges.

Closing Song: No. 60, in Marching Songs No. I.

Program Suggestions.

Many will choose to make this celebration an open-air meeting. Use our National emblem, the field daisy, freely for decorations. The L. T. L. president should be in the chair.

The responsive exercise for devotional service may be ordered from Miss Alice M. Guernsey, 17 Webster Place, East Orange, N. J. Ask for Legion Leaflet, No. 19; price per package of six, five cents, 25 cents per 100.

As July 21 is L. T. L. membership day, each Legion should make a canvas among friends and schoolmates in advance, that each may have new members to report at the celebration.

The list of articles for filling comfort bags, as given by the National superintendent, is: Two sizes buttons, No. 5 needles, pins, safety pins, white, black and patent thread (all of these can be gotten in little rolls now), darning cotton and needles, small blunt scissors, small roll of bandage, court plaster, a small piece of absorbent cotton, testament. This list should be sent far and wide in the notices of entertainment, and each one asked to contribute something. Forward the articles received to Mrs. Ella M. Thacher, Florence, N. J.

The various parts of the Labor Operetta may be recited if necessary, but will be much more effective if sung. Any tune, or tunes, of proper metre, may be used, the brighter the better.

Have on sale, as a souvenir of the occasion, the new biography of Miss Gordon, compiled by Mrs. Mary D. Tomlinson. The price is ten cents. Order this of the W. T. P. A., 184 La Salle St., Chicago.

The beautiful picture of Miss Gordon which is reproduced on the cover page of this number may also be purchased, in cabinet size, of the W. T. P. A., 184 La Salle St., Chicago, for twenty-five cents.

It is very important that all L. T. L. workers should be constant and careful readers of THE UNION SIGNAL. As nothing can be more important than the training of the children it is needful that each one who leads them should be thoroly posted—an "all around" woman. In no other place is all needful information brought together except in THE UNION SIGNAL. Have you noticed our offer of the paper until Nov. 26 for fifty cents?

Watch for our Roll of Honor next week. Will your union be there?

Membership Figures.

The list of memberships sent in for competition in the honor awarded the largest single L. T. L. in the country, show encouraging growth in various sections.

Bellefontaine, Ohio, leads with a membership of 480, but we understand that this represents a federation of Legions in the public schools. Honorable mention therefore goes to the L. T. L. in the Frances E. Willard Settlement at Boston, Mass., which has an enrolled membership of 438, with 423 of these pledged; 300 have paid state and National dues. South Haven, Mich., has 200 enrolled; Elk Garden, West Virginia, has a membership of 181, all pledged. Pineville, Ky., is close behind with 180, all pledged; Eau Claire, Wis., has 152 enrolled, thirty pledged; Dover, N. H., and Newberry, S. C., report 138 members each; Darlington, Wis., 131, all pledged.

How can Leaders for the Loyal Temperance Legion be Secured?

I cannot believe that there is on the face of the earth any community in which total abstinence sentiment has crystallized into organization where it is IMPOSSIBLE to find a leader for a Loyal Temperance Legion.

Where there is a determination to give boys and girls the teaching and training for a pure life and for intelligent work against the legalized liquor traffic, a training which is their right and our sacred duty, a leader can certainly be found if prayerful, persistent effort is not too soon abandoned.

Canvass your community thoroly and systematically; talk with every day school teacher, Sunday school teacher; every mother and mother-hearted woman, every child lover in the town; circulate Miss Willard's "Appeal to Mothers;" let children give a public entertainment like Mrs. Field's "Model Meeting of the L. T. L.," and teach one of the most wide-awake boys a brief appeal to recite at the close, setting forth the desire of the children for a Loyal Temperance Legion. If the one best fitted for a leader cannot afford to give the time each week, pay for her services and meet the expense through subscription and by medal contests and through public entertainments by the L. T. L., where a small admission fee is charged.

"No experience" is the most frequent excuse given by those whom we urge to take charge of a Loyal Temperance Legion and who seem to forget that every successful teacher and preacher can point to a day when this was true of them. Anyone who really loves boys and girls and has a heart to help forewarn and forearm them against the increasing pitfalls in their pathway will soon find in this L. T. L. work one of the most blessed experiences of life. The cruel, heartless, abominable liquor business means to win the children for the perpetuity of its trade in ways against which the temperance physiology of the public school cannot alone adequately fortify them and children must be trained head, heart, hands and feet against liquor selling, as well as drinking, by the manifold methods possible in our L. T. L.

ANNA A. GORDON,
World's L. T. L. Secretary.

The local W. C. T. U. should strive to secure from its membership women who have the love of children and fondness for teaching and organizing combined.

All mothers love children and are interested in their welfare, but all women are not apt to teach, and, moreover, some good teachers can instruct, but have not the faculty of organizing. The successful superintendent must be, above all, one who can plan. The women of the W. C. T. U. should feel bound to hold up the hands of the superintendents by aiding in the meetings of the Legion as well as by sending their own children, thus showing their faith by their works, and encouraging the children by accompanying them to their Loyal Temperance Legion.

MRS. MARIE JUSTICE,
Supt. of L. T. L. and teacher in the public school at Paragould, Ark.

By turning over the work of the Legion to the Y's. Many older women hesitate to take up the work with the L. T. L. Some of them thru distaste for the work, some thru fear that they cannot do it rightly; some thru laziness, thinking the work much more arduous than it really is, and failing entirely to grasp the blessedness of it. Many women are not interested in the work of the L. T. L. because they do not realize the importance of early training, of formative rather than re-formative work. The Y's are especially fitted for the L. T. L. work. They have been trained. They are enthusiastic, optimistic, and easily bring their cheery, forceful thought and methods into the work. They are preeminently fitted to be the leaders of the L. T. L. and should consider it their first and most important work.

ALLA B. FOSTER,
L. T. L. Sec. for Colorado.

In my own experience I have found that constant appeals to unions, the frequent sending of simple, yet instructive literature, and, whenever possible, a personal appeal, by a visit to the county convention or to the unions, brings to them, as nothing else, the great need of this work, and the possibilities in each union for conducting a Legion.

It is lack of a readiness to sacrifice other things, not so important, in order to put real honest work into Legions, that is keeping New Hampshire back in number of Legions.

SARA D. LIBBEY,
L. T. L. Sec. for New Hampshire.

When every local W. C. T. U. realizes to the full the vast importance of training the children not only to take their places in the W. C. T. U. but to save the nation for God and home, there will be no lack of leaders for the L. T. L.

It is therefore the duty of every state, county and local W. C. T. U. president, and secretary of L. T L., to keep the local union so stirred up and enthused by personal appeals, literature, etc., that it will be impossible for a W. C. T. U. member to have a quiet conscience until her union maintains a live L. T. L.

MYRTLE G. R. AMES,
L. T. L. Sec. for Maine.

Take up the L. T. L. study in the unions so thoroly that the women see the necessity for a Legion; pray about it and talk about it till it is laid upon their hearts. Have a rousing meeting for boys and girls, to which parents and friends are invited, to see if some capable woman, not yet a member of the union, may have the burden laid upon her heart when she sees the eagerness of the children and an appeal for workers is made. Relieve one of your workers in the union of other duties that she may be consecrated to this work. Train up your workers.

LOUISE E. HOLLISTER,
National L. T. L. Associate and L. T. L. Sec. for Minnesota.

First, where there is a local union, appoint a committee of four of the best women for three months to lead the Legion alternately. By the end of the three months the children will be apt to select the one best fitted to take the Legion permanently. Children are quick to perceive who is most interested in them, and bound to show their attachment for their leader. Some of the best leaders we have in Virginia are public school teachers. Wherever our scientific temperance instruction law is enforced the teachers readily take hold of the Legion work.

SUE C. JAMES,
L. T. L. Sec. for Virginia.

We must grow leaders in the Senior Legion. There they have had a preparatory training, and should be more efficient than those who have to acquire the knowledge thru other sources. In most Senior Legions there are young women who are preparing to become school teachers, and the Junior Legion gives them a splendid chance to test their ability. The Seniors should be trained with this object in view, that they are to become leaders for the Juniors.

To secure a general secretary for the Seniors the W. C. T. U. should endeavor to find a young married woman of discretion, one who is tactful and has the confidence of the young people, to do this one thing, and not load her down with a half dozen other offices and departments. If she is not in the union she should be found and won for the cause, for this special purpose.

MARY B. WOOD,
L. T. L. Sec. for New York.

If I knew how to secure leaders Connecticut's main problem would be solved. However, I am entirely convinced that where genuine interest in L. T. L. work exists in a union the leader is procured in one form or another. So my answer would be, arouse interest in the local union. When you secure a sure method for doing that, please give it to me.

GRACE C. PLATT,
L. T. L. Sec. for Connecticut.

In my judgment the dearth of L. T. L. leaders is due to a lack of interest in this work on the part of our busy W. C. T. U. women; they think they are interested, but they are not enough so to give up any church, social or home cares for this task. I know it means sacrifice, but, oh, the blessing they miss! "Where there is a will there is a way."

IDA M. MIX,
L. T. L. Sec. for Indiana.

The Senior graduates will, I think, solve the problem, if trained to expect to work for temperance. The trained graduates of our state Legion are becoming the leaders of the L. T. L., both Senior and Junior. They first are helpers, then leaders, then members of the W. C. T. U., thus fulfilling their destiny.

I. W. BLACK,
L. T. L. Sec. for Wisconsin.

Train them in the L. T. L. and thus fit them for leaders. Girls that have been in my Legion for the past few years are the ones to whom I look for help. My present assistant was in my Legion when I started it, nearly twelve years ago, and a more efficient helper I could not desire.

JENNIE L. MANLEY,
L. T. L. Sec. for Tennessee.

I think the normal grade of the L. T. L. when adopted by the unions, is helpful in arousing an interest in L. T. L. work, and securing leaders. If Christian young people could in some way be led to take a deep interest in temperance work leaders could much more easily be secured.

MARY E. OLNEY,
L. T. L. Sec. for Rhode Island.

Train them in the L. T. L. through the regular course of study, and thoroly instill into their minds and hearts the importance of Legion work, and its relation to the future of the W. C. T. U. and to all temperance reform.

ANNA M. BROWN,
L. T. L. Sec. for Delaware.

In my own local Legion I have had no trouble in securing leaders, but soon something is likely to happen to prevent their serving; then I go myself, until I find some one else, and in this way the Legion never fails to meet.

M. L. YANTIS,
L. T. L. Sec. for Arkansas.

First, a systematic study of our L. T. L. manuals in the unions, ten minutes for the lesson, five for review, to see how much has "struck in." Second, distribution of L. T. L. literature to wake people up.

JESSIE W. MORTON,
L. T. L. Sec. for Kansas.

No union has a right to say it cannot get a leader for the Legion until every member of the union, with the faithful, prayerful help of every other member, has tried to lead it and utterly failed.

ALICE M. GUERNSEY,
L. T. L. Sec. for New Jersey.

I wish I knew how. I can see no other way than to educate and stir up an interest in the hearts of young women who love children.

ALICE M. BOWMAN,
L. T. L. Sec. for California.

A request to pastors of the various churches for names of the best Sabbath school teachers with well-known temperance principles.

S. M. REDUS,

It seems to me that the best leaders can be secured from the Senior Legions.

FRANCES E. UFFORD,

Presidents' Symposium.

Each state president was asked the following question:

"In what way and by what methods has your state lent aid and co-operation this year to the L. T. L. branch?"

NEW YORK.

New York state appropriated $150 for the L. T. L. Branch this year, and in addition to this we pay the expenses of the state secretary to the state W. C. T. U. convention. In the program recommended for the institutes the topic, "Is the L. T. L. essential to the prosecution of the temperance work?" occupied a place, and formed a feature of nearly every institute. In addition to this many counties planned for a children's mass meeting. Miss Margaret Sloat, who was appointed L. T. L. organizer at our last W. C. T. U. convention, presented the L. T. L. work at nine institutes, and did it in a very effective way. One page of our state paper, "Woman's Temperance Work," is each month edited by the L. T. L. secretary, Mrs. Mary B. Wood, and is brimful of suggestions and news items. All the officers of the state W. C. T. U. will be present at the L. T. L. convention which will be held in Hornellsville, July 6, 7, 8, and will do what they can to help the work.

ELLA A. BOOLE, President.

MICHIGAN.

There has been but little "method," but co-operation in every possible way. Our field workers and others have organized whenever and wherever opportunity presented, or "a way could be made." The L. T. L. was placed on program of state convention for a public meeting in which the graduating class received their diplomas from convention platform. In district and county conventions where classes have been graduated the state president has presented the diplomas with the most encouraging and commendatory words at her command, and received all the flowers bestowed upon her by the L. T. L.'s with evident delight. Two of our districts have district branches and hold their own conventions. We now have a special L. T. L. organizer in the field for three months with state treasury back of all expenses and salary. All this we count as "aid."

A. S. BENJAMIN, President.

MISSOURI.

More and more are our Missouri workers feeling the importance of having an L. T. L. connected with each W. C. T. U. in our state. Twenty-two districts sent in L. T. L. reports last year and we hope to have reports from every district next year. We consider the children's work of great importance. Missouri took the prize banner in School Savings Banks at our last National Convention, and for many years in Sunday school temperance work and medal contests. Our organizers are making special efforts to have many more L. T. L.'s organized. The L. T. L.'s are holding many medal contests, and have signed many anti-cigaret pledges. We are working hard to gain the children thru scientific temperance instruction in the schools and temperance pledges in the Sunday schools.

BELLE C. KIMBALL, President.

NEW JERSEY.

The state of New Jersey appropriated $85 for the use of the L. T. L. secretary. The state gives never less than one hour to the L. T. L. at state convention, and this Branch will be on the Ocean Grove program July 23. The state urged that the interests of the L. T. L. be considered at each of the county schools of methods this spring, and it was done; wherever possible the Legion has attended and taken part. In the State Report a star has been prefixed to the name of each union that has an L. T. L. or one for each when there are several under the care of one union. When a union is organized the Legion and a superintendent follow the election of officers. In fact the L. T. L. is never forgotten, as we hope for our trained workers of the future.

EMMA BOURNE, President.

PENNSYLVANIA.

"No compromise for the Keystone state" still rings out loud and clear and long from the fourteen thousand Loyal Legioners. Our women are more and more realizing that only as our unions encourage and maintain Legioners, can we hope for perseverance in our W. C. T. U. work. The all too familiar excuse of "having no leader" for the L. T. L. is being overcome to some degree, for many of our Legioners are old enough and have been trained in their own schools sufficient to make them skilled teachers and superintendents. There is no cause for discouragement in Pennsylvania. The state secretary and the state L. T. L. officers, superintendents, as well as the rank and file, are faithfully endeavoring to "Lift others as they climb."

REBECCA B. CHAMBERS, President.

MINNESOTA.

Minnesota state W. C. T. U. engaged our National general secretary, Mrs. Helen G. Rice, for the month of February, to work in the interest of the L. T. L. Large Legions have been organized in several towns and our unions are more interested in that department because of Mrs. Rice's visit. In response to a Macedonian cry Mrs. Abbie Church was recently sent to New Auburn, Minn., by the state central committee. She organized a Legion of twenty-seven members. Miss Annie Robbins has been engaged for a year's work in Minnesota, with special reference to Y and L. T. L. work. We realize that without these two forces, the children and young people, our labor for the temperance cause will be in vain.

BESSIE LAYTHE SCOVELL, President.

WEST WASHINGTON.

The state officers have talked L. T. L. and urged organization of the children wherever we have been. We have endeavored to win women for the L. T. L. work for we find that the great need is for leaders. The children respond readily, the trouble is to get a superintendent. Our L. T. L.'s are this year being trained to pay dues. Have adopted a state motto and "yell." Are pushing subscriptions for The Crusader Monthly. We realize fully the need of L. T. L. work and are anxious to do it, but oh for local superintendents to care for the Legions when organized.

MARGARET B. PLATT, President.

NORTH DAKOTA.

The state union has aided the L. T. L. Branch by instructing National workers to organize L. T. L.'s, by giving space in each issue of the state paper, "White Ribbon Bulletin," to the L. T. L. Branch; by requesting that the subject of L. T. L. work shall be presented at all institutes and conventions, and by placing the L. T. L. on the pledge cards as one of the objects for which the unions are expected to give.

ELIZABETH PRESTON ANDERSON, President.

FLORIDA.

The Loyal Temperance Legions of Florida have increased in number and in membership more than one hundred per cent during the past year, and we hope to keep up this ratio during the present year. Would that every union shared the feeling of the Hebrew wife under the old dispensation, for who knew but she might be the mother of the Messiah? So which of us can tell from whence is deliverance to come? Surely from the boys and girls now being trained in the ranks of the Loyal Temperance Legion. May it soon be said of every union, "Blessed art thou among women!"

ALICE C. BROWN, President.

MISSISSIPPI.

Mississippi has kept as L. T. L. secretary one of our brightest young women, Miss Charlie Garner, of Columbus, who has a marvelously fine Legion of more than 100 members in her own town. It is urged with every new union that the Legions be a main work, and everywhere possible they are organized. The chief obstacle encountered is to find leaders. The children are willing but the "grown ups" are difficult.

HARRIET B. KELLS, President.

TEXAS.

We have taken a decided step forward in the work for the Loyal Temperance Legion in the Lone Star state. We elected Miss Hattie Henderson to the office of secretary, and passed a resolution that a fund greatly exceeding five cents for every paid-up member of the Legion in the state should be placed at her disposal. Miss Henderson's years of work, particularly with children, gives her exceptional qualifications for the position.

HELEN M. STODDARD, President.

IOWA.

Our state superintendent of the L. T. L. cannot leave her home to organize and build up the Legions, but we have had Mr. J. W. Pierce of New Jersey for some months, and he has organized ten or more, with a goodly membership. The state union sends them badges and some supplies, and endeavors to keep them living, working and growing. We hope to have the Y's make the care of the Legions a principal part of their work.

MARION H. DUNHAM, President.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Our state union has always made an appropriation for L. T. L. work, and has notified the secretary of openings for same. Mrs. Cartland, our vice-president, has organized many Legions thruout the state, and during last month addressed the children of the Oxford Orphanage, enlisting the superintendent, who is to make the L. T. L. a feature of their work.

C. E. CRAVEN, President.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

One of the happiest duties of the W. C. T. U. is to form the children into Loyal Temperance Legions. In the District of Columbia there is a little group of earnest workers who gather the children, conduct the meetings, pledge and teach them, thus committing them to our principles and arming them against their deadliest foe—intemperance.

MRS. CLINTON SMITH, President.

RHODE ISLAND.

The state union has tried to advance the work in the L. T. L. branch by adult diploma classes. Eight diplomas have been awarded. Another class is now taking the course. The state officers have attended meetings of the L. T. L. in different sections of the state and addressed the members. All unions have been urged to organize and care for an L. T. L. An L. T. L. column is kept in the state paper. Letters and the state annual reports have been sent to the Legions. A state rallying cry and motto has been selected.

MARY A. BABCOCK, President.

CONNECTICUT.

Connecticut is doing excellent work along L. T. L. lines. The state union has secured an admirable secretary of this branch, Mrs. Grace C. Platt, of Bridgeport, who is building up some strong Legions, and with the appropriation from the state does most efficient work. The state union heartily co-operates with her in every way possible.

CORNELIA B. FORBES, President.

ARKANSAS.

I consider this branch the greatest work that our organization has at the present time or can have in the future, for the future of this great nation lies in the integrity and virtue of the child of today. We are looking forward to the time when every local union will have an L. T. L.

Red Letter Day.

July 21, Loyal Temperance Legion Day.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF MISS ANNA GORDON.

L. T. L. PRIZES.

THE effort has been to so frame the conditions that the larger and smaller states may have equal opportunity to secure these prizes.

1. The National prize flag will be given to the state paying the largest percentage of National dues (5 cents per member) in proportion to pledged membership, provided not less than twenty dollars is paid. Great care must be taken that all such dues are properly marked as L. T. L. dues, and that they reach the National treasurer (through regular channels) in ample time to be reckoned for the current year.

2. Mrs. Tomlinson's banner will go to the state which shows the largest number of Social Meetings and observances of Red Letter Days in proportion to whole number of Legions, provided that not less than twenty-five such meetings have been held. Picnics may be counted if they include programs of temperance exercises. Reports must reach Mrs. Tomlinson through the state superintendent of Social Meetings and Red Letter Days.

3. Mrs. Thacher's banner will be won by the local legion which makes and fills according to printed directions the largest number of comfort bags. Local legions should report to their state L. T. L. secretaries, who will each report to Mrs. Thacher the Legion of her state that has made and filled the largest number of bags.

4. A banner will be awarded the state reporting the largest proportionate number of Seniors who join the W. C. T. U. during the year, all competing states to have at least one hundred Seniors.

5. Mrs. H. T. Guild, National superintendent of department of Fairs and Open-Air Meetings, makes the following offer: A cash prize of five dollars will be given to the state reporting the largest number of Senior L. T. L. members engaged during the year in work at Fairs and Open Air Meetings. Report the kind of work, as the distribution of literature, securing new members, conducting gospel meetings or a song service. Report if gambling devices were suppressed, or if illegal sale of intoxicants was stopped, or the distribution of impure literature.

The Record of the Year.

Brief Reports of L. T. L. Secretaries in this and Other Countries.

[We regret that all L. T. L. reports to the World's Convention were not received in time for insertion in this number.—EDS.]

Mexico.

The L. T. L. work for Mexico is just in its infancy, but if our army of L. T. L. young people and our mothers of the W. C. T. U. could see how bright, capable and interested our members are, they would be most hopeful of the future of the work. We have had twenty-one L. T. L.'s; of these twelve are now doing good work. Several are now waiting to be organized, and as soon as we have more lessons and literature in Spanish, many can be organized. Many of these children have always used pulque-wine or beer at meals, but are now total abstainers, and have signed the pledge. It seems very important here not to offer the pledge too soon.

The oldest society is in Mary Keene's Institute, Mexico City, where meetings have been held each month for at least five years, reaching many children from the wealthier families. Guanajuato has one of the most faithful Legions, and deserves mention because six of the larger girls graduated last October in the L. T. L. course of study, and were the first in all Mexico to receive the L. T. L. diplomas. Since last October we have had a fine L. T. L. in public school No. 97 in the City of Mexico, and other schools are interested and wish to be organized. Recently an L. T. L. of great promise was organized in the Mexico City grammar school—an independent school for American children. Nearly all the others are in connection with mission schools.

In the active L. T. L.'s there are 717 members; in those not at work at present there are at least four or five hundred more. According to reports received which are not complete, 355 regular meetings have been held by the L. T. L.'s, besides public meetings, medal contests, etc. Six of the Legions are carried on in English; all the others are in Spanish. Many members of the English-speaking L. T. L.'s are Mexican children. Of the L. T. L.'s at work at present only one is English and only one all Americans.

The Band of Mercy is always a department of the L. T. L. work, and we now have in Spanish several good leaflets and "Black Beauty" and "Friends and Helpers of Man." We have songs in Spanish, and a very capable professor is arranging the lessons in Spanish in attractive form. Mrs. M. E. Grisham of Mexico City, superintendent of a model L. T. L. is now National secretary of L. T. L., and will do good work.

The children of ten repeat and seem to enter into the spirit of the motto of one of the societies:

"Guerra al vicio, amor, y constancia en el trabajo."

(War to vice, love and constancy in the work); and all enjoy giving the salute: "My head, my heart, and this right hand, for God and home and native land." (In Spanish, "La cabeza, el corazon, y esta mano derecho para Dios, para la familia y para la Patria." This has been repeated by all the children in all the schools where I have spoken, often thus reaching 300 to 600 in a day.

Norway.

On May 30, 1902, we had in Norway sixteen Loyal Temperance Legions, with 825 members. Since that report two L. T. L.'s have been started, and two have given up, one for want of sufficient sympathy and the other from want of a leader. We have tried to get these two started again, but up to the present without success; we have endeavored also to start L. T. L.'s in several smaller towns, and the two new ones are the result.

One of our really good L. T. L.'s has a library of 200 volumes of interesting and instructive literature, for the loan of which the children pay a very small sum; they are always eager to get new books. The leaders of this same branch arranged several good addresses on the influence of alcohol on the human frame.

In the winter of 1900 we sent the following subject to all our branches for the children to compete for prizes: "What can we little teetotalers do to help on the total abstinence cause?" We received 102 papers, and seventeen were so good that they were rewarded. It was interesting to see how much faith and earnestness came to light in these papers, and much weight was very generally laid on the force of a good example.

In the winter of 1901 we sent rewards to one or two members in each branch for constant attendance and good conduct during meetings; there were sixteen such unexpected rewards given, to the great delight of the winners. Since this we have distributed reward-cards in a very limited number to the most industrious and most active members. Some of our little folks have lately begun to collect money for flower mission work.

ANNA THORWALDSEN,
Secretary.

Australasia.

WE have in Australia eighty-six juvenile societies under the care of the W. C. T. U., seventy-one being worked as Loyal Temperance Legions, with an estimated attendance of three thousand one hundred and ninety-three. One state only has a Senior Legion with thirty members on the graduate plan. The benevolences helped vary in each state. Amongst them are the London Temperance Hospital, the Frances Willard Temperance Hospital, Chicago, Dr. Barnardo's Homes, English Foreign Missions, Drought and Distressed Farmers' Funds, and other local charities.

The chief means used to increase the number of societies, in addition to correspondence by the state superintendents, has been by presenting the claims of the work to Sunday-schools, Christian Endeavor societies, etc., by district and local workers. As a result of an address given at a Sunday-school by a member, a very flourishing L. T. L. was started at Charters Towers, Queensland.

Conferences of juvenile workers and societies have been held in West Australia only. The Legioners join the Y's and the unions in such places as have societies wide enough awake to welcome them and to encourage them to do so. The chief lines of work are: Sales of work in aid of benevolences; medal contests; cultivation of gardens for flower mission purposes, and for paying rents; exhibitions; scientific temperance competition; securing subscriptions to temperance newspapers; providing programs for public meetings, etc. "Marching Songs" are used in most of the Legions.

The returns do not convey a full idea of the work accomplished, especially in the states of South Australia and Tasmania. In Tasmania twenty-two Legions have been at work for most of the three years. Owing to the general depression and the removal of workers several have been disbanded, but the influence of the meetings held will long continue to be felt. In South Australia two changes have occurred in the superintendency, and in each case ill-health and pressure of other duties have prevented the plans made for extending the work from being carried out. I am glad that New South Wales has been successful in carrying on the department by securing an evidently alert and wide-a-wake sister as superintendent. West Australia has made a big advance, and the enthusiastic superintendent is looking forward to great things for the future. Every state more or less urges the need of some one to visit the Legions in order to arouse and maintain interest and to give information respecting methods of work. Such a person would also be able to organize new Legions.

It is still urged that where Bands of Hope exist there is no room for Loyal Temperance Legions. In my opinion we might as well argue that there was no need for day-schools because there are Sunday-schools. The children of to-day will be the voters of the next generation, and whether they will have to build inebriate retreats and enlarge their jails, or by their intelligent vote sweep the drink traffic from the land, will largely depend on the work we do in educating them in their duties as citizens. I should like to see still more emphasis given to the distinctive features of the constitution, especially to the rules of enlisting and the full pledge. The graduating of Legioners into the Y's might receive more attention with advantage to both societies. Miss Mary Lodge, who takes a very deep interest in the children's work, compiled a manual adapted to the needs of Australia, which was first published in "Our Federation" and afterwards printed in book form.

Communications have passed between myself and the state superintendents on Senior L. T. L.'s and the popularizing of the children's page in "Our Federation." It has long been my desire to have a banner for the Australian L. T. L., and thanks to the kindness of Miss Rhoda Holder, we have one now.

(MISS) MARY J. GEORGE,
Superintendent.

Burma.

Much of the L. T. L. work in Burma is carried on in connection with mission schools. Temperance work for children is a feature of W. C. T. U. work among the Burmese, the Karens, the natives of India and the English-speaking people of Burma. Three hundred children are now taught by white ribboners in Burma. Among the Karens and the Burmese they work against smoking, which is as common among the girls as among the boys.

Superintendent.

If it Had Been a Bear.

Sometimes it is good to be in a position where you can turn around to your shelves and take down food that is a rebuilder and life saver. A prominent grocer of Murrysville, Pa., had heard so many of his customers praising the food Grape-Nuts that he finally gave it a trial himself. He says: "For several years up to 16 months ago I was hardly fit for business from indigestion which also affected my head. My brain was dull and I could hardly keep my books.

"One day I heard one of my customers praising the food Grape-Nuts so highly that I wondered if it would fit my case, so I took a package from the shelf and said that I would use it and even if it failed I would not be much the loser.

"But before I had finished that one package such a change came over me that I thought it wonderful and by the time three packages had been eaten I had changed so you would not believe it if I told you about it. My head grew clear and my mind strong and my memory was very much improved and I was well in every respect. I can only give you a faint idea of all the good the food has done me. It is all I eat for supper nowadays and the rest of my family think as much of it as I do. Truly it is a great food and if it were not a great food it would not have done me so much good and have such a tremendous sale in my store." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Cape Colony, South Africa.

DURING the past year I have entered into correspondence with each individual society of the W. C. T. U. in the Cape Colony. I received most encouraging replies from most of them before I left for a short holiday in England. During my absence the work is being carried on by our beloved Colonial President, now resident in Port Elizabeth. Promises have been made of special effort during the year 1903, and I am looking forward to being able to present a full report at the coming convention.

Just before leaving for England a photo of a European Band of Hope in Bizana (Transkei) under the superintendance of Mrs. Sprigg was sent to me. To these children I have written short letters from time to time, and they have been answered by Mrs. Sprigg and signed by the children. They are nineteen in number, and, I am told, show great interest in the meetings.

I am trying to do more of this correspondence, for it seems to enable these many children to feel that they too are connected with the head society, and are doing their part in the great work which is so sadly needed all over the world, and in no place more than in our own loved Colony.

SUPERINTENDENT.

United States.

THE Loyal Temperance Legion is a very prominent feature of the W. C. T. U. work in the United States. The earnest setting forth by L. T. L. leaders of the claims of the boys and girls upon the mother-hearts of the white-ribbon women has borne fruit during the past two years. The increased interest and activity is especially evident in our newer states, where sparse population, immense distances, and vast mountain ranges present obstacles which only consecrated persistency could overcome.

L. T. L. work among Indian boys and girls is a marked feature of progress; also the introduction of Legions into public schools and into junior church societies. Neighborhood, or parlor, Legions find much favor in some communities, especially for classes of Seniors preparing for graduation. In some instances our unions have been wise enough, and persuasive enough, to enlist, as L. T. L. leaders, good W. C. T. U. brothers-in-law from ministerial or educational ranks, whose services are proving most valuable. More and more our unions are coming to realize that this vital branch of our work must not be neglected, even though to carry it on implies the necessity of paying a fair compensation to devoted, efficient leaders. Many unions, either singly or by counties, are thus employing paid workers.

Most prized of all are our Senior helpers, whose L. T. L. training has made them experts, and who are gladly passing on to the Juniors that which they have received.

Steady progress has been made on graduate and post-graduate work; the total number of diplomas awarded is 6,875, with many thousands of certificates for the various reading courses.

In payment of voluntary state and National dues the growth, though not rapid, has been continuous. The National W. C. T. U., and a majority of the state unions grant representation in their annual conventions in proportion to the amount of L. T. L. dues paid.

Legioners are encouraged to secure the largest possible numbers of honorary (adult) members, who sign the pledge, and pay a small auxiliary fee annually, thus becoming a source of moral and financial help to the Legion.

Prize banners are offered for greatest proportional results in payment of National dues, in largest number of Social Meetings held, largest number of comfort-bags supplied to soldiers and sailors, number of Seniors who join W. or Y. unions, number who render practical help in the department of Fairs and Open Air Meetings.

L. T. L. activities have included a large amount of W. C. T. U. department work, systematically organized and carried on, song services in prisons and hospitals, preparing scrap-books, circulating petitions, distributing great quantities of literature, rendering valuable aid to the W. C. T. U.; holding many medal contests and numberless entertainments.

We have sought to cultivate in our young people the spirit of benevolence, and the Frances E. Willard National Temperance Hospital, the Willard Memorial Fund, and many state and local objects have enlisted their sympathy and contributions.

"The Crusader Monthly," our official L. T. L. organ, has been a most important adjunct to our work; especial efforts are now in progress to increase greatly its regular subscription list.

Notable gains of the past two years are:

The enlargement and improvement of "The Crusader Monthly"; the first special L. T. L. number of THE UNION SIGNAL; the thoro revision of our post-graduate reading-courses, and the preparation of a set of attractive certificates as awards for these courses; the organization, in Michigan, of the seventh state Legion of Graduates.

Grateful acknowledgement is here made of the wise counsel and ever-ready help of the World's L. T. L. Secretary, also of the loyalty of the great host of state, county, and local L. T. L. secretaries, whose energy and enthusiasm have translated National plans into blessed results.

Yell, yell, yell! Everybody yell!
New York state L. T. L.

At the last state L. T. L. convention the first vice-president, Lucie L. Rising, was appointed state organizer. For about three months this spring she devoted her entire time to organizing work and in that time organized fifteen Legions, beside visiting many weak ones and presenting the aims and methods of the L. T. L. in schools, Christian Endeavor societies and churches. Mrs. Rising's work combined with the efforts of county L. T. L. secretaries in presenting the L. T. L. in the W. C. T. U. Institutes has done much toward arousing interest thruout the state.

One of the most novel and successful entertainments given by Juniors in the state was a fair produced by the Nelliston Legion, which lasted one afternoon and two evenings.

There were exhibits in drawing, penmanship, composition, needlework, mechanical work, pastry cooking, pets and dolls, each exhibit being classed according to grade and age.

An entrance fee of one cent was charged for each exhibit. Prizes were given the winning contestants for the best or prettiest, these points being decided by judges. At the lunch counter the sale of sandwiches, coffee, prize cake and confectionery proved to be a profitable undertaking. Temperance songs, recitations, music and the playette, "Sense versus License," by ten boys, afforded the entertainment. Five cents admission was charged, or ten cents for both evenings and afternoon. The proceeds amounted to $19.60. Lois May Patten, age twelve years, received the prize for the best composition on "Alcohol and the Body."

A most enthusiastic Senior Legion has been organized among the young people in the Onondaga Indian Reservation, near Syracuse. Mr. Crouse, the leader, saw an account of Legion work in THE UNION SIGNAL and determined to put his young people under its influences. The results are good and the Legion is the means of educational and moral uplift to its members.

The "Lincoln L. T. L." (colored) of New York City, has a membership of twenty-five. The interest is so great that they hold a meeting of half an hour every evening in the week except Saturday. Mrs. Kimble is their devoted leader.

Here we come, the L. T. L.'s!
Rum must go! Rah, rah, rah!
Pennsyl—Pennsyl—va-ni-a!
Fourteen thousand strong.

Writing just before the harvesting time in reports it is impossible to give any just estimate of our work as compared with other years. Sickness and death have visited so many of the homes of our best workers this year that the work has been greatly retarded, for there are but few to take hold when some one must lay aside, except in the few counties where attention has been given to the Senior work. To push organization on solid basis and the department work and payment of dues has been the great effort. A new banner will go to the county with greatest number of subscribers to "The Crusader Monthly," and Miss Willard's fine portrait to the one reporting most organization and work for the Juniors done by the alumni.

The old Keystone state moves slowly, not by great waves of enthusiasm, but we believe we are building some foundations in the education that the L. T. L. affords and is giving both to the boys and girls and the young men and women. They are learning to carry on the work by doing it.

They are sharing the responsibilities of the W. C. T. U. most loyally and lovingly and their strong young hands and good courage are ever ready to help when help is sought.

The Saturdays of May and June are each year pre-empted by the Legioners for their annual county conventions, which have proved valuable aids in maintaining interest in the L. T. L. To these conventions all Legioners are invited, tho only those who have paid their annual dues are voting delegates and are eligible to the county offices. They come with their banners, flags, song books, basket lunches, bright faces, and merry voices. The entertaining union and Legion provide the place for the meeting and lemonade for refreshment.

Each Legion fills ten or fifteen minutes of the program with exercises of its own selection; the county business, including reports of general officers and committees, and election of new officers, is transacted; outside talent is usually available to brighten the convention with solos, readings, chalk-talks, brief addresses, physical culture drills, and the like. The chorus singing, the shouting of mottos and rallying cries, the pledge and L. T. L. salute are most inspiring.

A long noon recess gives abundant opportunity for enjoyment in God's blessed out-of-doors. At the close of these happy days a merry company disperse to their homes in various parts of the county, each one with purpose strengthened, by contact with so many L. T. L. comrades, to stand by the Legion and its triple pledge.

RALLY CRY:

Rah! Rah! Rah! for the L. T. L.
These letters three the story tell
Of the workers who'll work until they win!
And a temperance state is Wis-con-sin!"

The largest enrolled L. T. L. membership: Eau Claire, 152 (Juniors 122, Seniors 32); pledged, 130. Darlington, 131 (Juniors 38, Seniors 93); pledged, 131. The single special thing Wisconsin has done, and which we hope may become far-reaching, is the growing interest in our state Indian schools. The state L. T. L. has adopted the Keshena Indian L. T. L. There are 161 pupils in this government school, and the Seniors thruout the state will furnish them manuals, leaflets, Crusader Monthly, and pay their state dues, etc. Miss Dyer, superintendent and teacher, has promised to give a paper at the Darlington state L. T. L. convention on the Indian Schools in Wisconsin.

An instance of a Legion "organized and conducted under special conditions:" One hot day in July two years ago the state secretary in answer to an urgent need, organized an L. T. L. at Darlington, where there wasn't even a W. C. T. U. to care for it. The result of this small beginning was a graduating class of sixty-two at the last state convention, forty-eight out of the sixty-two were present and received their diplomas. They brought an invitation for the next year's convention which was accepted. So Darlington entertains the thirteenth state L. T. L. convention for 1903, July 7 and 8. They carried home the Prize Banner last year for the largest graduating class. They have another of thirty to graduate this year, besides over sixty who will win the certificates for the Mercy, Civil Government and Purity reading courses. They have twenty-one adult honorary members. It is expected that a W. C. T. U. will be organized before the convention meets from adult material in the L. T. L. This is an instance where the L. T. L. is the helper and inspirer of the mother union. It seems to me that this Legion is unique enough to be claimed as one special instance.

ISADORE WHITNEY BLACK,

Arizona.

ARIZONA'S first Loyal Temperance Legion was organized early in last January. Before the close of that month Miss Louise Hollister visited our territory and some new Legions and a general interest in Legion work were the fruits of her visit. Phoenix has two L. T. L.'s, one of them at the Government Indian School. This school has also an Anti-Cigaret League. Florence has a regularly organized and flourishing L. T. L. now three months old. Tempe is organizing a systematic work in connection with the public schools, while Mesa City and Kingman are utilizing the Sunday-school in the same way. We all are following the general course of study as indicated by the National committee. The three regularly organized Legions use the quarterlies, the Phoenix L. T. L. having wall-pledge and badges.

This special train will enable Endeavorers and their friends to travel westward in congenial company and upon schedules arranged for their special convenience. South Carolina.

NINETEEN years last April, in the town of Newberry, S. C., was organized a Band of Hope, (as it was then called), among the children, also a W. C. T. U. among the ladies. This work was done by Mrs. Chapin, who was then president of the W. C. T. U. in South Carolina. Mrs. Cynthia Mower was elected president of both organizations, and most nobly and well did she fill the office until her death, which took place seven years later. Very soon after her death, her son, Hon. Geo. S. Mower, proposed that the work should suffer no interruption, and that he would furnish money to carry it on, which he has done royally ever since. Mrs. S. M. Redus, who had been connected with the work from its beginning under Mrs. Mower, was elected president, and has served as such until the present time. For nineteen years the temperance bell has rung on Tuesday, as regularly as the church bells ring on Sunday, and troops of children can be seen every Tuesday afternoon wending their way to the place of meeting. It would be impossible to estimate the number of children who have been influenced thru these meetings. From 125 to 200 children have been enrolled each year during these nineteen years. We have at the present time 138 pledged members.

The Anna Gordon L. T. L. of Newberry has at the present time 138 pledged members, and twenty additional enrolled members, who attend the weekly meetings, but are too young to take the pledge. We have no state rallying cry, and no state motto.

MRS. S. M. REDUS,
State Secretary.

Missouri.

MOTTO: "Keep thyself pure."

RALLY CRY:

Rah, rah, rah!
Rum will tremble and stand in awe
When from hill and beautiful valley
Missouri L. T. L. shall rally.

The best thing Missouri has done is, I think, the passing of the Anti-Cigaret law. The L. T. L., Co. C, Seventeenth District (name of city not given), is the banner legion of the state. It meets every Sunday afternoon in the Euclid Avenue Baptist church. This company last year won both district and state banners, and are now studying the Temperance Lesson Manual, "Alcohol and the Nation." There is also a mercy band department with meetings the third Sunday in the month.—Motto: "In As Much"; also a Flower Mission department; and many are the sweet little experiences of the labors of love thru both these departments. This Legion tries to make the church and the Sunday-School, as well as all other departments, feel that they can not get along without them. While the amounts they contribute are not large, they try to have the L. T. L. name in everything. They have just raised the money to pay for new pulpit chairs; have helped purchase new song books, and aided the ladies with the new carpet. The amount contributed for these purposes was $25.

The superintendent of this wise and wide-awake company, Mrs. Florence B. Stephens, believes that the temperance work would take a grand move all along the line if the organization of L. T. L.'s would make themselves felt and work in and thru the churches.

MRS. JENNIE G. HUSE,
State Secretary.

Delaware.

MOTTO: "In the name of God we will set up our banner."
FLOWER: Clover Blossom.

RALLY CRY:

Delaware, Delaware, here we are;
The L. T. L. of Delaware;
We are small, 'tis true;
But hear us yell—
Hurrah for the Delaware L. T. L.
"Saloons Must Go."

DELAWARE has no L. T. L. conducted under special conditions, but the number of Legions is on the increase. We have now nineteen, six of which were organized this year, most of them thru the influence of Mrs. Ella Thacher who made a tour thru the state in April. One Legion, organized at Lewes, has a membership of 100 (the largest in the state), all pledged, under the leadership of Mrs. N. B. Register with several assistants. Both leader and children are very enthusiastic. Smyrna Legion has a "Fishing Club," and "Leaflet Brigade." They have gained many members and distributed much literature in this way. Other Legions are doing good work in the regular line and inquiries are coming from unions asking for information in regard to the work.

An L. T. L. conference was held in Dover which was interesting and profitable to all present. A beautiful banner was presented by the New Castle county W. C. T. U. to the county L. T. L. at the last convention, which was greatly appreciated.

ANNA M. BROWN,
State Secretary.

Ohio.

STATE MOTTO: "Make your record clean."
SENIOR MOTTO: "Higher, higher."
JUNIOR MOTTO: "We are coming."
GRADUATES MOTTO: "Lifting others as we climb."

RALLY CRY:

Halloo! Halloo! Ohio.
Listen to the yell of the L. T. L.
Rah! Rah! Rah! Saloons. Saloons. Saloons.
Must go! (Clapping hands three times.)

Our special aim the past year has been an L. T. L. in each of the 500 unions in Ohio, as well as an L. T. L. in every city and hamlet. The appointment of an L. T. L. superintendent of equal importance with that of secretary and treasurer in every local union, is the method chosen to promote this result. The general awakening to the importance of this effort thruout Ohio is a cause for rejoicing. Ohio has not an L. T. L. state organization, but in connection with the annual state convention for the past four years, we have had a grand L. T. L. rally. With the increasing number of Seniors and graduates Ohio must have an L. T. L. state organization. This is needed to unite the L. T. L. graduates for more advanced temperance effort.

The Ohio Legioners are active in carrying on the Flower Mission work, in securing signers to the Anti-Cigaret pledge, in waging war on tobacco wherever it is found. I can only report membership as taken from last year's report. Bellefontaine has an L. T. L. of 480 members, nearly if not all pledged members. The largest church L. T. L. is at Hillsboro. Once a month a temperance exercise is given, using L. T. L. literature, and distributing a temperance paper. Hamilton county reporting the largest increase in membership (489 new Legioners) carried home the state L. T. L. banner. There were 2,655 names on the Honor Roll.

MRS. H. B. WISNER,
State Secretary.

Indiana.

SENIOR MOTTO: "We work to win."

Rah! Rah! Rah!
Clover blossoms, we're a-field.
Why? Saloons must die,
Hear their knell,
Indiana L. T. L.

Kokomo Legion, Mrs. Fannie Pedego, leader, has the largest enrolled pledged membership. This is a boys' legion, having three boys to one girl. Their special lines of work are Anti-Gambling, Band of Mercy, Flower Mission and Literature, having wall pockets in railroad stations and jails. Wabash Legion is taking special lessons in Parliamentary drills, and work the Anti-Narcotic department. College Corner Legion has the next largest enrolled membership. The children are so interested that one boy said, "I like to belong to the L. T. L. because I learn something there."

Howell Legion has a "Boys' Temperance Club." Marion Legion has the largest graduates' class; twenty enrolled; Grant county has organized three new Legions in the county, making eight in all.

The recent visit to our state of Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens and Miss Anna Gordon benefited our cause and left our state L. T. L. treasury $20 better off.

West Washington.

MOTTO: "Firm as our mountains can stand."
STATE FLOWER: The Willard rose.

RALLY CRY:

In Washington West we do our best
To help drive out tobacco and rum.
Just see us come!
Do you hear us yell?
We are the Washington L. T. L.
Saloons must go; must go. (Stamp foot.)

The best thing our state has done this year is to awaken and enthuse the mother unions as to the importance of L. T. L. work, and a great increase of membership. Many new Legions are being organized.

The largest Legion paying dues is at La Connor, Skagit county. They pay on forty members. Mrs. R. Gaches is superintendent. The most active Legion in the state is the Evergreen Legion of Mt. Vernon, H. B. Dunlap, superintendent.

This Legion has contributed $7.00 toward the L. T. L. room in the Temperance Hospital; also sent scrap albums there, has given $3.00 toward state L. T. L. work and contributed financially and otherwise toward the support of other Legions just starting. They have assisted at socials and teas as well as circulated petitions during the legislature.

MRS. HATTIE B. DUNLAP,
State Secretary.

SURE NOW.

The Truth About Coffee.

It must be regarded as a convincing test when a family of 7 has used Postum for 5 years, regaining health and keeping healthy and strong on this food drink.

This family lives in Millville, Mass., and the lady of the household says: "For eight years my stomach troubled me all the time. I was very nervous and irritable and no medicine helped me.

"I had about given up hope until 5 years ago next month I read an article about Postum Cereal Coffee that convinced me that coffee was the cause of all my troubles. I made the Postum carefully and liked it so much I drank it in preference to coffee but without much faith that it would help me.

"At the end of a month, however, I was surprised to find such a change in my condition. I was stronger in every way, less nervous and at the end of 6 months I had recovered my strength so completely that I was able to do all of my own housework. Because of the good Postum did us I knew that what you claimed for Grape-Nuts must be true and we have all used that delicious food ever since it first appeared on the market.

"We have 7 in our family and I do the work for them all and I am sure that I owe my strength and health to the steady use of your fine cereal food and Postum (in place of coffee.) I have such great faith in Postum that I have sent it to my relatives and I never lose a chance to speak well of it." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

North Carolina.

MOTTO: "Our lives for Christ."

RALLY CRY:
We're coming too, tho far below,
Down where the stately pine trees grow.
Rah! Rah! Rah! We'll not be late,
The L. T. L.'s of the "Old North State."

Not having received any response from the different Legions to which I had written I can only report the work done here at Albemarle, which I judge is the most active Legion in the state. It has nine graduates and a total pledged membership of forty-five. The best thing done is in contributing to the work in the Philippines, it being the first foreign work done. In addition, the Albemarle Legion has contributed to the Frances Willard Memorial Fund, and to that for the Finland famine sufferers. A Legion is being organized for the Oxford Orphanage at Oxford, tho it is too early to report results as yet. The Albemarle Legion takes fifteen copies of the Crusader. Ten active L. T. L.'s were reported to me some time ago.

FRANCES E. UFFORD,
State Secretary.

THURMAN UNION.

MOTTO: "We look to Him who notes the sparrow's fall,
And as we climb to reach the goal,
He will support us all."

RALLY CRY:
Rah! Rah! Ree! Rah! Rah! Ree!
North Carolina is the state for me.
God's our Captain, we've no dread;
We'll fight Old Rum till he's dead, dead, dead.

The best work in the state has been accomplished by the L. T. L. at Statesville, under the direction of Mrs. M. V. Marable, who takes the L. T. L.'s once a week and instructs them in plain sewing. This is a very unique organization, and the efforts put forth by the boys and girls have resulted in great good to the community.

The garments made are given to the poor, and many hearts are made glad. There are valuable lessons of love and sympathy as well as lessons of usefulness. The parents of these children are grateful for the opportunities afforded their dear ones.

Minnesota.

MOTTO: "We're for home and mother."

RALLY CRY:
Br-rr-rah!
Min-ne-so-ta!
No saloons within our borders!
They will get their marching orders!
When we vote. Hear that yell?

Miss Hollister, our state secretary, has been out of the state most of the year and has requested me to report for her. I cannot give you our present enrollment, but will say that while some Legions are suspended for want of leaders, others are being organized, and thus the work is going forward, and results being seen.

Hancock is reporting fine work; had a fine program May 30. Others are carrying flowers, fruits, and literature to hospitals, jails, etc. One sister who, for lack of assistance, is unable to conduct a Legion, has a few children meet at her home for instruction. This little band sent four pairs of slippers and a donation of money to the Temperance Hospital. They have a little garden and send flowers from it to the sick and sorrowing. Some of our workers have Legions or classes in mission churches. Among this class is one in South Minneapolis, under the leadership of Alice Neal.

Lansing has a membership of ninety-five pledged children, the largest Legion so far reported to me.

Mrs. Bangs, of Hendrom, writes that her Legion numbers forty-five, and she says: "At the village election this spring the license vote was defeated by a large majority and the honor was ascribed to the faithful efforts of our L. T. L."

Mrs. Beaty, of Clinton, reports her Legion as having held a series of fourteen anti-cigaret medal contests in the past year. She states Clinton L. T. L. makes a specialty of contest work. They sent a speaker to the state convention last year, who enters the contest at National Convention this year. Two grand gold medal winners enter the state diamond medal contest this year. A Senior class there are taking examinations in the regular course of study, and four have passed so far. A committee of three prepare a short program for each regular meeting. I have no doubt others are doing just as faithful and telling service, which I should have reported could I have heard from all.

MRS. JENNIE FITCH HALL,
Associate State Secretary.

Oklahoma.

RALLY CRY.

We hail from the land of the mistletoe;
Our lives, like its berries, should be white as snow.
Just listen now and hear us yell:
We're the Oklahoma L. T. L.!

This has been a year of marked advancement in the temperance work of Oklahoma and we are pleased to report an increase of nearly 100 per cent in our L. T. L. We now have about twenty active Legions. This seems small, as compared with our sister states, but when we consider that this work has been organized but a little more than three years, that we have many obstacles to overcome such as are common to all new countries in any line of reform, we feel that we have much for which to be thankful and to feel encouraged. As yet we have not been financially able to have an L. T. L. organizer in our field, consequently the work has never been brought before the public as we realize it must be. Much attention is given to the medal contest work in our different Legions.

Oklahoma has several Indian schools. In answer to requests for reports from matrons of the various schools we learn that all the schools give much time to the instruction of temperance. Altho the children in but few of the schools are organized into Legions, they conduct their lessons and services much the same and temperance sentiment is fast gaining control.

(MRS.) NELLIE DESELMS, Territorial Secretary.

Illinois.

SENIOR MOTTO: "With God's help we'll change all this."
JUNIOR MOTTO: "The present is yours; the future is ours."
STATE FLOWER: White Carnation.

RALLY CRY:
Rah! Rah! Illinois, Illinois,
Comes with her L. T. L.
All other states to tell
That the whisky power is broken,
And this shall be our token—
Our motto long outspoken—
Rah! Rah! Saloons Must Go.

Illinois' best work for the year is the securing of a more cordial recognition of Loyal Legion work among pastors and young people's societies of the churches, and the earnest co-operation of parents. Churches, societies, schools and homes have welcomed the Loyal Legion work, senior and junior, as in no previous year.

Efforts are being made to organize a Legion in the "State Training School for Girls," at Geneva.

A Legion of 100 members is reported from Anna, Union county; Olney, Richland county, reports L. T. L. prosperous. Three hundred and seventy-seven boys signed the Anti-Tobacco pledge. Bethany, Moultrie county, reports membership of seventy and bright prospects for the future.

(MRS.) CLARA E. BEEDE.
State Secretary.

Colorado.

MOTTO: "Keep thyself pure."

RALLY CRY:
Chink, chink, chink; talk and ink;
They're the things to make folks think;
Chink, chink, chink; talk and ink;
Leave off smoke and leave off drink;
Chink, chink chink.

Last year five of the nineteen districts in this state had eighteen Legions, with an aggregate membership of 700. We now have twenty-five Legions in ten of the nineteen districts, with a membership of 1,050, most of them pledged. Sterling, with sixty members, is nearing its list of 100 pledged names. In October a Legion was organized in Trinidad with ten members. In February there were fifty-six pledged members and a W. a month old.

Hastings has an L. T. L. mothered by a C. E. Society. This Legion has a number of adult honorary members, and is really doing W. C. T. U. work. Greeley has a graded Legion, and will graduate a fine class this summer. Idaho Springs Legion was organized in January. Has now enrolled fifty-two seniors and eighty-four juniors, seventy-five of whom are pledged. Boulder, Akron, Platteville, Pueblo, Ft. Morgan, Denver, Colorado Springs, Olathe, Rocky Ford, have flourishing L. T. L.'s.

While we are still in the initial stage of this most important work, yet we are making progress, and hope finally to see an L. T. L. in every city, village and mining camp of our state.

ALLA B. FOSTER,
State Secretary.

Kentucky.

MOTTO: "For truth and purity."

We have as yet no Legions regularly organized in public institutions, but temperance lessons are taught in several, and in one "Children's Home" the matron has secured the signing of the triple pledge by many of the inmates. While Kentucky is far behind many of the states in L. T. L. work, yet we feel encouraged. Interest is being shown in places that have hitherto been indifferent and some of our Legions are doing excellent work. One town has an L. T. L. chorus that is ready to sing at public meetings of both the W. C. T. U. and L. T. L. The largest Legion in the state is at Pineville. It has 180 members, all of whom are pledged. They are wide-awake and earnest, and under the wise leadership of Mrs. Sarah E. Moss have accomplished good work.

(MRS.) NELLY T. ARNSPIGER,
State Secretary.

Vermont.

RALLY CRY:
What do you think of Vermont?
What is she going to do?
She's going to fight, for she's true and blue,
Rah! Rah! Rah! What do you think of that?
Rally, rally, rally! Saloons are falling flat.

FRANKLIN county leads in the number of organized Legions, while the largest company is found at Barre in Washington county.

State Secretary.

MOTTO: We are enlisted for life. Prohibition shall prohibit.

RALLY CRY.

Rah! Rah! Rah! Who are we?
Members of an L. T. L.
Don't you see?
Don't you love to hear us yell?
Saloons must go! Saloons must go!
For we boys and girls say so!

Reports not being in yet, I do not know how much the Legions have done for temperance hospital and other worthy work. I do know, however, that Kansas Legioners have contributed to put a twenty-five dollar door in our Willard Hall at Ottawa. The door has a silver plate upon it, bearing the beloved words:

"KANSAS LEGIONERS."

I find a good deal of anxiety expressed by late comers, who waited for the flood to subside before sending in their donations, lest they are too late to be counted among the helpers.

It proves to me anew, had I needed proof, how the Legion that is doing something, is alive, eager, with a just pride in the work of their hands and brains.

The largest Legion in the state, so far as I have been able to ascertain, is at Burlingame; superintendent, Mrs. M. E. Ford. They have one hundred and three members and honor me by calling it the "Jessie Morton L. T. L."

Miss Emma Page comes to Kansas in July. We have all our plans laid to take her to Beloit Industrial School for Girls and once more make an effort to get them organized for temperance work. We hope when the next L. T. L. issue comes out to furnish a report of Kansas labors in this field that shall show we realize our opportunities.

JESSIE W. MORTON,
State Secretary.

Maine.

MOTTO: "We'll stand for the right."

RALLY CRY:

Maine, Maine, here we come!
To help drive out tobacco and rum,
Our heads are clear, our hearts are true,
We'll stand for the right the whole world through.

Some of the best results of the L. T. L. in Maine have been to reduce the demand for cigarets and increase the attendance at Sunday school. The Junior Legion at Stroudwater, composed of twenty-five little tots, recently held a sale of articles, the greater part of which had been fashioned by their own hands. They cleared $17.68, $1.00 of which they donated to the colored children of Virginia and L. T. L. Extension Fund. Gertrude Stevens-Leavitt's little five-year-old adopted boy sent $1.00 for the same purpose, which he had been planning to spend for himself.

MYRTLE G. R. AMES,
State Secretary.

Michigan.

MOTTO: "Do to-day's duties. Resist to-day's temptations."

RALLY CRY:

Labor all, forward all.
Down with King Alcohol!
Michigan is in line.
We will conquer. Give us time.
Hurrah! Hurrah for the L. T. L.

The best thing our state has done is to appoint an organizer. Mr. Floyd Starr, our newly elected state president, is now in the field and having fine success. One district and one county have been organized during the year. The Lesson Manuals are taught in one industrial school in the state.

BELLE C. ROWLEY,
State Secretary.

New Jersey.

MOTTO: "King Alcohol must go."

RALLY CRY.

(Given rapidly in explosive tone.)
What's the matter with Jersey? Who's a-going to fight?
Loyal Temperance Legioners—they're all right!
Rah! Rah! Rah! Are we frightened? NO.
Rally, rally, rally! Kng Alcohol must go.

AMONG the "best things done" are our state L. T. L. conference, the increased representation in the county schools of methods by the Legions, and for the Legions, and the renewed interest that has been shown in several Legions. The very best thing is the untiring help of the state president of the W. C. T. U. We have no "special Legions" worthy of mention. A little is done in one or two Orphan's Homes. I have not been able to get membership figures, but probably Legion No. 1 in Elizabeth is the largest, with over 200 members.

ALICE M. GUERNSEY,
State Secretary.

North Dakota.

MOTTO: "For truth and right in the King's name."

RALLY CRY:

Rah! Rah! Rah! Can't you tell
We're the boys and girls of the L. T. L.
No saloons within our state,
King Alcohol has met his fate.
Pro-hi-bi-tion
That's the mission
Of the North Dakota L. T. L.!

Our Legions have proved a large factor in this reform. In the western part of the state one L. T. L. has entirely changed public sentiment in a place where the Sunday picnic with beer accompaniment formerly flourished. We more than doubled our membership last year, and we have but fifty childless unions in the state. On one of the reservations the government superintendent of the Indian school conducted a very interesting L. T. L. Altho we cannot report great deeds, we can safely claim that no more loyal and efficient little temperance workers are to be found anywhere than some of our North Dakota boys and girls.

MRS. C. W. MOSES,
State Secretary.

New Hampshire.

MOTTO: "Firm as Granite."
EMBLEM: Autumn leaves.

RALLY CRY:

Firm as granite here we stand,
With L. T. L.'s all o'er the land,
The boys and girls will work and cheer;
Oh! Rah! Rah! Rah! For New Hampshire.'

Dover L. T. L. of about 130 enrolled and 107 pledged members is the largest in the state. They have been very active during the year. They held a bazaar which cleared over $75. They have sixty-nine members in their Band of Mercy, and all are studying for diplomas. Hampton Falls Legion is the oldest in the state, and does good work all the year. Dempster Legion has about twenty-five working members, led by an earnest worker. The members of Warner Legion have observed all the Red Letter days since September, 1902, and are studying for diplomas. They have done quite a little for Mercy Home, our home for friendless girls.

MRS. PLATT.

For the past two years a number of unions in New London county, Connecticut, have employed a paid leader for the L. T. L. companies. Our state L. T. L. Secretary, Mrs. Grace Curtiss Platt, has made monthly visits during six months of the year to each of the six unions in our county, and has personally instructed seven L. T. L.'s, two of which she organized this year, one of eighty members and the other thirty-three; and for one union, in place of an L. T. L., she has spoken to the children in each of six school rooms, at each visit.

The expense of travel and service was equally divided between the six employing unions. In this way nearly a thousand children were brought under L. T. L. instruction; and, aside from thirty-six school-room visits, forty-five meetings for the children were held.

Only two of the seven L. T. L. companies held meetings except when Mrs. Platt conducted them, so it is quite fair to suppose that but for the help of a very moderately paid worker more than thirty of these meetings would not have been held, nor would the school-rooms have been visited.

Moreover, there was formed in this same school an Anti-Cigaret League of 137 members, and, in another school, one of fifteen members; while in still another town thirty-five boys, who were not members of the L. T. L., took the anti-cigaret pledge.

It is impossible for me to express my belief in the desirability of a paid leader for the L. T. L., in a few words. It is only semi-occasionally that a person is found who is capable to do this work, and at liberty to do it without compensation, and there is no W. C. T. U. money that can be spent to better advantage in any other way than this.

I sincerely believe that if every W. C. T. U. in the country would organize and sustain an L. T. L., whether it were possible to do any other active work or not, that in five years' time we might all feel the courage born of enthusiasm, in ten years the hope that springs from a new army of intelligent helpers, and in ten years more the alcoholic drink question would be the dominant issue in American politics.

MRS. ANNIE C. S. FENNER,
Pres. New London Co. W. C. T. U.

Northern California.

MOTTO: "A clear brain, a loving heart and a helpful hand."
FLOWER: White rose.

RALLY CRY:

Onward to victory, is California's yell,
Rah, rah, rah, L. T. L.
We will fight without a pause
And will push the temperance cause
Onward to victory,
Rah, rah, rah.
(Clap the hands on each word "rah.")

Everts Legion, of Boulder Creek, Santa Cruz county, reports the largest membership, having seventy-five pledged members. Mrs. R. N. Kail is its present superintendent. This Legion has done good L. T. L. work in all lines. It has a brass band of fourteen boys between the ages of fourteen and seventeen. Only pledged L. T. L. members can belong. Its leader is a temperance gentleman who takes a great interest in the boys.

The best thing done is the taking up of the regular L. T. L. course of study.

MRS. NOLL.

Mrs. C. H. Noll, the retiring state L. T. L. secretary, has faithfully carried forward this branch of W. C. T. U. work during the past four years. Her aims for L. T. L. state work have been high and fully in accord with the National, so that what has been accomplished will be permanent, and from now on will bear fruit in more efficient work by the Legions thruout the state, of which there have been thirty under her care the past year. Today we have twenty-two active Legions.

One of the best things our state has done the past year has been that of paying state and National dues. Other years we have paid one, but not both. San Bernardino county has the honor of paying the largest amount of National dues of any county in the state; Los Angeles county of state dues. Another is supplying with temperance literature a Legion in Arizona.

The Los Angeles W. C. T. U., whose president is Mrs. Lucy S. Blanchard, makes a specialty of L. T. L. work, having a legion of its own numbering nearly 200 members, with a diploma class almost ready to graduate. It has under its care and led by its members five other Legions in widely separated parts of the city. The Anna A. Gordon Legion being one of the largest.

Mrs. A. H. Cain has lately organized a church L. T. L. in Memorial Baptist Church Junior Society.

A Legion has just been organized in the South Pasadena Orphans' Home, where are almost 100 children. Mrs. L. W. Burt, county superintendent of Los Angeles county, will have charge of this work. Plans are now maturing for a Legion in the Orphans' Home in the city.

Another interesting field of work is in the Whittier State School (Reformatory). This work was begun and organized by Mrs. Hilles, and carried on by the Los Angeles county executive for some time. Owing to many changes and circumstances it was deemed best for the Whittier union to carry the work forward in their own way. This it has done faithfully under the leadership of Mrs. Ella Veeder.

Another Legion "mothered" by Mrs. Blanchard's union is the Olivette L. T. L. The superintendent is Miss Mary Sturgis, aged nineteen, high school student. She is assisted by Miss Ada Richardson, who is only sixteen years of age. The twenty-one members of this L. T. L. are working to banish a saloon located only a block from the church in which they meet.

Another most interesting Legion is the one in "Newsboys' Home" in Los Angeles. The work was organized by Mrs. Noll over a year ago, with Mrs. Mary Finney as superintendent. Several months ago Mrs. Finney returned to her home in the East, when Mrs. C. R. Vance took charge. At the time of organization twenty-two boys were enrolled, all but three taking the pledge. These boys were little street arabs, ranging from five to sixteen years of age. At first they took the L. T. L. as a huge joke; but under the wise and loving care of their now adored leader they have developed into a clean, healthy, moral, well mannered lot of boys that any mother might be proud of.

One of the most interesting fields of work is where we find Miss Gertrude B. Chandler at work, faithfully teaching gospel temperance truths under many difficulties. She and the Los Angeles union thru her, are doing the best of missionary work. An extract from Miss Chandler's letter describing her work in the Fernando Street Mission cannot fail to be of interest. She says: "When I first took charge of the mission it was located amidst the liquor saloons, and considering the location, our little school seemed like a 'drop in the bucket,' or, in other words, so weak seemingly, against the mighty force for evil around us. We are now located on the same street, but in the Spanish portion of the city, and according to our present books (all of our old books, money, etc., having been stolen a few months ago), we have about thirty or thirty-five on an average, and we have had sixty-five or seventy; but it is very hard to keep that number in constant attendance, with no one in the homes who cares whether the children go to the L. T. L. or not.

"The Mission wagon goes out every Sunday with one of the ladies to gather the children, many of them waiting for the wagon to come. You may imagine somewhat the kind of homes that are represented, when I tell you that some of them speak unconcernedly and indifferently of a brother or a sister being in jail for stealing, or for some other dreadful offense which their young minds can hardly comprehend. The children are of different nationalities, and many of them come to the L. T. L. with unkempt hair, dirty hands and faces, and dressed in overalls and soiled dresses; some of them bringing in still smaller ones in their arms, and bending under the burden. I teach them a very suggestive song, 'Raise your hands, if they are clean; brush your clothes, comb the hair, and wash the face and hands with care,' etc."

State Secretary.

Alabama.

MOTTO: "If we save the children to-day, we have saved the nation to-morrow."

RALLY CRY:

Here we come. Hear us yell.
We promise you that soon or late,
We'll drive saloons from our loved state,
And the prohibition banner
Will soon wave over Alabama.

THE best thing Alabama has done the past year was adopting Mrs. Maude Lorene Greene, our National chalk talker, as our own, and having her home address now at Mobile. Mrs. Greene has worked since January in Alabama and has done much good work. An interesting Legion has lately been organized at Birmingham among the miners' children, and much is hoped from its work. We are trying to secure subscribers to "The Crusader Monthly," both in Legions and in W. C. T. U.'s.

We have paid our first National dues $1.50, and hope to do better next year. We rejoice in the Alabama child labor law. We wish that a host of workers from the north would move down here and help us.

State Secretary.

Arkansas.

MOTTO: "Pray and work for truth and purity."

RALLY CRY:

Who are we! Who are we!
Sobriety and Purity!
Ho! L. T. L. Hurrah! Hurrah!
For Arkan—Arkan—Arkansas.

We are hoping and we believe that there is an increase of L. T. L. interest in Arkansas. A somewhat fluctuating interest, but the children are always ready to be gathered, if only the leaders are at hand for their instruction. From such unsatisfactory reports as we have been able to get, we believe Paragould L. T. L. has the largest number enrolled. It has met regularly every Sunday for seven years. Camden, Morrilton, and Prescott report about the same average attendance as Paragould. Many think medal contest work the most interesting. It generally brings a lift to the finances, which furnishes the means to purchase literature, which exerts such a wide-reaching influence. Many of our workers think the mass meetings accomplish the most good.

The Legioners take an interest in any kind of work laid out for them, and the Flower Mission department affords them much delight.

Rah! Rah! Rah!

No direct report has been received of the work in West Virginia, the able secretary, Mrs. Lenna Yost, contenting herself with the space given to the Elk Garden Legion at Clarksburg. From various sources, however, we learn that the work is thriving, and we shall expect to hear more from West Virginia next year. Mrs. Yost is thoroly alive to the need of creating interest in her department, as the following suggestions, made by her in the state paper, serve to show:

A Mother-Union that takes care of its L. T. L. will help to devise ways in which Legioners can earn their membership fees. Let a boy sweep your doorsteps of a snowy morning and so earn a nickel. Give the doing of an errand to the girl who wants to earn her very own money to take to the Legion. Talk it over with the Leader of the Legion at your next meeting and supply her with such a list that she can say to the Legions, "Mrs. Smith will pay five cents for the hemming of a towel—Mrs. Brown wants a boy to rake up her back yard—Mrs. Gray would like a package taken to the express office to-morrow morning. Who will take these chances to earn their membership fees?"

"Mothers are indifferent about their children attending Legion meeting:" Hold a mother's afternoon, and show them what you do in the Legion and why it is a help to the boys and girls to attend it.

Tennessee.

MOTTO: "The Lord of Hosts is with us."

RALLY CRY.

Rah, Rah, Rah, Rah, Rah Ree,
The L. T. L. for Tennessee.

While no report has come from Mrs. Jennie Manley of the L. T. L. work in Tennessee it does not mean a lack of interest in the children. At the last state convention Mrs. Manley reported "more and better work this year than last." Maryville with fifty members had held an open meeting celebrating the birthdays of Miss Willard, Abraham Lincoln and George Washington, Harriman has sixty members and uses the Lesson Manuals. The Legion presented $47 to the union. At Fayetteville the L. T. L. is organized in connection with the Christian Endeavor. Goshen with fifteen members meets once each month with the union; also furnishes music and recitations for all public temperance meetings. Petersburg has sixty-eight pledged members of whom six are in a graduating class. This is a lively wide-awake Legion that has many special meetings. Huntingdon has forty-six members who follow the plan of work found in the Lesson Manuals. Ogden has twelve members.

Virginia.

HE most promising Legion which I have to report this year is the Wachapreague L. T. L., which has already doubled its membership. At the county W. C. T. U. convention the eighty-four members of this Legion gave a fine evening entertainment, in the new Methodist church, in which are three temperance memorial windows donated by the W.'s, Y.'s and L. T. L.'s respectively. Wachapreague is the first town in the county to rid itself of the saloon, which is due to the efforts of the women and children of these three divisions of the white-ribbon army.

State Secretary.

WE WILL SEND to every subscriber or reader of THE UNION SIGNAL or worthy person recommended by a subscriber or reader, a full-sized One Dollar package of VITÆ-ORE, by mail, postpaid, sufficient for one month's treatment, to be paid for within one month's time after receipt, if the receiver can truthfully say that its use has done him or her more good than all the drugs and dopes of quacks or good doctors or patent medicines he or she has ever used. It is a geological discovery, to which there is nothing added or taken from. It is the marvel of the century for curing such diseases as Rheumatism, Bright's Disease, Blood Poisoning, Heart Trouble, Dropsy, Catarrh and Throat Affections, Liver, Kidney and Bladder Ailments, Stomach and Female Disorders, La Grippe, Malarial Fever, Nervous Prostration and General Debility, as thousands testify, and as no one, answering this, writing for a package, will deny after using.

Vitæ-Ore will do the same for you as it has for hundreds of readers of this paper, if you will give it a trial. Send for a $1 package at our risk. You have nothing to lose. We want no one's money Vitæ-Ore cannot benefit. You are to be the judge. This offer will challenge the attention and consideration and afterward the gratitude of every living person who desires better health, or who suffers pains, ills and diseases which have defied the medical world and grown worse with age. We care not for your skepticism, but ask only your investigation at our expense, regardless of what ills you have, by sending to us for a package. Write today, mentioning this paper.

MORE NEWS FROM THE FLOOD DISTRICT

Helpful Work by W. C. T. U. Women—Some Personal Experiences

Mrs. Sena Hartzell Wallace, president of the Second District, sends an interesting report (Armourdale is a suburb of Kansas City). She says:

"Every member of Armourdale union lost their clothing and furniture. One dear sister lost everything. Their house floated away, and with it everything they possessed, including 150 chickens and twelve canary birds. A few members of this union met yesterday afternoon, and I met with them. Such a brave, courageous set as they are. * * * The Wyandotte W. C. T. U. sent a lot of clothing to the flood victims here. If any of the white-ribbon sisters in other parts of the country wish to send anything to these dear comrades they can send to me at 527 Oakland Ave., Kansas City, Kan., and I will have a committee appointed to act with me. Concordia and Goodland have notified me that they have sent boxes and barrels of clothing to my address. The condition of the woman I have mentioned is the common experience. Where the houses did not succumb they were filled with mud and water above the second story. Everything is wrecked. Yet, notwithstanding all this terrible loss, our women say we will have the state convention just the same."

While the extreme of loss and suffering did not reach Salina, Kan., still the dwellers therein had some thrilling experiences and sustained many losses and discomforts. Mrs. Ellen F. Brown, one of our W. C. T. U. women, writes us an interesting letter full of flood color. We make a few extracts for Union Signal readers:

"Commencing May 25 it rained almost continuously until Friday. On Friday, May 29, at one in the morning, the fire bells rang, the fire whistles blew and all mill whistles and several car whistles, and the Normal College bell tolled for an hour. Salina was awake. Every house was lighted from top to bottom. Altho the gas plant failed, being stopped by the flood, rescuers were at work—afoot, on horseback, in wagons and in boats. People in West Salina and north of there had to be taken out of their houses on account of the rise from Dry Creek. Some awoke to find the water up to their beds. One sick woman fell out of bed into the water and died sometime afterward from shock and exposure. People in East Salina fled to the cemetery bluffs; many from Salina also. About 400 took refuge among the farmers. Inside of two hours no wagon could be used. There was one solid sheet of water from bridge to bluff. * * * No more sleep for us that night. A man patroled the streets on horseback to see who needed help. Everybody was cared for unless too modest to make his wants known. * * *

"All traffic was blockaded for some time. Our first Eastern mail came from the west. There were two bags of mail, all papers, soaked to a pulp, that had been in the Kansas City flood. Our Union Signals of May 28 were lost. * * * Mrs. Myra Brown seems to have suffered the most. She staid in her house until the water came up. Everything was swept away but the haystack and the house, which had four feet of water in it. She is our county W. C. T. U. treasurer and local superintendent of Flower Missions. She is a great worker, and her field takes in the United States. * * * Quite a number of our women had their cellars filled with water, and so quickly that but few things were taken out. Those living in East and West Salina had to move out. Some had supplies brought to their houses in boats.

"I know two women who had to be moved from their houses when their babies were less than two weeks old. One in the country the same day the child was born. One baby was born in a boat. One woman in the country was carried in a boat for burial. Birth and death have their own seasons, and wait for no one. There was one old colored man drowned in town. He got crazed and lost. One boy was drowned in the country, by slipping off a boat. Meanwhile a brother and sister got crazed and wanted to drown themselves, or kill themselves somehow. Friday, May 22, we had the largest hail I ever saw, many of them as large around as goose eggs, making holes in the lawns and gardens their full size, destroying the garden and breaking twigs off the fruit trees. * * * After the hail a severe wind storm from the west tore off the steeple from the M. E. church which landed on the church and ground, and fortunately hurt no one. It will cost the M. E. church about $700 for repairs, and many of the members are W. C. T. U. women."

Mrs. Carrie M. Hill, secretary Seventh District, writes from Hutchinson, Kan.: "We had two feet of water and mud in our house for five days, during which time we lived high. That is, we lived upstairs for a week. It took lots of sand to stand such doings, so there was deposited in our front yard fifty loads of the finest I ever saw, thirty of which have been drawn away, but no grassy lawn is yet visible. Our groceries were brought to us by boat. We had a small bed lounge which floated all over the house and furnished us transportation to and from the pump and pantry. * * * I lost a fine silk quilt which I made twenty-five years ago and never had used much. It fell from the couch and lay in the water all the time. Moral: 'Never put off using till tomorrow what you can use to-day.'

"While suffering many losses and discomforts we are so much better off than Kansas City (where 23,000 people are living in tents) and other places, that we do not feel like complaining. Our recent jubilee was a great success."

Rev. Thomas M. Rickman, state lecturer of the Kansas W. C. T. U., well known in Ohio and Indiana, and Baptist minister at Council Grove, Kan., was caught in the flood and barely escaped with his life. The water at Council Grove rose sixty inches in one hour. The destruction of property was very great and several lives were lost.

Mrs. E. E. Woodward and Mrs. Myra Hislop, of the Lawrence (Kan.) W. C. T. U., were driven from their homes by the flood

The Wisconsin Convention.

A Delightful and Interesting Gathering—Successful Medal Contests—Wise and Timely Resolutions.

Augusta E. C. Strong, Correspondent.

Baraboo, Wis., June 29.—Wisconsin held its convention June 2-4, at Eau Claire. That hospitable city of 18,000 people provided delightful homes and entertainment, not only for white-ribbon women not a few, but for a host of "Rebekahs" and their brothers, the Odd Fellows of Wisconsin—all in the same week. These friends had also a convention, but it did not apparently interfere with the attendance at ours, for a large church well filled with attentive listeners greeted us at every meeting, and each evening the audience was almost a crowd.

A noticeable feature of this convention was the many new faces to be seen. For lecturer, we had Mrs. Nelle Burger, of Missouri, too well known to need any word of praise from my pen. We have had Mrs. Burger a month among our local unions, and she promises us another month next year.

The reports of department superintendents were most of them encouraging. Our Superintendents of Franchise and Legislative Work have been indefatigable in their labors, which even tho not crowned with success this year we believe are not in vain. It is our hope that two years from now our legislators will be ready to give women the legal right to vote, and that they will also prohibit the manufacture and sale of the deadly cigaret.

The former officers were all re-elected. Mrs. T. W. Black, Racine, and her assistant, Miss Mary Money, Milwaukee, are still our faithful secretaries of the L. T. L. Branch. The Medal Contests both oratorical (for a diamond medal) and musical (for the silver medal), Wednesday evening, were presided over by Mrs. Elizabeth Axon, state superintendent of Medal Contests, and were rarely interesting.

Thursday evening a successful "demonstration" of a large proportion of our departments, proved an attraction to a large audience and was certainly an entertaining illustration of the objects and aims of our multiple work. A resolution was adopted thanking President Hughitt of the C. & N. W. R. R. for releasing a large number of freight handlers from Sunday work, and also for refusing to run Sunday excursion trains hereafter. A resolution was also voted to be sent to the Board of Managers of the St. Louis Exposition, protesting against the traffic in girls and the fearful increase of immorality during the preparations for the coming World's Fair, made known thru recent official investigations. A memorial to Congress was also adopted, requesting the Senate and House of Representatives to submit an amendment to the Federal Constitution, prohibiting the states from disfranchising citizens on account of sex.

An amendment to our By-laws was adopted which changes the time of our annual meeting from "May or June" to "September or October." So our next convention will take place in the fall of 1904.

Roll of Honor.

How Spring Creek Was Placed on the Honor Roll.

In response to an inquiry as to how they did it, Mrs. Fannie Whitney, the president of Spring Creek, Kansas, union, writes: "I had been long waiting for some opportunity to make The Union Signal a weekly visitor to the homes of our women. The special 50-cent offer came at an opportune moment. Our union was to meet with me that day and I had invited the members to come to dinner. We had a splendid meeting and while we were all feeling encouraged I read the letter giving the special offer. As the time was passing I asked that rather than wait to get the money from each member we take the money from the treasury and send at once the subscriptions for each one. They voted to do this and we planned to have an entertainment to replace the money. The treasurer was ill and not able to be present. As I wanted to send the twelve subscriptions at once I walked to her house, two and a half miles away, the next day to get the money. Had I attempted to have each one subscribe for the paper just now I should probably have failed. This is the way we took "Our Messenger" (the state paper) the first year. Now each one pays for her own paper and I hope for the same result with The Union Signal, for I am sure it has but to be known to be appreciated. I can take no credit of this to myself. Had not the dear women of our union sanctioned the plan the subscriptions could not have been sent."

Spring Creek is a country union in Phillips county, Kansas. Its membership is scattered and they have suffered much from drouth, floods and crop failures. Yet their faith and their zeal fails not in the determination to take our native land "For God and Home."

New School Law in Florida.

Fort Reed, Fla., July 1.—The new school law, passed by the legislature which adjourned on June 5, promises to be a distinct gain in scientific temperance instruction in making physiology and hygiene mandatory studies in schools of all grades.

The late legislature did much to advance the interests of education. The State Agricultural College, located at the county seat of Columbia, Lake City, was endowed and raised to the dignity of a State University. And best of all the people are waking up to the necessity of banishing that school of vice, the legalized saloon.

From the Far South.

A Noble Louisiana Worker—The Work Growing in Numbers and Influence.

Lury Gould Baldwin, Correspondent.

Baldwin, La., June 30.—Mrs. Alice M. Zable is a native of New Orleans and has been connected with the Central union since 1876, a few months after its organization. Mrs. Zable has been president, secretary and treasurer at different times for twelve years and is now president of the Central union. She gave years of strenuous effort and even labor for the W. C. T. U. lunch house in the city. She was state corresponding secretary for ten years, president of the first district two years, and was again elected at the recent convention at Hammond. She has given some time to field work, for which she is well fitted, but home and family cares claim her first attention.

MRS. ALICE M. ZABLE.

No one who has ever looked into her kindly face or heard her rare voice in song could fail to acknowledge her worth and her ability. Would that more Louisiana women could be aroused to give of their glorious young womanhood to the cause of temperance and morality in this state!

The Central union rejoices over ten new members and the reawakened interest of about as many more. Dues have been paid, donations made and more work accomplished than during the previous year. At present the union is trying to secure the funds to establish drinking fountains in the hot, thirsty city of New Orleans. Flower Mission Day was celebrated by distributing flowers, fruit, cake, fans and perfume at the charity hospital, the convalescent home, parish prison, the almshouse and the Werlein Mission.

The sixth annual convention of the First district was held at Hammond June 10-11. Mrs. N. E. Oliver, state corresponding secretary, presided, and the sessions were well attended. The Misses Mary Werlein, Eliza Page, and Myrtie Shively of New Orleans were present and ably assisted in the program.

Rev. Messrs. Porter, James, Van Valkenburg and Breckenridge gave helpful suggestions and encouragement. Mrs. G. V. Adams gave the address of welcome. The membership committee awarded the banner to the Hammond union.

The officers elected were: President, Mrs. A. M. Zable; vice-president, Mrs. G. V. Adams, Hammond; corresponding secretary, Mrs. C. L. Jurisch, Hammond; recording secretary, Miss Myrtle Shively of New Orleans; treasurer, Miss Eliza Page of New Orleans.

W. C. T. U. FOUNTAIN, DESIGNED BY MISS ELSIE WARD, FOR THE ST. LOUIS EXPOSITION.

News From Missouri.

W. C. T. U. Fountain and Temperance Exhibit at the St. Louis Exposition—No Gruesome Midway Exhibit.

Mrs. E. B. Ingalls, Correspondent.

(National W. C. T. U. Commissioner for World's Fair.)

The W. C. T. U. of the Louisiana Purchase States will place upon the World's Fair grounds a beautiful fountain. It is to be made of bronze and cost $3,000. The commission has been given to Miss Elsie Ward, a Missouri girl. The fountain will be eight feet six inches high and represent a woman holding a lily, emblematic of purity. It will be erected in a promiment place, and will freely dispense ice water pure and sparkling to all who care to drink.

The W. C. T. U. is to be congratulated upon the happy thought which prompted the giving away of ice water.

We will also have space granted us in the Department of Social Economy Building at the World's Fair for an exhibit of our aims and principles. For the first time in the history of Expositions space has been allotted for the regulation of the liquor traffic, under Grouping 137: Class 778, "Legal Regulation of the Liquor Traffic;" Class 779, "Public Management of Liquor Traffic;" Class 780, "Efforts for Lessening Intemperance." Surely the W. C. T. U. will want to make a good exhibit under this classification. It is very difficult to plan a creditable showing for an organization which is all work and no show, so if any one of our great constituency has an idea how to make this space both beautiful and expressive of our cause, we will be pleased to hear from her.

An article has been going the rounds of the press that the home of Jesse James, the Missouri outlaw, would be one of the attractions at the World's Fair. The following is a quotation from a letter addressed to me by Norris B. Gregg, Director of the Division of Concessions and Admissions: "We beg to advise that we have had ten or twelve applications from various parties who desire concessions for the installation and exhibit under a charge fee of the home of Jesse James, showing gruesome subjects in connection therewith. These parties were all advised that it was not the purpose of the Exposition to grant concessions for an exhibit of this character, and all applications, as they have been made, have been declined."

We have recently held a very successful handkerchief and stock sale. We had handkerchiefs from many European countries as well as from our own land. Some of the handkerchiefs were very old, as old as twenty-five, thirty-six and seventy-five years, and one 123 years old came from our superintendent of Christian Citizenship, Mrs. Mary Jewett Telford. Then there was one from Mrs. Robt. E. Lee, of the Confederacy, donated by our own Carrie Kellogg, state superintendent of social meetings. These valuable handkerchiefs we did not sell, but will keep to use at loan exhibitions, making money in that way.

St. Louis.

Australasian Triennial Convention.

Thirty-Five Departments Reported—Work Among Young People Planned.

C. E. Clarke, Correspondent.

THE fifth triennial convention of the W. C. T. U. of Australasia was held in Melbourne the last week in April. Over 100 delegates assembled from the different states of the Commonwealth, some coming as far as 2,000 miles to be present. There were also visiting delegates from New Zealand. Mrs. Nicholls, Australasian president, presided. A devotional day was held previous to the opening of the convention. A short memorial service was held, when tributes to the memory of beloved comrades were paid by Lady Holden, Mrs. Phillips and Mrs. Nolan.

Five delegates were appointed to represent the union at the World's Convention at Geneva. Many greetings were received from all parts of the world, and one from Miss Vida Goldstein, president of the Melbourne Women's Political Association, conveying the good wishes of that society. She said that "the convention had a special significance this year as it was the first congress of Australian women since they had been entrusted with the responsibility of the federal franchise. Judging by recent events temperance questions were coming more and more to the fore."

The president in her address said that twelve years had intervened since the inauguration of the Australasian union. In temperance work there had been much activity during the three years since last convention, and legislative enactments for the more satisfactory regulation or the prohibition and suppression of the drink traffic had been eagerly sought in many lines. State management of the sale of intoxicating liquor was still favored by the Trades Hall Council, by many members of Parliament, and by some ministers of religion and other Christian people; and tho the plan might answer as a money-making scheme, as a temperance measure it had signally failed. The liquor trade was always opposed to the extension of the franchise to women, and there was cause for believing that in the state of Victoria its influence had been used to that end. In order to stimulate the cause it was thought a united pledge-signing campaign, thoroly organized and systematically carried out, was needed in Australia.

The secretary, Mrs. Rooke, in her report mentioned that there had been a slight decline in the membership, in spite of the fact that Victoria, Queensland and West Australia had between them gained 1,301 new members. The shrinkage was ascribed to the drought, as it had seriously affected the finances and therefore indirectly the membership. The need for organization was greatly felt.

Reports were received from the thirty-five departments of work taken up by the union. That on Franchise pointed out that tho we had adult suffrage for the Federal Parliament, only three out of the six states in the Commonwealth had given their women the state suffrage. In connection with Peace and Arbitration mention was made that the unions had earnestly protested against the inclusion of the claims in the defense bill providing for compulsory military service, either in the form of conscription or of drill in the public schools. The report on Prison Work specially urged the necessity of appointing police matrons to the lock-ups, and that on anti-gambling stated that strenuous efforts had been put forth to prevent the possible introduction of the totalizator into Victoria. The Purity superintendent stated that workers still hung back, deterred by fears of all sorts of imaginary difficulties and dangers. The great cause of purity was suffering more from the apathy of its friends than the opposition of its foes. The White Cross branch, under the leadership of Dr. Richard Arthur, has done very important work and circulated an enormous amount of judiciously chosen literature.

The plans of work for the next three years include the extension of juvenile work by the formation of Loyal Temperance Legions, elocutionary contests, the extension of scientific temperance instruction in day and Sunday schools and thoro competitive examinations; more complete arrangements for work among young women which is to be aided by the formation of Girls' Clubs and Snowdrop Bands, as well as by Y unions. To this end the superintendent of Young Woman's Work was made a secretary and she was given a seat in Executive.

The evening meetings included a reception to the delegates in the Masonic Hall, a Christian citizenship meeting at which a letter was read from Miss Ellice Hopkins, an elocutionary contest and a grand temperance rally in the Melbourne town hall, at which Mr. Deakin, Federal Attorney General, presided. The Cornish Choir rendered several well-known selections and aided by the eloquence of the speakers roused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Rev. Canon Boyce, president of the New South Wales Alliance, Rev. G. R. Edgar, Rev. S. P. Carey and several M. P.'s also addressed the public meetings. A "membership banner" was presented to the Victorian State Union for having made the largest increase in its membership during the past three years. A garden party and a picnic were provided for the pleasure of the delegates. The various temperance orders in the city entertained the convention at luncheon each day and the press gave excellent reports and also eulogized the businesslike way in which the congress had been conducted and the large amount of work accomplished by it.

Mrs. Rooke, of Tasmania, was elected Australasian president; Mrs. Carvosso, Queensland, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Masterman New South Wales, recording secretary, and Mrs. Press, Victoria, was re-elected treasurer.

FIFTH TRIENNIAL AUSTRALASIAN CONVENTION.

The Geneva Convention.

By Elizabeth Gordon.

"I DID not think it pos-see-ble," said a charming Swiss lady, "that we should enjoy these meetings so much." She stood on the platform of Victoria Hall and spoke with a pretty French accent, while she heartily congratulated Mrs. Stevens, Miss Slack, Miss Anna Gordon and Mrs. Sanderson, the officers of the convention.

The speaker was one of the twenty cultured Geneva ladies comprising the "committee of reception" which, under its efficient chairman, Mlle. Vidart, has given to the delegates from all over the world warmest welcome and truly delightful receptions. Surely one must attend a World's Convention to realize the wide scope of our work and be thrilled with a sense of its blessed comradeship. One hundred and eighty delegates, and each one representing one thousand paying members!

National conventions in the United States and Great Britain are larger, but how much more inclusive is this world-wide representation of our work! When Mrs. Stevens brought down her gavel in Victoria Hall the morning of June 9, she greeted delegates from Sweden, Norway, Belgium, Iceland, India, Victoria, Queensland, West Australia, New Zealand, Cape Colony, Syria, Madeira, Chile, Canada, Great Britain, and the United States; also, representatives of the work in Egypt and Japan.

A telegram of loving greeting was sent to the honored president, Lady Henry Somerset, and deep regret at her absence on account of ill health was expressed. Mrs. Stevens was enthusiastically received, and great satisfaction has been expressed at her rulings, both in the Convention and in the Executive Committee, where the special needs of the countries and departments are considered in detail. In the felicity of her impromptu observations she follows in the footsteps of Frances Willard. Anna Gordon and Miss Slack are ever ready to support her on the right hand and on the left.

Victoria Hall is commodious and richly finished in gilt and crimson velvet. The banners and flags of all lands suspended above and around the large platform have been telling the people of Geneva that we are working "for God and Home and Every Land," and that we want "Purity in the Home," "Peace between all Nations," and that the Loyal Temperance Legion is saying, "We'll Help Lift the World to the Light."

How little did Mother Thompson think when she read the 146th psalm to the heroic band of Crusaders in Hillsboro, Ohio, Dec. 23, 1873, that it would be read responsively in Geneva, Switzerland, thirty years later by officers and delegates of a world-wide union!

Was not Frances Willard one of God's prophets when she had the vision of this "organized mothers' love" for every land and founded the organization in 1883 and planned its first splendid convention in Boston in 1891? Did she not say, "Woman will bless and brighten every place she enters, and she will enter every place upon the round earth?" The strong women of other lands here present, representing so many phases of work and occupying places of influence, show that this prophecy is being fulfilled; also, that they are bearing in mind that "womanliness must come first; afterward what you will."

The address of the President, Lady Henry, was frequently applauded. It was read by the vice-president. The report of the secretaries and treasurer showed great progress since the Edinburgh Convention three years ago. The ladies who entertained the Convention at that time were asked to rise that all might see them. After a representative of a country had spoken all the delegates from that land would rise so that we might know each other better.

When the report of the Executive Committee was read, Mrs. Stevens explained that the Convention was receiving it for adoption for the first time; and this because of a change in the constitution made by the Executive the previous day. Other important amendments provided for the election of officers by the Convention instead of the Executive, and changes in regard to the secretaries, so that Article VIII reads: "The President, vice-president-at-large, secretaries, and treasurer shall be elected biennially, or triennially, by the Convention." Articles were also amended making it possible to hold a triennial instead of a biennial meeting if deemed advisable.

The general secretary L. T. L. Branch was placed on the Executive Committee. Article V was amended so that not only life, but also memorial, members may be made by the payment of $100. Now World's superintendents, if absent, may be represented in person on the executive. The title "Round the World Missionaries" was changed to "World's White Ribbon Missionaries," to meet the plan that today prevails of sending workers to reside for several years in one country.

Mrs. Stevens and Miss Anna Gordon and others from the United States have cordially expressed in the Convention their appreciation of the bond of sympathy which exists between our republic and that of Switzerland. Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, who had previously been introduced as the writer of the popular White Ribbon song, "Some Glad Day," said when introduced as president of Massachusetts W. C. T. U.: "We are all Swiss in coming to you," and in their hearts these liberty-loving people gladly responded, as for the first time they joined in singing the inspiring refrain,

"It's coming, it's coming, the morn for which we pray, We'll take the world for Christ's own Kingdom, some glad day."

Mrs. Clarke of Ohio, when introduced as president of the great Crusade state, said, "We have met hundreds of Americans who have never crossed the ocean and many who could not speak a word of English." Mrs. Hawley, of Colorado, brought a greeting "from the Rockies to the Alps."

Mrs. Sibley said she came from Dixie, the land of that great commercial "King Cotton," and from Georgia, which passed a prohibitory law when only a little colony, antedating that of Maine by one hundred years. Now it has 123 out of 137 counties under some form of prohibition.

Miss May C. Walker, of Louisiana, also spoke for the great Southland. Anna Gordon reminded the Convention that the vice-president of the World's W. C. T. U. is also president of the prohibitory state of Maine, and said, "For twenty-five years the ballots of the white-ribbon women of the 'Pine Tree state' have been unanimously cast for their beloved president, Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens."

Madame Hyacinthe Loyson, American born, the wife of "Father Hyacinthe" and the president of "The Alliance of Oriental and Occidental Women," was prominent in the Convention.

We shall never forget her eloquent, womanly message to which we listened as she stood on the veranda of the beautiful country residence of M. and Mme. de Budé. It was at a reception to which all the delegates were invited—a garden party—with refreshments on the grounds, beautiful orchestral music, and, best of all, a superb view of Mont Blanc and other ranges of the Alps. Madame Loyson said in part:

"What came ye here for to see? Not reeds shaken by the wind, and not alone this sublime environing Nature!

"Ah, no! a higher aim than these majestic mountains, a purer vision than their crowning snows, an incentive of beauty, peace and holiness, more powerful than these verdant valleys or limpid lakes have brought you hither.

"But you! what came you here for to do? strange women of distant lands and younger races! Under the leadership of the Divine Captain, who owes his human life and earthly mission, to a woman, you have incorporated His sisters and her daughters, from the different parts of the world, into a grand marching army of rescue, to protect, not only our women and children and all helpless people; but to protect our God-ordained protectors and governors!—convincing them that to protect self against selfishness, and to govern appetite, is more difficult and more necessary than protecting frontiers or governing empires! And for them all you have started on one of the noblest crusades that mark Christian effort!

"You have established outposts thruout the world, beginning with Boston, Chicago, Washington, London, Edinburgh. And now you have chosen Geneva for an advance post; less, it may be, for recruits than for its splendid strategic position, it being a high radiating center of Light, Learning, and Liberty.

"And you have come here, not only to teach, but to learn.

"Behold her temples of science at the foot of her grand cathedral!—for here, thank God! science and religion are wedded in holy union. And to the doors of these temples of learning flock the youth of all nations and all religions: young men and young women; for Geneva gives to the children of other lands what it gives to its own native-born sons and daughters, what it gives to you, ladies, a sincere and affectionate welcome.

"And also give you welcome, the fair, blue waters of Leman, gushing from the heart of the Swiss Mountains—reflecting, alike, the blue firmament, sunlight and storm-cloud, as does the genius of this happy land reflect the march of human events, carrying out into the great sea of humanity something of its own, for the welfare, peace, and progress of all nations. And, as we believe, that in spite of the lust of empire, the future is for smaller states, in federation (as in our beloved America, composed of all races and religions under the sun!) and hearts must follow, no! they must take the lead! So this little democracy of Geneva was founded, as was the Greater Republic of the other hemisphere, by valiant, believing foreigners, who esteemed conscience of greater worth than home or native land. And we believe that this commonwealth founded by stalwart Christians, exiled from their homes, is chosen by the Supreme Ruler of nations to stand for an example of higher civilization in larger states—and a model for the future Universal Federation. And you, Christian women of the dawn of the twentieth century, are the forerunners of that Federation, as were those other women to announce to the Brotherhood, and to the world, the Risen Humanity in the Man Jesus—the Christ!"

Other welcomes and addresses were given by men and women of Geneva representing various purity and temperance societies.

Mme. Rilliet, the first Geneva lady to put on the white ribbon, spoke in behalf of the Swiss Branch of the "International Union of the Friends of Young Girls," said in her address: "We believe that, could your ideal of total abstinence prevail, there would be fewer girls ruined in body and soul. Then could we realize in our work our glorious Genevese motto: 'After Darkness—Light.'"

Mlle. Merle D'Aubigne spoke enthusiastically in behalf of the "Bands of Hope." "It will please you to hear that in this country also men and women are strong to safeguard the children from the cursed drink. Geneva has, we believe, the honor of having received the first child's pledge of the Continent. Ours is a total abstinence society in the full sense of the word. We have in Switzerland 180 Bands with 8,026 members."

Mme. V. Gautier, president of the Geneva Branch of the Swiss Women's Anti-alcoholic Union, said at the reception: "You do not arrive in Geneva as unknown people; for the past two years our central committee has heard about the present Convention sitting in Geneva thru letters written Miss Agnes Slack. We have become acquained with the manifold and energetic working of the World's W. C. T. U. workers who are spreading like a net over both hemispheres. We have been enabled to realize what thousands and thousands of resolute and united women may do with God's help against all social plagues. All of us in Geneva have in our hearts the same ambition—destruction of the causes which ruin souls and bodies of modern humanity."

The gentlemen spoke in French, M. Budé, the genial host, coming first on the program, with a welcome on behalf, not only of himself but also of Mme. de Budé, the hostess, who is one of the most earnest of the charming, cultivated, intelligent ladies of Geneva:

They said, in part: "In the Epistle to the Hebrews it is written that thru hospitality some have received angels without knowing them. But we, today, to our great privilege, receive in our home, a shining angel, under whose wings you are working—the Angel of Temperance. Welcome to Switzerland, to Geneva. Your faith will strengthen ours; your counsels will instruct us; and when you leave us to go over the seas, back to your homes, do not forget our old city which had the honor to receive you. Once more welcome!"

After the second day's session another reception was given us in the "Palais Eynard," a private palace one hundred years old recently purchased by the city government and used for public social functions. This palace was placed at the disposal of the "Union des Femmes," under whose auspices we were royally entertained. The president, Mme. Cheponnaire, made a brief, beautiful address in English, presenting Mrs. Stevens with lovely flowers, our vice-president responding eloquently and with much feeling to the sincere welcome, as she did the day before on the veranda of the Budé residence.

Anna Gordon presented Mme. Cheponnaire with a gavel made from a cherry tree in the grounds of Frances Willard's home at Evanston, Ill. Tied around it was a broad bow of white ribbon, and Miss Gordon said she believed that the beloved founder of our World's W. C. T. U. was rejoicing with us in this new fellowship of effort on behalf of tempted humanity and hoped when the president called her meetings to order with the gentle tap of the gavel, it would be a sweet reminder of Frances Willard's beautiful life and work.

The Swiss people are radiantly responsive. Many of them have attended all the sessions day and evening, and the leaders were presented to the Convention. We have made it a business to become acquainted with one another and between the sessions many delegates have been invited to partake of the dejeuner served in the aristocratic homes of the old part of the town, formerly the palaces of the nobility. Laughable mistakes have occurred because most of us have forgotten the French we learned in our youth, and we have been duly humbled by hearing the hostesses use our mother tongue correctly. The names of our workers are, however, new to them. Mme. Norville and Mme. de Loriol "quarreled one long minute," as the latter said, because each claimed to have had as a guest at dejeuner a delegate by the name of Mrs. Hunt. Peace was restored when a bystander explained that both were right, for there were two of that name; Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, of Boston, and Mrs. Augusta Hunt, of Portland, Maine, who had the honor of entertaining Lady Henry Somerset at the last annual convention.

Each morning conferences on purity were led by Mrs. Bullock, who represented Dr. Mary Wood Allen. She was assisted by the superintendent of that department in the B. W. T. A., Mrs. Atkey. Mrs. Mary H. Hunt's conferences on scientific temperance instruction held at the same hour were also full. Miss Cameron had most interesting conferences with the young women, and Miss Anna Gordon, assisted by Miss Tinling, with the leaders of the L. T. L.

Miss Mary Gorham, of England, in the absence of Miss Greenwood, had charge of the Devotional Day and the devotional meetings of the Convention and herself gave some most helpful Bible readings.

Miss Christine Tinling was untiring in her efforts to assist the World's officers. She is one who can do the humblest service and crown it with an excellent speech.

The people of Geneva were deeply touched and impressed with the Memorial service. The Convention reverently stood while the names of our promoted comrades and friends were read. The white silk star-spangled banner that rested on the casket containing the form of our beloved leader, Frances Willard, was placed on the platform. Mrs. Stevenson led in prayer, and Sarah Monroe Hall sang most sympathetically the beautiful song "Face to Face."

The election, the last morning, resulted in an overwhelming vote for Lady Henry Somerset for president, Mrs. Stevens, vice-president, Miss Slack and Miss Anna Gordon for secretaries, and Mrs. Sanderson for treasurer. Cablegrams of hearty congratulations were sent Lady Henry and Mrs. Stevens' husband and daughter.

In appreciation of her bravery in attending the Convention and of her efficient work in preparing for it, Miss Slack was presented with beautiful white flowers.

The mass meetings in the evening have been of great interest and well attended, especially when "one hundred women made one hundred speeches in one hundred minutes," as Miss Willard once said, and sagely concluded that men would think "woman was made out of the jaw bone of Adam." Your correspondent had made her little speech in the afternoon when she was introduced with her two sisters, Anna and Alice (Mrs. Gulick of Spain), so she had the pleasure of witnessing from the floor the brilliant spectacle that the spacious platform presented.

Mrs. Stevens was happy in her presiding. It was a real treat. Your correspondent was proud she was a woman. Nearly two hundred delegates filled the platform dressed in their most becoming attire and got off one after another sparkling, appropriate little speeches that kept the great audience in a constant state of applause. Miss Anna Gordon touched the bell at the end of a minute. It was a most interesting study of human nature—that of the women people! Some in dignified composure utterly disregarded the warning signal until Mrs. Stevens arose; others stopped short in a manner that amused the audience. Many countries were represented on the floor as well as on the platform, and each one heard in his own tongue the gospel for which the white ribbon stands. There were minute speeches in French, English, Swedish and Norwegian. Mrs. Mary G. Stuckenberg, recently so greatly bereaved, also spoke in German. Mrs. Stevenson and Miss Slack selected the speakers, bringing them forward rapidly one after another, so that not a moment was lost. One of the most dignified and representative of the English delegates caused a burst of laughter, for when she found herself facing the audience she was so utterly overwhelmed with the impossibility of telling all that was in her heart, that she turned to Mrs. Stevens and exclaimed, "How can I ever do it in a minute!"

In the front of the platform were the delegates who were arrayed in the bright costumes of their countries: Olifia Johannsdottir of Iceland, who has been so greatly enjoyed. Franken Jelstrup of Norway, and Miss Olive Malrery, of India, the young and rarely gifted reciter and writer who will soon go to the United States for a professional tour. She is a Y, and has added much to the enjoyment of our meetings. When her name was called she gracefully presented to Mrs. Stevens $25, the proceeds of a recital that she had given that afternoon. Mrs. Harrison Lee, of Australasia, a sweet-spirited and gifted lecturer, wore a white silk dress, over which was a broad blue sash bearing the inscription "Advance Australia. One people, one destiny." The skirt was uniquely decorated in front with an artistic grouping in water colors of the typical products and emblems of that country, tied with the white ribbon. India was well represented by its energetic organizer, Miss Dunhill, who pleaded for help. "Three hundred million people in all and 80,000,000 taken to drink; new liquor shops being opened in large numbers under British rule. In the central provinces the increase in the excise revenue is fifteen per cent."

Fru Helenius, of Finland, could not leave home but sent this message: "I am sitting here having the crying ready, in my trouble that I cannot go to Geneva." Sweden was represented by its president, Frau Wretlind, of Stockholm, who was accompanied by her young daughter, Miss Schroeder, vice-president, and Miss Rogberg. Mrs. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, who has been for a year in Sweden, speaks in the highest praise of the work of these sisters. We regretted Mrs. Gordon's inability to be present.

Frau Hoffman of Germany, gifted and gracious, has done splendid service, and was of great help to Mrs. Mary H. Hunt in opening the way for a strong scientific temperance instruction law in the schools

Chapter XVIII.

SINCE no one was drowned, or even seriously injured, the pit accident quickly assumed the aspect of a blessing in disguise. Between reporters, interviewers, and interested strangers, no "gaffer," however prosy, lacked a hearing in those days. Nor were the "gaffers" left to do all the talking. On fine afternoons, when one or another of the pits was "playing," long rows of miners might have been seen sitting upon the blackened pathways, with their backs propped against such walls as stood advantageously with regard to the high road, holding themselves in readiness to tell the tale, over and over again, for the benefit of new-comers. Not that these self-respecting men volunteered any information whatsoever. On the contrary, on the approach of a stranger, the bearing of each was adjusted to the expression of a fine reticence; yet notwithstanding the gruffness of their replies, and their provoking parsimony in the matter of detail, they loved to have the story wrenched from them bit by bit. Sam came in for his meed of admiration, cautiously expressed, as became the young miner's mates, but the plucky parson, who had beaten some of them on their own ground, had their unstinted, if laconic, praise. When Dr. Mann chanced to drive past he was eyed with a sort of wistful surliness that almost compelled him to draw rein and give the latest news of his patient. If such news chanced to be less favorable than usual the general dissatisfaction found vent, as he drove away, in outspoken doubts of his skill. There were those who, from the first, had been loud in their demands for "Doctor's Advice;" and these never ceased to grumble until the day when Hugh came among them again, pale and with bandaged head, but manifestly on the way to complete recovery. The occasion of that first appearance was the thanksgiving service to which the miners flocked, almost to a man, crowding out the regular members of the congregation. Even Tummas Windle was there. Of late his rheumatism had become more than a mere excuse for non-attendance at church, but he had no idea of allowing it to hinder his presence there to-night. By the exercise of a little diplomacy he obtained, from a charitable lady in the neighboring village, the loan of a wheel-chair, and with his usual astuteness obtained it early in the day. In this chair, for hours before the time appointed for the service, he perambulated the parish on the watch for inquisitive strangers, so great was his fear lest the tale of Pittsmoor's crowning glory should suffer in less competent hands.

It was Dr. Mann who carried the report of his day's "outing" to the Vicarage.

"But who can he have persuaded to wheel him about all day?" said Rose, laughing.

"Oh, the kids take it in turn for the privilege of listening to his yarns. All not on actual duty are kept at a distance by means of a knotty old stick. 'No work, no pay' is Tummas' maxim."

Visitors to the village were still fairly numerous, and it was with a sense of public duty adequately performed that Tummas finished his day in church. Hugh was already there, not to-day as an officiating minister, but as a humble worshiper coming to give thanks, with Sellers and Sam Widgery. The three sat together in a front seat, objects of keen and sympathetic, if discriminating, regard. Almost at the last moment, the disappointed crowd outside, for whom there was not even standing-room within, had a compensating sensation. For down the middle of the grimy village street, in the waning light, stumped Bet Colson, in clogs and short black petticoat, stolidly smoking her beloved pipe. Up the narrow churchyard path, thru rows of scandalized church-goers, she made her way, only removing the pipe from her lips at the church door.

"Nay, mother, I doubt there isn't room inside," said the sexton, in a conciliatory way, for no man cared to risk a conflict with Bet Colson.

"Stand ye to one side. I'm goin' in," said Bet truculently.

Promptly the sexton obeyed, and by the help of squared elbows, and the astonishment caused by her appearance, Bet cleared a way for herself well up the crowded aisle. Then Enoch espied her, and finding not one seat vacant, piloted her up the church to the front pew, in which Hugh was seated.

"Can ye mak' room for her? There's nobbut those two seats for the Vicarage leddies, and it's your doin', I'm thinkin,' that she's here," he whispered, with the grim humor that showed how real was his delight at the unprecedented occurrence.

Hugh's surprise and pleasure were at least as great.

With a short nod, Bet took her seat and looked about her manfully. Doubtless her demeanor as a worshiper left much to be desired, but a signal victory had been gained since, by her own free will, she was there at all. Hugh could only hope that the short laugh which ended her deliberate survey of the vicar's delicate figure, as he stood in the reading desk, had escaped general notice.

The short and simple service was marked by quite exceptional fervor, and when it was over, Mr. Boyd went into the pulpit and gave out his text:

"In the image of God made He him."

It was not the kind of text that had been expected, as doubtless he knew, but a light dawned even upon Enoch's exasperated face when the preacher found, in this statement, one strong reason for the exceeding preciousness of human life. But, after all, it was not the preciousness of human life of which he wished to speak. They had realized that for themselves, in those hours of anxiety and tension at the pit's mouth. Each man, woman and child, in some measure, had realized it, altho that realization had found its highest expression in the heroism of those two who had gone willingly into the jaws of death to save the life of another man.

"Yet I venture to say that neither to Hugh Brotherton nor to Samuel Widgery has it once occurred that thru their human nature there shone forth that day the image of God. Nor did that image shine thru their human nature alone. Is there one among us who does not feel the better for what those two men, representing the manhood of us all, did in our stead? I venture to say there is not one, for we too were made in the image of God; and overlaid with earth as that image may be, we have yet that within us that thrills responsive to the doing of a Godlike deed. Remember that and take courage, you who have been losing hope of yourself, or of some other man. Do not despair; in the image of God made He him—and you."

That was the gist of the short address to which the crowded congregation listened with mixed sensations, but none with more emotion than Hugh Brotherton.

When he arose from his knees after the benediction, Bet Colson was waiting to nod her farewell.

"Bet, how glad I am to see you here! I do hope—"

"Haud yer jaw!" growled Bet. "I coomed to return thanks wi' the rest on ye, so let be. I winna grovel."

Without another word she made defiantly for the door, and Hugh was instantly surrounded by admirers anxious to shake his hand. He got away from them at last, and in the vestry was greeted with quiet sympathy by Mrs. Langley, whose face bore traces of recent tears, and by Dr. Mann, who advised him to go home at once, and to bed as early as might be. Sellers, who smelt of beer, and was disposed to be maudlin, was dismissed with an admonition; but after inviting Mrs. Langley and the doctor home to supper, Mrs. Boyd commanded Hugh to bring Sam as well.

Rumors of a proposed public meeting and testimonial were already rife, and to-night Mr. Boyd took the opportunity of sounding the heroes of the occasion as to their own views of the question. Both proved to be strongly opposed to a demonstration of any description.

"If there's going to be any more fuss I shall bolt, and have done with it," said Hugh resolutely, and Sam added that if it was to come to that, it would drive him back to drink sooner than anything.

"I couldn't fashion to face it, sir; I couldn't nohow. What I done, I done because I couldn't help it; but everyone knows what I am, and it would be downright riduc'lous to be givin' of testimonials to me."

"Or to me," added Hugh, with an emphasis that caused Sam to glance swiftly at him; "and the long and short of it is that all we ask is to be let alone; isn't it Sam?"

"That's about it, sir."

"Besides, there were several who went down before us, only they didn't happen to have our luck in bringing Billy up," added Hugh.

"We are not so ungrateful as to forget them, but we must remember that you two persevered in the face of difficulties that turned them back."

"Mr. Brotherton did," interposed Sam. "My word, but I'd have turned back and all, if it hadn't been for him!"

"And I'd have turned back 'and all' if it hadn't been for something else not a bit more creditable," said Hugh, causing Sam once more to regard him quietly. "So we are all pretty much of a muchness, you see."

"Well, my frineds, you have my sympathy. Nevertheless, we are all more or less bent on doing something. Now, what would you both say if we decided on doing something for the parish, as a memorial of the rescue, instead of doing anything for you? For instance, suppose we collected enough to start a young men's club, with reading-room, gymnasium, and so on, but with no temptation to drink?"

"Of course, it might not be feasible. A good deal depends upon the expense involved and the amount subscribed, but if we contented ourselves with beginning in a small way, there are those two cottages and the old barn behind Pearson's Fold that might, I think, be turned to good account."

Within ten minutes, to the amusement of the whole party, Hugh's imagination had turned those cottages and that barn into a completely equipped club, with rooms for a resident warden, and for a steady, reliable couple as caretakers. He said so with his eyes on Sam, who blushed furiously. From that moment it seemed that the proposal was eminently acceptable to both young men.

"Probably the eye of faith sees one-half of a steady reliable couple in Sam Widgery; but who is the other half?" asked the vicar suavely.

"Mary Ann Mathers. She has promised to have him if he shows that he can keep clear of the drink." said Hugh, with his eyes inadvertently fixed on Rose.

"I thought as much. Well, that will be for time to show," remarked Mr. Boyd. "Meanwhile, if, as I suspect, you intend offering yourself as warden, I advise you first count the cost. The club would, I suppose, be open every week-night, and I doubt whether you would have a moment's peace until closing time, which could not be earlier than eleven."

"I should be prepared for that," said Hugh.

"It strikes me as being a capital idea," said Dr. Mann, expressing an opinion for the first time.

"And an unselfish one," added Mrs. Langley quietly.

"Oh, I don't know about that! In some ways it would be better for me than living alone."

"We are, perhaps, a little too previous; but what about Mrs Foote?" asked Mr. Boyd.

Hugh laughed.

"I was going ahead pretty fast, wasn't I? But about Mrs. Foote—didn't I tell you? She and a sister are setting up housekeeping together in Milborough, so, in any case, I shall have to find new rooms."

At a subsequent public meeting the project met with the warmest support of which Pitsmoor was capable. In a large-hearted spirit of benevolence, Enoch and his cronies waived some conscientious objections, and, since it commended itself to Mr. Brotherton, lent a slightly averted countenance to the scheme. Representatives of the colliery proprietors who were present promised financial help, and Mr. Boyd's motion was carried unanimously. Enoch reluctantly abandoned all hope of the comprehensive library of theology on which he had set his heart for Hugh, but he firmly negatived the proposal that the memorial should include an illuminated address to each of Pitsmoor's heroes.

"No," said he firmly, "not with my consent. I never did hold, and I never shall hold, with hangin' up the praises of a mortal man alongside o' the texes that record the praises of his Maker; and where there ar'n't no texes, t'would be a cryin' shame to any man as would hang up his praises instead."

He spoke with his eyes on Hugh, whose textless condition was the one blot upon his character in Enoch's eyes. Finally, the matter was compounded by an agreement that the parish should present to the club handsome photographs of Hugh and Sam, to be hung in the post of honor in the reading-room.

"It strikes me that heroism is even more costly than it looks at first sight," remarked the doctor, with a shrewd shake of the head, as he, Mrs. Langley, and Hugh left the meeting together. "I thank my lucky stars, Brotherton, that you are a hero, and not I. You, I believe, will live up to the reputation you have made, but, sooner or later, I should inevitably come to grief; and thereby create a scandal.

"Don't distress yourself," said Mrs. Langley, laughing. "You will never have to run that risk. There is nothing of the hero about you, Bob."

During the next few weeks it was observed at the Vicarage that a slight constraint had grown up between Brotherton and Rose. Now and again Mrs. Boyd would catch a wistful glance resting upon the girl, but, as a rule, it was noticeable that Hugh limited himself strictly to a somewhat reserved friendliness of manner toward her. Rose remained as sprightly as ever, but her appetite failed unaccountably, and Mrs. Boyd began to wish that Mr. Glyn would graciously signify his intention of returning to his home. It was an understood thing that when that event occurred, Rose would return, too.

Meantime, the property behind Pearson's Fold had been acquired, and its transformation into a club went on apace. Under Mr. Boyd's and Dr. Mann's personal superintendence, a Milborough photographer secured admirably contrasted likenesses of Hugh Brotherton and Sam Widgery with which to adorn the principal room. It was understood that Billy Sellers felt himself to be much aggrieved because his photograph was not added to the other two.

"Wasn't I in t' mooky watter longer than them?" he demanded indignantly. "I tell 'ee there ar'n't no sort o' justice in it."

"Sam," said Hugh, after viewing the photographs, and reading the inscription that (with Enoch's consent) was to be placed beneath, "if you and I don't look out we shall begin to think ourselves somebodies."

"Not me," grinned Sam; "my old man looks well after that. He wants to know what i' wonder I think I done beyond makin' a girt fool o' myself and sp'ilin' a decent suit o' clothes. It seems, as Billy explains every night at t' public, how he could ha' saved hisself his lanes wi' half the fuss."

"Why didn't he?" asked Hugh, laughing.

"Gie 'un a bit o' time, sir," said Sam gravely, "and I don't doubt but it'll come to his mind how he done that, and saved us, too."

of Germany. Mrs. Hunt's most hopeful utterance about the congress at Bremen was in regard to the position that scientists took that alcohol is a poison, even in small quantities. Mrs. Sanderson and Miss Dougall represented Canada, which has so strongly stood for prohibition by its plebiscite. Japan was represented by Mrs. Mitchell; Chile by Mrs. Arms; Natal by Miss McGregor; Madeira Islands by Mrs. Smart; Belgium by Madame Keelhoof; Ireland by Mrs. Richard Booth; Syria by Mrs. A. A. Hawley; France by Mrs. Armfield, and Madagascar by Mlle. Du Common. Nineteen of the fifty countries federated in the World's Union were represented, and we wish it were possible to aggregate the number of miles traveled by the delegates.

The magnitude of such a convention made this occasion one of extraordinary interest. "I wonder how far she came" one could not help thinking. It made those minute speeches seem extremely valuable when one thought, not only of the financial cost, but of the expenditure of time and strength in the thousands of miles traveled.

The World's superintendents that spoke whose names have not already been mentioned were: Mrs. S. L. Oberholtzer, Miss Bleby, Miss Grayson, Mrs. Mitchell and Miss Lile. Mrs. Lile, of London, was introduced as a life member, made so by the payment of $100. Sixty-two of the delegates were from England, thirty-five from the United States, twenty-one from Scotland, eight from Canada, seven each from Sweden and Australia, one from Norway, one from Spain, and one from Cape Colony. There were not minutes enough to go around, so the remaining delegates from Great Britain sang their greeting, all joining with them in the National air. The Americans waving their flags sang no less enthusiastically "My Country 'Tis of Thee" to the same air. It was like an electric spark to the great audience. These friends of a sister republic were at once on their feet and gave us a genuine surprise by singing their stirring national anthem to the same familiar and well-beloved tune. Mrs. Katherine Lente Stevenson, with sincere affection and a graceful speech, presented on behalf of the United States delegates some fine views of Geneva to Mrs. Stevens.

I haven't mentioned the Y's and I must. Amy Swankie-Cameron made an earnest and beautiful plea for more recruits. She had been doing this thruout the Convention at the early morning conferences. Miss Marian Ferguson, of Scotland, who has 1,400 Y's in Glasgow alone, said there were many girls wishing to belong. The only trouble was to provide leaders. What can I say of Sarah Monroe Hall of Maine and her magnificent rendering of the splendid song "Victory?" "Yes, yes, we march, we march to victory." Thruout the Convention Miss Hall's singing was a great inspiration. The delegates rose en masse to adopt the vote of thanks to the people, the press, the choir, the city officials, the hospitable homes, and the indefatigable committee of reception. Clasping hands with one another, and with our Geneva friends who came to the platform, we sang "God be with us till we meet again," closing with the benediction, "The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord make His face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace."

VICTORIA HALL, WHERE THE WORLD'S W. C. T. U. CONVENTION WAS HELD.

We prophesy that the next Convention will be held in Boston, Mrs. Stevenson's invitation being received with marked enthusiasm. The decision is left with the general officers.

Nineteen have put on our white ribbon and paid the membership dues, while many others are with us in spirit and are working for the good of the young people and children. Mme. Rilliet when she joined said, "I want to be out-and-out like you."

Parting Song.

Tune: "Isle of Beauty, Fare Thee Well."

(Written during Convention by Mrs. Hamlin, of Australia.)

Farewell, sisters, we have rallied
  Round the banner that we love;
And have had our souls uplifted
  By the spirit from above!—
As we knelt in consecration
  Felt we not the touch divine?
Now thru us, Lord, on each nation,
  Let they love resplendent shine.

We have heard of noble courage,
  From our Iceland sister fair,
Of their stand against the evil,
  How they need our help and prayer.
Then America, our leader
  In this battle for the Lord,
Tells of warfare, and of triumph
  Which to us great hopes afford.

And our well-beloved old England
  Sends us words of help and cheer
From a heart most loyal and tender,
  That was longing to be here.
Yes, and friends of one now sainted
  Bring to us a fragrance sweet
Of a lofty, pure devotion
  Breathed while sitting at her feet.

Scotland's daughters, too, we welcome
  Land of poet and of sage;
Thou hast taught us how to suffer
  Thru thy sons, in by-gone age.

Then from Ireland, India, Norway,
From Australia's sunny clime,
Echoes of our march of progress
  Herald in a glorious time!

"That glad day" yes' it is coming!
  But if we would see its dawn
Much of patient, loving labor
  Must by one and all be borne.
Fight with all our strength and courage
  'Gainst the curses of our land,
Standing shoulder unto shoulder,
  One compact and dauntless band.

Farewell, City of Geneva,
  We will ever hold thee dear,
For the gracious hearts within thee
  And their words and deeds of cheer.

Geneva, June 11, 1903.

Declaration of Principles.

We believe in the coming of His Kingdom whose service is perfect freedom. We believe in the Gospel of the Golden Rule, and that each man's habits of life should be an example safe and beneficent for every other man.

We thank our Heavenly Father for all the way He has led us as a World's W. C. T. U. and we pledge ourselves to a deeper consecration to Christ's service and to a renewed effort to advance our principles, based on total abstinence, purity and prohibition, and to carry on with enthusiasm and earnestness our departments of work as grouped under the general heads of Organization, Preventive, Evangelistic, Educational, Social and Legal work.

PROHIBITION.

WHEREAS, The liquor traffic in all nations is the great foe of righteousness in the individual, the home, the church, and the state, we reaffirm our belief in the principle of prohibition as the ultimate solution of the liquor problem;

Resolved, That we will not cease our efforts until in all lands law and custom shall unite to overthrow the liquor traffic.

PURITY.

WHEREAS, The purity of national life is dependent upon the purity of individual life;

Resolved, That we believe in an equal standard of purity for men and women, and that standard always the highest.

Resolved, That we are opposed to all state regulation of vice, and shall endeavor to secure in all countries legal protection for the innocent and defenceless and impartial punishment for all offenders.

"The women that publish the tidings are a great host."

Address to the Delegates of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention Assembled in Geneva, June 9-11, 1903.

By Lady Henry Somerset, President.

DEEPLY do I regret that these words must be read by another voice, and that I must send this short address to my dear and trusted friend, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, the president of the W. C. T. U. of the United States and vice-president of our society.

As you meet today on the banks of the beautiful Swiss lake in that little country which has always stood the friend of freedom, the enemy of ill, I would that it had been possible for me to be in your midst, but the older I grow the more I realize that the fulfillment of our wishes is not the truest education for us in this school of a world, and that our Heavenly Father knows what is best for us and for his work. And therefore I accept my enforced absence, owing to ill health, as one of the necessary lessons of life; but altho I cannot meet you I am with you in heart and in spirit. I realize that the conference that you are about to hold is of great importance The temperance question is evolving from theory to practice. Each country has its own battle to fight, and each country must fight that battle with one principle always clear and distinct; namely, that whatever measures may be taken, or whatever provisional legislation is adopted, the eventual outcome of our warfare must be complete victory over the liquor traffic.

As Old as the Race.

The concept of a world-wide society is not difficult to grasp when once we realize how old is the problem with which we are called to deal. It seems that in every nation at every time thruout the history of the world the struggle against the power of alcohol has been realized in some measure, greater or less.

We find on some of the Theban tombs, the date probably before Christ 1587, in the eighteenth to the twentieth dynasties, women figured sitting at the feast drunk, and among the maxims of that date are the following words of wisdom: "Young men especially should avoid this shameful vice, for beer destroys their souls. He that abandons himself to drink is like an oar broken from its fastening, which no longer obeys. He is like a chapel without its god; like a house without bread, in which the wall is wavering and the beam shaking. The people he meets in the street turn away from him, for he throws mud after him, while the police interfere and carry him away to regain his senses in prison."

It would be well if all the clergy and ministers of our modern world remembered the solemn oath which was taken by the Egyptian priests, which is still extant on the hieratic papyri: "Thou knowest that wine is an abomination, and that thou hast taken an oath concerning strong drink that thou wouldst not put liquor into thee."

The Chinese, whose regular chronology and popular historical evidence go back at least 2,400 years before the Christian era—centuries before civilization reached the West—realized the evil of strong drink. In the reign of one emperor the origin and nature of the evils of intoxicants were so well understood that the use of intoxicating wine was denounced and prohibited, while in other reigns, in order to remove the vice, the vines themselves were uprooted lest such wine should be made, nor has grape wine ever again been introduced among the people. In the year 1100 before Christ the Chinese emperor at the assembly of the states solemnly forbade the use of wine as the cause of almost all the evils that happen upon the earth.

From China we look away to the great range of Hindustan, where the Vedas and the sacred books composed in a language that has been unspoken for 2,000 years strictly enforced abstinence from intoxicating wine.

It is certain that Moses carried from Egypt the sacerdotal doctrines of abstinence, and it is equally likely that the colony of Daneus and the remnant of the Shepherds, took with them a similar doctrine into parts of Asia, Greece and Italy. Homer puts into the mouth of Hector words which correspond in sentiment to those of Solomon, and Herodotus takes great pains to point out how total abstinence in Ethiopia produced longevity. Again, it is Caesar himself who tells of the Suavi, the men most valiant in war and greatest in stature of all the nations of Germany. "They live for the most part," he says, "on milk and flesh. No wine is allowed to be introduced among them, believing that by it men are enervated, made effeminate, and incapable of enduring labor." Even in the old times of the Scandinavian Vikings, Dr. Lee tells us, the wisest of their men pointed out the evil of strong drink. But with the decadence of each nation has come a decrease in sobriety.

Intemperance the Cause of Decadence.

We have only to turn to the writings of the later Greek satirists to know that in the decline of Greece it was their womanhood who began to fall into the sin of drunkenness, and in the decadent days of Rome it was a prevalent vice; and luxury, effeminacy, and drunkenness brought about the fall of the empire.

As early as the eighth century we find systematic attempts made to legislate against strong drink, and Charlemagne forbade stewards or witnesses to appear in court intoxicated, or to sit in judgment unless perfectly sober. Priests were forbidden to offer drinks to penitents, and if any one of his soldiers was found drunk in camp he was restricted to water as a beverage until he admitted the heniousness of his offense and publicly implored forgiveness.

In 1495 a temperance propaganda arose among the Germans and orders of temperance were founded, for German intemperance had become a by-word among the nations. Drunkenness began to diminish in Germany, and today the South Germans as a rule are as sober as the inhabitants of the Mediterranean.

It has often been thought that England owes her character for intemperance to the fact that the Romans, when they conquered Britain, taught the natives the customs that were prevalent in their decadent empire, and we owe even a feature such as the signboards which now hang on public houses to their instructions. There is an old proverb which says "Good wine needs no bush" which must date from those early times, because the bush was the sign which they used for the indication of where drink could be sold. Then came the Danes, who brought with them an unenviable reputation for drunkenness. And I think the whole history of our race is summed up in those words of Shakespeare when he makes Iago say: "Your Dane and your German and your Hollander drink, oh, nothing to your English!" And so Great Britain has obtained her unenviable reputation for inebriety. It is a problem that has been before us for centuries, and altho we are often disheartened and believe that we have made but little progress, we have only to look back upon the state of our country a century and a half ago in order to realize that temperance sentiment has done much for us. It would be difficult, I suppose, to believe the state of the streets of London in 1743. Lord Lansdale gives account, in which he says: "In every part of this great metropolis whoever shall pass along the streets shall find wretchedness stretched upon the pavement, insensible and motionless, and only removed by the charity of passengers from the danger of being crushed or trampled by horses or strangled in the common sewers." And in the same year we find related in one of the newspapers the incident that at a christening in Surrey the nurse was so intoxicated that after she had undressed the child she put it behind a large fire which burnt it to death in a few minutes. She was examined before the magistrates and said that she was quite stupid from drink, so that she took the child for a lump of wood, "on which," history goes on to relate, "she was discharged"!

Then we have the disgraceful scenes in the House of Commons when it was thought of no account that the prominent statesmen should all be the worse for liquor, and legislators should drink all night, and boasted that they were rarely sober, but drank brandy where other men would drink wine. What wonder that such a heritage from the past has brought us the problem with which we are endeavoring to cope today, and one which we would be loath to emphasize were it not for the fact that we believe that the history of England may be a warning to other nations before the terrible evils that the drink has wrought with us are fastened upon them.

There is no question that a wide temperance sentiment has been awakened, and that while we have before us two deadly evils to combat, the intemperance of our people and the political power of the liquor traffic, sentiment is growing which we believe will crystallize into legislation that will eventually give us a sober nation. But not alone in England has the fear of intemperance grown in the minds of those who are real patriots; it is encouraging to note how the government of France is awakening to the danger that is threatening that hitherto sober people.

Public Pronouncements in France.

The following pronouncements were recently posted upon the walls of Paris, issued by the Investigation Council for Promoting the Public Welfare, and now displayed freely thruout the country:

"Alcoholism is the chronic poisoning resulting from the constant use of alcohol, even if this does not produce drunkenness."

"It is an error to say that alcohol is a necessity to the man who has to do hard work, or that it restores strength. The artificial stimulation which it produces soon gives away to exhaustion and nervous depression. Alcohol is good for nobody, but works harm to everybody."

"Alcohol produces the most varied and fatal diseases of the stomach and liver, paralysis, dropsy and madness. It is one of the most frequent causes of tuberculosis."

"Lastly, it aggravates and enhances all acute diseases, typhus, pneumonia, erysipelas. These diseases only attack a sober man in a mild degree, while they quickly do away with the man who drinks alcohol."

"The sins of the parents against the laws of health visit their offspring. If the children survive the first months of their lives, they are threatened with imbecility or epilepsy, or death carries them away a little later by such diseases as meningitis or consumption."

"Alcoholism is one of the most terrible plagues to the individual health, the existence of the home and the prosperity of the nation."

This document was signed by the president of the medical faculty of Paris, by the chairman of the Institute of France, and by the medical director of the Hospital l'Hotel Dieu of Paris, experts who are perfectly aware of the importance of the declaration they are making on the subject of alcoholism and its effects.

No less important is the investigation made by a professor at Bonn University, who traced the posterity from one woman, who for forty years was a thief, a drunkard, and a tramp. She had 834 descendants. He traced 709 of them from youth to old age, and 105 of them were born out of wedlock, 142 were beggars, sixty-four lived on charity, 181 of the women lived disreputable lives, seventy-six were convicts, seven were murderers. The professor calculated that in seventy-five years they had cost the German authorities through prisons and law courts, etc., about £250,000. The Daily Chronicle recording this said that in the case of a tramp in the city workhouse it was estimated he had cost the ratepayer £1,500.

Methods in Other Lands.

Moreover, we cannot overlook the action of the Russian Government in taking the drink monopoly of that country, and in doing all that is possible to provide counter attractions to the drink shops, holding, as they do, that it is not the love of vodka as a rule that leads men to drink, but the dull, leaden monotony of their lives.

The example of Sweden and of Norway is before us. They have strenuously fought with the drink problem during the past half century. The drunkenness of their people was as great, if not greater, than any known in Europe. Having obtained the power to prohibit the sale of drink in the rural districts, 2,000 parishes in Sweden abolished spirit licenses out of the 2,400 into which the country is divided, and in Norway a yet greater result has been obtained.

I am not going to speak of the magnificent efforts made in the United States. You have with you sisters tried and true who will give you the details and the results of their efforts. All I can say is "God bless everyone, everywhere, who stands for the high ideal of the elimination of the drink traffic and the exaltation of the home."

In the older countries we may not be able to take the decisive steps that the younger nations must. The United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, are those to whom our eyes are turned with a great expectancy. In the strength and pride of their youth they ought to be able to destroy the foe with which we in the older countries have been grappling with hands enfeebled by time; but the problem is, as I have tried to show, as old as Humanity. It has been face to face with reformers of all countries and of all ages. What wonder, therefore, that we as a great world-wide society should meet together in order that we may give our testimony to the value of past reform, and pledge ourselves to yet more zeal in future work? The methods for the old countries and the new must differ, but the aim must be one. It is impossible in speaking to an audience composed of many nationalities to enter into the details of why, in England for instance, we have not only to give the people the power to banish the liquor shops if they will to do so, but owing to the deficient education from which we are suffering, we have also to face the best methods for dealing with the liquor shops that must necessarily exist until a rising generatio shall realize the master method for dealing with the evil.

It has often been said that temperance work is disheartening. To advocate any reform of an evil almost inherent in the human race must undoubtedly be hard; but I think that there are two virtues which are needed above all others, hope and humility; hope for all that God can accomplish thru us, humility to make us realize that we are called to do the little things that lie at our door; not to advocate only the great reforms on platforms or in conferences, but to make the place where we live better—our town, our village, our people—and to remember above all, that however much the political forces, the power of money, the influence of custom may be against us, we have behind us the power of God himself.

Woman's Struggle for the Home.

We are banded together as a great body of women for the purification of the home. It is Ruskin who has said that "home is always around a woman. The stars only may be over her head, the glow-worm in the night-cold grass may be the only fire at her feet, but home is yet wherever she is, and for a noble woman it stretches far around her, better than ceiled with cedar, or painted with vermilion, shedding its quiet light afar for these who else were homeless."

And here I think is the summing up of the work of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in the words of its great founder, Frances Willard, words that are graven upon her earthly resting place, words that are the very basis of our world-wide bond: "To make the world wider for woman and more home-like for humanity." There are many working in our midst to whom home, as a family hearth, is now only a memory. They are determined that the wide world shall be purified of that which must be the essential enemy of home, and that the true nature of home, which is a place of peace and of shelter from injury, shall be preserved by them. They are content to give up their own ease and joy and pleasure in order to bring this about for men and women everywhere. And who can say how great will be their reward? Moreover, they are prepared to make this great sacrifice because at this hour we cannot forget the terrible feature of our time, the increase of drunkenness among women. It is the menace of civilization, and thru this increasing evil there comes the suffering of the children everywhere.

In Great Britain the effect of alcohol on our child life is the saddest feature of our country. A child is always a pathetic figure, helpless and confiding, and at this very hour, as I pass in and out of the main streets of the poorer parts of London, as I see the children white and wan, playing in the dusty alleys because they have no home to which to go, nothing but a wretched room where reign squalor and dirt; as I hear the brutal oaths that greet them from the lips of mothers who return from the drink shops besotted and intoxicated; as I watch their sufferings in summer when they droop like flowers for want of fresh and wholesome air; as I see them perishing with cold in the winter, shivering on the snowy doorsteps, going to their school underfed, ill-clad, I realize hour by hour how it is children who are smitten by the drink traffic.

What wonder, then, that women should be aroused? What wonder that they should band themselves together, a great army everywhere, to do battle with the greatest foe that the home knows? And to-day I know that you will pledge yourselves afresh to gain in every nation freedom from the tyranny of the liquor traffic, and as you look out upon the snow-capped mountains and the green valleys of that beautiful Swiss land, you will learn a new lesson from the history of that heroic race. You will remember how, beneath the glaciers of Zermatt and on the slopes of the Valois, the peasants years ago were the vassals of the great Bishopric of Sion, but when the ledges of rock were broken by the Lake of Lucerne and the purifying winds of the north arrested forever the growth of the vine, the peasants adopted an entirely pastoral life, and a simple shepherd dynasty arose, the nucleus of a people who were to be forever free. They arose against the tyranny of the House of Hapsburg, and in the struggle by Lake Egeri they stood out among the nations of Europe, strong in the cause of justice and freedom. This little shepherd band sustained the excommunication of the abbots, but equally resisted the unjust appression of Zurich when they refused to send them the due supplies of salt, and resolved to purchase by their self-denial the remission of unjust taxation and obtain complete freedom from the signorial claims of the Baron of Thurm. In order to do this the inhabitants of the valley of Frutigen ate no meat for seven years, so as to free themselves and their descendants forever.

May we not take the consistency and simplicity of this peaceful people as a lesson for us who desire by our words, by our work, and by our example, to free the world from the heaviest tax that is made upon its happiness and its civilization?

And as I write these words I pray that each woman may reconsecrate herself during this Conference, and go forward, not in her strength alone, but realizing that she has around her and about her the power of the Highest. Let that power overshadow us. This world is but a preparation surely for wider work. There are those whose names we honor and whose memories we cherish, who, we believe, have learned so well their lessons here that they are entrusted to do and to teach in those wider realms beyond; and as the name of Frances Willard is indissolubly bound up with this world-wide society of women, so I say to-day let her motto be ours, everywhere at all times let us work and live in the spirit of it, "Womanliness first and afterwards what you will;" for gentleness is our best strength, and love our most forceful weapon, and pity our most prized possession, and our creed the command of Christ to love our brethren everywhere.

WHY?

A Query from Miss E. W. Greenwood, Evangelistic Superintendent.

ON Sabbath morning, May 31, in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, Dr. Hillis, preaching upon the "Opportunities of the American Pulpit," said: "Much is being written about the decline of the number of students for the ministry. For example, one of our historic Congregational institutions that formerly had a hundred such students now numbers fifteen, and in several others the falling off is not less striking. From certain Western states comes the call for pastors, and the statement that there are several hundred vacant pulpits in the Mississippi Valley. The time was when out of every hundred graduated at Yale College twenty-five entered the ministry. Now perhaps two or three out of one hundred." Dr. Hillis named among other reasons for this decline "the difficulties of preaching which alarm men." "Witness," he said, "the nervous breakdown of Robertson at thirty-seven, and Channing at forty, and Bushnell at forty-eight, and the death of Brooks and Spurgeon at fifty-seven."

Yet not a few highly educated, spiritual, gifted women evangelists, whose labors have been owned of God for many years, and welcomed by a multitude of Christians helped and souls saved, find the doors of many churches closed against them, especially in the East. Tho called of God and sealed by the Spirit, welcomed by the people, and fitted to instruct the head and warm the heart, they lack the open door of a large opportunity.

Why, we ask, should there be several hundred vacant pulpits in the West or elsewhere? Why should men always give the baccalaureate sermon, even in women's colleges? Why should cultured spiritual women lack opportunity when the churches need help and the truth needs woman's point of view as well as man's? Are some ministers jealous of woman's ministry; afraid of her gifts of brain and heart? One eminent pastor recently expressed his feeling very frankly when urged to invite a prominent woman evangelist for a second time to his pulpit. "No!" he exclaimed; "I will not invite to my pulpit a woman who preaches more effectively than I do." Does this pastor ever introduce to his people a man who excels him in pulpit power, or is he a none-such?

In marked contrast were the words of an Episcopal rector in whose church one of our women recently gave a series of lectures. At the close he said to his people and to her: "Never have I heard the gospel preached more purely; in simplicity, yet with rare intellectual and spiritual power, while the personality and magnetism of the speaker have been an added influence for good."

A second query arises from another recent experience. The New York State Congregational Association assembled in Brooklyn a few days ago. The temperance committee reported among its resolutions one endorsing the W. C. T. U., another in favor of scientific temperance instruction, and a third favoring the temperance Sunday. Each of these was promptly laid upon the table in spite of the earnest protest of the chairman of the committee, who spoke eloquently of "our thirty years of blessed work."

Why? we again ask. Is it because some of our women have frequently and very unwisely introduced party politics in the pulpit on the Sabbath day? One minister in New York state, a true friend of ours, so stated, saying "he was tired of giving his pulpit to the W. C. T. U. on a Sunday evening and have a speaker introduced who would antagonize two-thirds of his people by telling them they could not be Christians unless Prohibitionists; make a political rather than a temperance or gospel address, and then go off with the collection, leaving him to face an irate board of trustees and make peace with the people as best he could."

Why? Is it because some unions have been too ready to ask the pulpit for women unknown, untried, or of doubtful disputation, who would speak for the collection but not to edification, until pastors and people have become alienated? Where only our tested speakers of reputation are invited, especially on the Sabbath, union services are still possible, and pastors and people welcome with enthusiasm the representatives of the W. C. T. U. Or is the trouble in the worldliness of the church, increase of church expense because of large salaries, famous singers and a luxurious church life? We leave these queries with our readers.

A letter just received from Colorado's evangelistic superintendent says: "The Lord is greatly blessing this department this year. While last year only a little over fifty per cent of the unions had evangelistic superintendents, now fully ninety-five per cent have them. The spirituality of the unions is deepening. All seem to realize as never before that our help must come from God."

Organization is well; education absolutely necessary; each department most important; but unless the Spirit is in the wheels the great organization is but a human machine and the results are not eternal.

Women Inspectors Abroad. Immediately after women inspectors were appointed to meet steamers at the port of New York, a letter was sent by Mrs. Stevens and Mrs. Fry, president and corresponding secretary, on behalf of the National W. C. T. U., to our United States consuls in the leading civilized countries of the world. They were asked to interest the governments to which they are accredited in a similar protection which should include all outgoing, as well as incoming, women and girls. Encouraging replies have been received. While at Geneva, Mrs. Stevens and Miss Gordon called upon the United States Consul at that place and found him a cordial believer in the plan inaugurated in this country thru the representation made to President Roosevelt by Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis acting for the National W. C. T. U. Lately we hear that Great Britain already has 300 women inspectors officially appointed to meet all incoming steamers and trains. The continuance of our United States women inspectors is now under consideration by Mr. Cortelyou, who took charge of the Department of Immigration, July 1, and we are believing that they will be continued. The Russian government has already a very thoro system of examination for all women entering or leaving the country and it is very difficult for anyone to evade the strict regulations governing such cases. Anyone found to be guilty in this respect is severely punished by a long imprisonment and heavy fines.

"Liquor Problem" Week at Chautauqua. White ribboners who expect to spend some time at Chautauqua, N. Y., will be glad to know that Aug. 3-8, inclusive, is Liquor Problem Week. Addresses and conferences are to be given on such subjects as: "The Physiological Effect of Alcohol," "The Saloon and the World of Graft," "Legislative Aspects of the Liquor Problem," "Stimulants Among Primitive Peoples," "The Salvation Army and the Liquor Problem," "The Anti-Saloon League and the Liquor Problem," "The Prohibition Movement," "The W. C. T. U. and the Liquor Problem." Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens will speak for the W. C. T. U. in the Auditorium Aug. 4, at 4 p. m. The topics presented before the Woman's Club, at 9 a. m. each morning of the Liquor Problem Week, will be: "Recent Phases of Reform Work," "The Boy Problem," "Woman's Work for Temperance in Foreign Lands," "Loyal Temperance Legion Work." Mrs. Unruh, Mrs. Fry, and Mrs. Bullock, and, it is hoped, Mrs. Stevens and Miss Gordon will be among the speakers. It is believed that this occasion will call together vast numbers of temperance workers and earnest inquirers.

World's Report. The complete report of the World's W. C. T. U., will be ready for delivery when orders are received. Address either of the secretaries, Miss Anna Gordon, Evanston, Ill.; or Miss Agnes Slack, Ripley, Derbyshire, England. Price, postpaid, 30 cents or 1*s* 3*d*. This report will be of more than the usual interest, as it is illustrated by views of Geneva, photographs of leading workers, etc.

A Practical Suggestion Mrs. Alice G. Young, of Downs, Kan., editor of "Our Messenger," suggests that the fall dues (50 cents each) of the fifteen members of Armourdale and any other flood-swept unions shall be paid by other white ribboners who were not in the devastated district. Thus the "tie that binds" will not allow our sisters to be counted out even once.

Switzerland Organized. A card from Miss Anna Gordon announces the organization of the National W. C. T. U., of Switzerland, at Geneva, June 15, with Mlle. L. E. Rilliet as President. Mrs. Stevens and Miss Gordon went to London the same day, where they were guests of Lady Henry Somerset until June 27, when they sailed for home.

A Good Record. Mrs. M. C. Daub, of Helena, Ohio, in renewing her annual subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL says: "I have not missed a number since June, 1891." A good record truly, of loyal support on one side and faithful service on the other.

Red Letter Day.

July 21, Loyal Temperance Legion Day.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF MISS ANNA GORDON.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR CO-LABORERS:—I often wish I could give you the encouraging items which come to National headquarters, but refrain for fear of trespassing on other departments of the paper. Here is one that was not included in a late printed report of the colored Y's of North Carolina. Miss Lynch writes me that the Y's of Livingstone College, where she is one of the teachers, number exactly one hundred, for which number they have just paid dues. This has been their ambition. I am wondering what other Y's can make as good a record as this.

I would very much like to have some of the union send me copies of their annual programs. I have given away all I had and still requests come from new unions who wish to profit by what others have done.

A late letter from our National evangelist, Miss Anna Downey, reports that she is not in the hospital, as we previously supposed, but at the home of a very dear relative; that she is very much better and encouraged to believe that she will be able to resume work in the fall.

A letter from Mrs. Henry, wife of Dr. J. Q. A. Henry, who has for some time been doing temperance work in London, has much to say about the visit of our white ribboners in London. Mrs. Henry incidentally remarks that she thinks the Peace department will be glad to see among other things in the Hotel de Ville, Geneva, a ploughshare made out of swords used in battle, so the Scriptures have been at least partially fulfilled in Geneva.

Some time ago THE UNION SIGNAL had something to say about the public placards posted in Paris concerning the nature and effects of alcohol. We have hoped to give an exact copy of these findings of scientific investigators on this subject and have had a plan to use the material in some such way in this country. Mrs. Henry expected to enclose a translation but did not have it at hand. She speaks of the placards being fully five feet long, printed in large, clear type, so that they could easily be read from the top of a bus, and that some of them are printed in red and blue and are all made very attractive. She says they are displayed everywhere, on public buildings, churches, police stations, billboards and unoccupied houses, and, she was told, even in saloons. You understand these are printed and posted by order of the government that the people may be awakened to the danger which comes to them thru the use of intoxicating liquors. If we could once get something of the kind in this country I am sure all white ribboners might be as successful as Mrs. Henry was in calling people together to read them. She simply took out her pencil and notebook and immediately a crowd assembled to see what so interested her. She also says she understands a temperance society of England is asking permission of the government to placard London with a similar warning and America might do well to do the same thing. Dr. Henry's work for total abstinence in England has been greatly blessed, not only in securing many pledge-signers but in the quickening of the Christian conscience on this subject.

Mr. T. W. Glover, a temperance missionary from New Zealand and New South Wales, of whom we have had something to say in this column heretofore and who is now in Canada, reports that strikes have been abolished in New Zealand, the disputes being settled by compulsory arbitration, the court consisting of one representative elected by the labor unions, one by the employers, and a supreme court judge. In New Zealand, according to Mr. Glover, their local option law provides for a vote at each parliamentary election on the continuance, the reduction, or prohibition of liquor. A bare majority carries the reduction, which means taking away twenty per cent of the licenses; a three-fifths majority gives prohibition. All electors can vote on two of these propositions.

Of woman's suffrage he says: "Woman's suffrage has now been in existence ten years, and all the terrible things prophesied as a result have been found untruthful altogether. At the first election after woman's suffrage had been granted every publicly known immoral man was swept out of the legislative assembly. At political meetings now there is usually an equal number of ladies and gentlemen alike interested; and as New Zealanders have not ceased to be gentlemen there is no disorder in the presence of ladies. Woman's suffrage has been found so successful and so great a help, especially in social reform, that it has now been adopted thruout the Australian commonwealth."

June 17 found me back in the office after my Kentucky and Ohio trip. The next thing that takes me away from headquarters is the work at Chautauqua N. Y., when our temperance topics are presented, of which I will have more to say in my next notes. Mrs. Stevens and Miss Gordon expected to sail June 20, and to be ready to resume work in this country July 1. They had an unusually smooth voyage going and we are hoping and praying for as much good fortune on the return trip.

We are all glad to know that when England was obliged to give up Lady Henry Somerset as president of the B. W. T. A. Lady Carlisle, a staunch temperance woman, was found to succeed to the presidency. You have of course noted that all of the World's W. C. T. U. officers were re-elected, including Lady Henry Somerset as president.

I hope all of you read the paragraph in THE UNION SIGNAL of June 25 asking local and state officers to use their best endeavors to have telegrams and letters sent to the President of the United States at once asking him to use his utmost power against the opium monopoly bill pending in Manila. It was to have been acted upon June 15, but because of pressure brought to bear action was postponed. It is, however, necessary that whatever is done shall be done quickly. We do not believe this bill will be passed if the people speak their minds and speak them quickly. If you have not acted and have not seen that the bill is disposed of take it for granted that it is not too late when you read these words, and send in protests to the President and get as many voters as possible to do the same. Yours cordially,

SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Reports to the World's Convention.

From Our World's Secretary.

(This brief extract from Miss Slack's report to the Geneva Convention, is all that has reached us at this time.—Ed.)

I SEE constantly increasing possibilities for the W. C. T. U. in every direction. It is our duty to keep well abreast of every movement that is evolved from our times that tends in any way towards the uplift of mankind, whether it be along physical, mental or spiritual lines, but as I see it, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the fulcrum centre that has given leverage to every other woman's movement of any recognized importance in almost every country outside Great Britain. In making this assertion I should perhaps reserve England, and maybe a few other places of Europe about which I am not very well informed, but taking the rest of this great, round world, I know my statement to be well borne out by facts. The W. C. T. U. has trained the women who are for the main part at the front to-day, and, what is equally important, it did the pioneer work of reducing to a rational classification the great mass of work needing to be done, so that effort may be given with telling effect along clearly defined lines and not wasted by being spent in a haphazard fashion.

I often revert to the feeble beginnings made by our women along these very lines, when one by one the various departments of our work were evolved as needful specialties which tended towards the consummation of the great end we hold in view. As we draw nearer and nearer to that end, and when those coming after us will pause for a glance backward to see "how it all happened," our true relation to the whole will then assume its proper place and proportion, but not till then. May God keep us steady and true to the trust of our high calling!

Superintendents.

Oratorical Medal Contests

THERE has been a great advancement in this department during the last three years, and much more interest is being daily manifested, not only by members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, but church organizations, colleges, public schools, etc. In the United States nearly eleven thousand contests have been held. While the greatest number of these have been silver medal contests, many of the contestants are finishing the course and seventy-two diamond contests have been held, and hundreds of the gold and grand gold. Besides these, several grand diamond contests have been given. A contest is nearly always a feature of a state convention and this year one (a grand diamond) will be held at our National Convention. The educational feature is the prominent one, but we have found that the admission fee usually charged has helped very materially in carrying on the work of the local union. Many thousands of dollars have gone directly into the local treasury. Contests have been held in Alaska, Cuba and the Philippines.

Miss Smart is having some of the recitations in our books translated into Japanese and will introduce this work into the schools in Japan.

The Dominion of Canada has no superintendent, but every province has held contests from Nova Scotia to British Columbia. Manitoba has a very earnest superintendent, Mrs. P. E. Rullar, of Winnipeg. Mrs. Addie N. Fields has charge of this work in Mexico. She has had one selection translated and published in book form, and with the assistance of Rev. Mrs. Bassett, of Mexico City, has held a number of fine contests.

One of the best reports received came from Mrs. Florence Perrin Munsell of Rijnor, India, who succeeded Mrs. S. M. Bare, the pioneer of this work in India. Mrs. Munsell gives the credit of the progress made in this department to her predecessor, who was, as she says, "an indefatigable worker who sowed the seed widely and systematically. All but one of the six divisions have an active superintendent and have held successful contests.

The Australasian superintendent, Hannah Heaslip of Wooloongoble, is one of the most energetic and capable superintendents we have in the work. Thoroly aroused as to the great educational advantages that are derived thru this medium, she has worked untiringly to secure superintendents that will help her in introducing the contests into every local union. She has a very enthusiastic helper in Gertrude Penfold of Ventnor Gordon, New South Wales. Miss Heaslip has sent me some of the most interesting programs I have ever received consisting of good music, drills, etc., and we notice she has the co-operation of some of the most influential citizens and officials.

In South Africa, Hilda Geard, Port Elizabeth, has kept steadily at work. Several grand gold medal contests have been held.

My correspondence with these white-ribbon sisters has been very pleasant. I have tried to be helpful to them and they have responded by doing their best, and especially by being prompt in replying to my communications.

Without question contests are one of the most popular and effective educational movements ever inaugurated. They enlist the young, compel the memorizing of temperance sentiments, disseminate a vast amount of information, strike hard blows at the saloon, secure audiences of people who need instruction most without awakening prejudice, develop oratorical ability, furnish an entertainment of high literary merit, and afford a means of revenue. They constitute a new era in elocutionary training. I personally know of those who have determined to make elocution a life work as the result of their discipline in contest work.

I believe the department of Medal Contests will become more and more appreciated as we learn more about the work and the influence it is having upon the youth and on the people who attend.

BABY WEATHER

Little Fellows Don't Like the Hot Days.

Mothers should know exactly what food to give babies in hot weather.

With the broiling-hot days in July and August the mother of a baby is always anxious for the health of her little one and is then particularly careful in feeding. Milk sours quickly and other food is uncertain. Even in spite of caution sickness sometimes creeps in and then the right food is more necessary than ever.

"Our baby, two years old, began in August to have attacks of terrible stomach and bowel trouble. The physician said his digestion was very bad and that if it had been earlier in the summer and hotter weather we would surely have lost him.

"Finally we gave baby Grape-Nuts food, feeding it several times the first day, and the next morning he seemed better and brighter than he had been for many days. There was a great change in the condition of his bowels and in three days they were entirely normal. He is now well and getting very strong and fleshy, and we know that Grape-Nuts saved his life, for he was a very, very ill baby. Grape-Nuts food must have wonderful properties to effect such cures as this.

"We grown-ups in our family all use Grape-Nuts and also Postum in place of coffee with the result that we never any of us have any coffee ills, but are well and strong." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

The reason Grape-Nuts food relieves bowel trouble in babies or adults is because the starch of the grain is predigested and does not tax the bowels nor ferment, like white bread, potatoes and other forms of starchy food.

School Savings Banks.

THRIFT teaching has proven its value and has been introduced in the form of school savings banks in many communities in different countries during the past three years. Your superintendent has for thirteen years devoted her energies to the furtherance of this philanthropy, especially thruout the United States and Canada, altho she has reached forty other lands with voice and pen. She has created its literature—twenty pamphlets, leaflets and prints—and keeps also in hand the card forms and books used in administration of the savings banks system. In the stamp system, so nearly related, the stamps are furnished by the banking society co-operating or by the post-office department. Ninety thousand of the leaflets and pamphlets have been distributed in various parts of the world. The leaflet, "How to Institute School Savings Banks," is in its fortieth thousand. We have thirty-seven state superintendents of the work in the United States and hundreds of county and local superintendents. The school savings system is established in 1,500 of our public schools of which we have full statistics and in many more for which we have not the exact returns. In these 1,500 schools in thirty different states 170,678 pupils have saved and deposited $1,518,578. School savings banks are maintained under state patronage in all the schools of France and Belgium and in many of the public schools and private schools of most European countries. In England the work has developed greatly thru the passage of the Free Educational Act in 1891. The government offered the children opportunity to save the pence and they are doing so thru ing already deposited 1,000,650 pounds both the card and stamp systems, hav-sterling. In Wales and Scotland the children's savings have attained large amounts. In Scotland Mrs. Gourlay reports that the women are teaching thrift to the children of the very poor. Mrs. Fields has spoken for the work in Mexico and the Bahamas. School savings banks are operated at two points in Mexico. In Japan the missionaries are advancing the work to discourage the drink and tobacco habits. In Canada the system is employed in several schools and everywhere the results are most encouraging.

Purity.

Egypt.

WE find it extremely difficult to do much that would strictly come under the department of Purity work. Our society is made up for the most part of foreign missionaries and our work is among the native Egyptians.

Certain quarters of this city, or certain streets, are given up to houses of ill-fame; and their inmates are subjected to medical examination, being required to go to the government hospital for this purpose. This does not apply to foreigners, who are very numerous, bold, and daring. They live in flats among decent people and have lately come so near our own mission that we can look into their windows, as they do not even draw their window shades. They also have their agents, gay-looking young women, parading the streets in front of the large hotels, and at times even laying hold of young men.

No improvement has been made in legal conditions. I think the general state of morals among the natives is improving. We can reach the young people only thru the Sunday-schools, and our religious teaching in the day schools.

We are not able to use any literature except the Bible, and this we find most valuable, because we can take it to them in their own language.

What we have done for the mothers, has been to carry to them the word of God. We feel that we are doing a noble work among the children in the schools; but our greatest influence is over those who are in our boarding schools, where we can control their entire life.

Gambling is another very great evil here. A number of lads and young men have pledged themselves to abstain from it.

We have not hitherto been able to enter on the work of saving fallen women; but the native branch of the W. C. T. U. has promised to search out individuals and try to induce them to change their lives.

Eighteen girls live with me and go to my school in town, about twenty minutes' walk. These girls are entirely under my care except during the holidays. The responsibility is almost greater than of the whole school.

ELIZABETH GIFFIN.

American Mission, Cairo.

Bulgaria.

I HAVE worked as a missionary in Bulgaria for thirty-two years; I think I can safely say that I am the first and only one who has undertaken purity work. I went out under the A. B. C. F. M. in 1871 and when the missionaries were withdrawn at the outbreak of the war between Russia and Turkey I remained as an independent worker. I went through the horrible massacres inflicted by the Turks upon the Armenians. I found a school for young women thrust upon me; they were returning to their desolate homes and had no other place of shelter. I followed God's leading and gave them a home.

I visited the city hospital in Philippopolis and found there girls from houses of ill-fame. I learned that if any one of them tried to escape from such a house, the police would send her back. The law forbids these women going to stores to make purchases, so their masters charge them any price they please and keep them always in debt. Sometimes women are sold by their husbands into lives of shame for a paltry sum of money. One, whom I knew, was deserted by her husband, and when assaulted by an officer in the army, receiving a sword-wound in the struggle, was shown a bill of sale for $80 signed by her husband, who afterward asked for a divorce from her on the plea that she had been living in a house of ill-fame. When the divorce was not granted he sold her again. She is now working out her freedom and threatens, when free, to shoot her husband and the chief of police who forced her into such horrible slavery. If she does and is hanged, who will be the murderer? These women are bought and sold, shipped here and there, like cattle. Mrs. Josephine Butler wrote me that she had found Bulgarian girls in houses of ill-fame, not only in Europe, but in Egypt and India.

I laid the subject before our prince's mother, H. R. H. Princess Clementine. Her royal highness was intensely interested and assured me she would do all in her power to found a rescue home, as there are none such in the country. Such royal sympathy made it easy to start a women's club of the first women in the city. It was hoped they would take up this rescue work, but they could not muster the courage. Another, composed of the most intelligent teachers and wives of teachers, was formed, but they, too, did not dare. Both clubs are in existence today, one merely a literary affair, the other helping poor women and girls to get a living. I would have been glad to give my promises for the desired object had I been able to find the means to carry on the work. As it is but few cases have been rescued; but these have proved the easy possibility under right conditions.

Marriage is considered honorable and necessary for women. Public opinion demands that they must be above reproach. But the standard for men is different. Many men high in office, both in the army and in civil service, live in open disregard of the marriage relation, but their victims are of course ostracized. You cannot expect Mothers' Meetings, and Cradle Rolls to flourish under the conditions which obtain here.

America's Summer Resorts.

When it begins to get hot and dry one's thoughts naturally turn toward the lakes and rivers and the seashore of New York and New England, and we begin to wonder how much it would require of time and money to make the trip. A lot of these questions are answered and a lot of information given free in "Four-Track Series" No. 3, "America's Summer Resorts." Sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp, by George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, New York Central & Hudson River Railroad, Grand Central Station, New York.

White Ribbon Missionary.

MY last report closed early in the year of 1900 when I crossed the Atlantic for three months' work in Great Britain. In June I attended the World's Temperance Congress held in London, and read a paper on "The Relation of Intemperance to the Dependent, Defective, and Delinquent Classes." Following this came the World's Convention in Edinburgh. After returning to the United States I spent some weeks in Canada, and in the autumn attended state and National conventions. In January, 1901, I went to Cuba where in three months' time several local unions were organized and federated under the name of "The Cuban Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Auxiliary to the World's Union." The addition of the "Lone Star Flag" to our World's collection was hailed with much enthusiasm. The summer was given to work in the United States, and in the autumn I made my fifth visit to Great Britain, beginning in Ireland, giving some weeks to Scotland and nearly four months to England. Soon after my return to the United States I made another trip to Canada, building up and extending the work. I spoke by invitation before the National Council of Women of Canada held in New Brunswick, and have presented our work before various home and foreign missionary societies, churches, young people's unions and clubs.

SUMMARY: Aside from my prison work and visitation I have visited Great Britain twice, made two trips to Canada, taking in three provinces, been to Cuba and traveled in ten of the United States, aggregating several hundred addresses. My heart is full of thanksgiving for this blessed privilege of service.

Countries.

West Indies.

We much regret our missionary, Mrs. Etnier, has removed from Porto Rico to the U. S. A. Temperance physiology has been taught in all the schools of Porto Rico for three years, and we believe conditions warrant the prediction that a union could now be safely organized and several lines of work profitably inaugurated. We have been in constant communication with Mrs. Addie Fields, and had hoped she would see her way clear to visit the West Indies last winter, but her work is essential just now in Mexico. Would that women of Mrs. Fields' tireless energy and perserverance, her ready adaptability to new conditions and aptness for language, might be multiplied by fifty at least! I am thinking now only of the West Indies and Mexico. That number is really necessary, for these fields if we intend to successfully cope with conditions as they at present prevail. It is a rare woman among us who would be a success among these Latin people. They are the antipodes of the Anglo-Saxon in every possible manner, and to successfully win them to adopt standards of life so differing from their own is the work of a genius and general. We fully appreciate the treasure we have in Mrs. Fields. She is our Spanish White-Ribbon Ambassador!

Mrs. Etnier reports: "In Porto Rico churches are arising by the score, and these are thronged with those who in many cases but a short time since had only scorn for an appointed place of worship. Educationally most wonderful strides have been made. Formerly only about eight per cent of the people could read. Comparatively few knew how to write. Now less than ten per cent of the children of school age are without school privileges, and to meet this need provision is being made as rapidly as possible. Forty-five new school buildings have been erected, text-books furnished free to all, an up-to-date scheme of study put into effect, and American teachers to the number of 175 well scattered over the island have helped mightily to bring the native force up to the required standard. Industrial training in the shape of agricultural colleges and various mechanical plants and training shops have been put in operation. Of this last its value can hardly be estimated in its tendency to dignify the labor of the land, upon which the people had come to look as beneath anyone who would lay claim to self-respect. veloping a sturdy and healthful independence among the people that is most gratifying. New necessities are naturally creating new customs, which supplant the old meaningless forms that in the beginning so effectively blocked the sudden introduction of reform measures of any kind. This bids well for the near beginning of temperance work along total abstinence lines. Now that evangelical churches, with their generally strict requirements for the letting alone of the wine cup, have got such a firm footing and following the time is ripe for a separate and distinctive organization embodying and emphasizing just the principles of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

Queensland.

Mrs. C. E. Trundle, secretary, writes: "We can see progress. We have gained several local option polls, thus preventing more hotels being erected in these neighborhoods. In March a prohibition poll in an area was carried which had excited much public interest on account of the manner in which a license had been granted contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants in the district.

"The federal parliament of Australia having granted adult suffrage, thus enfranchising the women of Australia, the keenest interest is being taken by them in having their names enrolled, and also in educating themselves on some of the many public questions that will come before the federal parliament in order that their vote may be an enlightened help to the masculine vote to result in a high standard of legislators being returned to the next parliament of Australia. The state government still refuses the franchise to its women citizens, though government promises to grant it have been many.

Several of our prominent workers visited the World's Convention last year, and on their return gave us the benefit of what they saw and heard. The tie between our English sisters and ourselves is still further cemented by the visitors from the home-land. Mrs. Hawkes and Miss Harrison, both members of the B. W. T. A., have visited us, and we hope have taken back pleasant memories of their stay; also, Mr. Smedley, who gave us several addresses while with us. Miss Harrison has attended several unions, and given us the benefit of hearing different methods and branches of work dealt with.

"Our Temperance Booth work we find is greatly appreciated at public shows, etc. We extend our operations in this branch as much and as often as we can. At the Easter encampments the work is much appreciated. We find thru these booths a better knowledge of W. C. T. U. work is gained by the public.

We have been obliged to relinquish the restaurant in connection with headquarters, owing to the building being sold and our inability to secure other suitable premises for carrying on such work. We have now an office in the Temperance Hall for our headquarters which possesses the advantages of being central to all our members.

Natal.

Mrs. Adams, corresponding secretary, writes: "Owing to the war the W. C. T. U. in Natal is in a very low state. We did not have a convention last year, and as no reports were sent in I cannot give the membership.

"We have three unions and three Y's. I append a list of officers of the Natal Union; also, the departments of work in which we do a little. We are hoping to hold the convention in June, after which we may make a fresh start.

"General officers: Mrs. Fernie, president, Longmarket street, Maritzburg; Mrs. Varley, vice-president, 90 Prince street, Maritzburg; Mrs. Adams, corresponding secretary, The Hermitage, Verulam; Mrs. C. F. Winson, recording secretary, Verulam; Mrs. T. J. Garland, treasurer, Lambert road, Durban.

"Departments of work and superintendents: Evangelistic, Mrs. Spencer Walton, Durban; Rescue and Jail, Mrs. MacGowan, Maritzburg; Purity, Mrs. Varley, Maritzburg; Press Work, Miss Baverstock, Maritzburg; Literature, Mrs. Adams, Verulam; Soldiers, Miss Scotch, Pinetown; Flower Mission, Restaurants and Demorest Medal Contests, Mrs. Kyle, Verulam; General Superintendent Y Work, Miss Fernie, Maritzburg.

"Miss Ina Macgregor, corresponding secretary of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Cape Colony, is chosen in the terms of Article III of the constitution of the World's W. C. T. U. to represent the president of Natal on the executive committee of the World's W. C. T. U."

Chile.

We have a union in our church, Spanish. Everything has to be done in that language. Some fifty women are members. My daughter Olive has charge of our Loyal Temperance Legion.

We teach temperance in every school of our mission, every church, every Sunday school. We accomplish much; but it is not properly W. C. T. U. work. Purity work is needed in Chile as in no other country.

I have translated some leaflets. I have pleaded for years for a missionary for Chile. Where is she?

The United States.

Mrs. Susanna M. D. Fry, corresponding secetary National W. C. T. U., reports: I can give you but the briefest outline of the work of the National W. C. T. U. since the Edinburgh Convention, and must content myself with the barest mention of facts without the interesting setting of local color which might be given were there time.

Our National Convention of 1900 was held at our capital city, Washington, D. C., and was timed that we might witness the opening of the United States Congress and probably influence some of the proposed bills, among others the Anti-Canteen Bill, for which we had long worked. This was the largest convention for many years, and had the honor of a special reception given by President and Mrs. William McKinley at the Executive Mansion. The anti-canteen fight was at its height in the United States Congress before the convention adjourned, and a special committee, headed by Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, National superintendent of Legislation, attended a hearing on the subject before the Congressional Committee on Military Affairs. The bill was re-enacted almost immediately (having had previous vicissitudes) and the daily press gave the credit to the National W. C. T. U. Its provisions forbid the sale of all intoxicating liquors in the army exchange, which is popularly called the canteen. Many still claim that there is more drunkenness and disorder since the soldiers go outside of the camps for drink than there was when they had it in the exchange. Temperance people and many army officers and soldiers agree, however, with Lieut.-Gen. Nelson A. Miles, the highest military authority, who was in favor of the bill and has testified to its efficiency in lessening drunkenness and disorder. In a late report on the army in the Philippines, he had this to say:

"As the result of my observation it is my judgment that the discontinuance of the liquor feature of the canteen has been beneficial to the army. Now that the temptation has been removed from the immediate presence of the young men of the army they are less likely to indulge in the use of liquor."

We are believing that this law will never be repealed.

Since these charges of drunkenness among soldiers from outside saloons, the W. C. T. U. has advocated state laws prohibiting saloons within a distance of four miles of army camps, posts, military reservations, etc. March 30, 1903, news came of a new military law in our far-away Philippine Islands, forbidding the granting of license by any authority for the sale of intoxicating liquors, including beer and wine, within a distance of two miles of land used by the United States for military purposes, with some exceptions as to distance. For the purposes of enforcement, the commanding officers of the United States troops stationed at the places named are given the power of justices of the peace, and the cases are to be tried before them. all fines and costs are to be paid into the treasuries of the municipalities, or into the Insular treasury.

We are believing that our several states will pass similar laws, to be under civil jurisdiction, however, instead of military.

One of the pleasing incidents of the Washington Convention was the welcoming of our seventh round-the-world missionary, Miss Clara Parrish (now Mrs. Wright), upon her return from four years' arduous work in Japan, China, Burmah and India, and her active entrance upon her duties as secretary of the National Y Branch, which honorable and onerous position she has continued to fill until the present time.

In 1900 petitions were sent by the National to the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Commissioners in the Philippines, protesting against the infamous system of vice regulations for the benefit of the soldiers similar to those lately obtaining in India. We are happy to say that the United States Government has, to a good degree, if not wholly, freed itself from this stigma. Special orders were issued by the Secretary of War in regard to the matter. It is said that it took ten clerks to answer the letters which came to the War Department at that time, so greatly were the people aroused.

Twelve states had a part in Benefit Night at Washington, by virtue of their having made a net gain of five hundred or more new members during the year, and the entire gain in membership for the year, as reported by the National Treasurer, was 14,567. Mrs. Boole and other New York women were instrumental in preventing an infringement of the state law against barmaids, which was proposed to be done at a tea by society women for the benefit of British soldiers. They also instituted a successful crusade against liquor in candies sold extensively to school children.

One new department was created, that of work among Indians.

Our Convention of 1901 was held at Fort Worth, Texas, a southwestern state with an area larger than Germany and almost as large as the areas of France and Switzerland combined, but where two-thirds of the population and three-fourths of its area were already under prohibitory laws by county local option. Since that time, the prohibitory territory has been largely increased, in all of which white ribboners have played an important part.

Six states were represented Benefit night, including Texas and the territory of Oklahoma, which carried off Mrs. Stevens' splendid United States flag offered for the largest per cent gain in membership. Mrs. Carrie C. Faxon was sent out from Fort Worth as a special commissioner to the Philippines to reside there for two years, hoping thereby to place our work upon a substantial basis among the English-speaking people. Her sister, Mrs. Moots, had already organized the Manila Union, for which we were duly thankful. A report from Mrs. Jennie Light Burtner, corresponding secretary of the Manila Union, tells us of many comfort bags and quantities of literature distributed to the army boys; that the Union holds meetings twice a month at the Leper Hospital; and that different departments of work have been taken up, the flower mission being most popular. An effort has been made to introduce scientific temperance instruction and mercy books into the schools in Manila, and the Government has been memorialized to establish an industrial school for incorrigible girls.

The union at Honolulu, Hawaii, reported meetings held for eighteen years without a single break.

At the suggestion of Mrs. Allen, National Superintendent of Non-Alcoholic Medication, 10,000 copies of "An Appeal to Physicians" were sent out asking them to aid in disabusing the public mind of old-time errors concerning the necessity of alcohol, either as a beverage or for medicinal purposes. We called upon them to make most careful investigations of the nature of alcohol and its effects upon the human system, and to see to it that their medical practice and teaching, as well as their personal example, be on the side of safety. They were also asked to warn parents against the home prescription of alcohol and against the use of proprietary medicines containing alcohol and other narcotic drugs. These appeals were sent to medical journals, and to the secretaries of four hundred medical schools, as well as to private individuals. Return letters showed a wide awakening on this subject among physicians.

A creditable W. C. T. U. exhibit was made at the Pan-American Exposition, held at Buffalo, New York, and the same was afterwards sent to the Exposition at Charleston, South Carolina. Profitable W. C. T. U. congresses were held at Buffalo and Charleston during the Expositions.

October, 1902, found our National Convention assembled in Portland, Maine, the home of our National President, and of General Neal Dow, the Father of Prohibition, until he was translated to the Holy City. This was the first time the Convention had met in a state having constitutional prohibition of the liquor traffic, and well did the thrift, the cleanliness, the order and general air of prosperity emphasize all we had ever heard of the Pine Tree State.

Six states had part in Benefit Night, and never were there larger, more enthusiastic, or more inspiring audiences. Chief among the visitors was that gentle lady and charming friend, Lady Henry Somerset. Her coming was the great event. Every session hoped to see her and the other English friends on the platform and hear her speak. She was not chary of her time or energies, and won all hearts. The Convention was also honored by the presence of many Canadian white ribboners.

One great national victory was the bill forbidding any American to sell intoxicants, opium, or fire-arms in any island of the Pacific which is not under the government of a civilized power. Thousands of petitions were sent in to aid the good Dr. Paton in securing this law by the United States Congress.

1902 and 1903 witnessed tremendous efforts by the liquor power to offset the prohibitory teaching of the temperance people. One of the liquor papers recently said: "The influence of the females who compose the W. C. T. U. organization is everywhere evident; their influence with legislators in all parts of the country is amazing. We must somehow bring them up to our standard of intelligence, for if we do not there is danger that they will drag us down to theirs." So they inaugurated a campaign of education through printed leaflets, in which they defend the saloon as a civilizer and the salvation of the people from hypocrisy and corruption. This influence has been offset, as far as possible, by speakers, and by counter-leaflets, two of them having been written by our National President on "The Dispensary and Prohibitory Law." The department of Scientific Temperance Instruction—Mrs. Hunt, superintendent—has

"DABSTERS"

People Who Do Things by Piecemeal.

Many people are convinced that coffee is the cause of their sufferings and stop its use from time to time to get relief. During these periods when they are not drinking coffee they feel better. They are getting well in small installments.

How much better it is to stop short on the coffee and shift to well-made Postum and get well once and for all. As soon as this is done the destroying effects of coffee are stopped and a powerful rebuilding agent is set to work. Health comes back by pounds, and so long as the right food and drink are used and improper food is left alone the cure is permanent.

A lady of Readfield, Me., says: "I was always a great lover of coffee and drank it so steadily that I would have to stop it at times on account of dizziness in my head, gas in the stomach and other troubles. I would leave off the coffee for a few weeks until I felt better, then would go to drinking it again.

"I continued this for years and paid dearly for it, until about a year ago I read a Postum Cereal article, and bought and carefully prepared some. It filled the place of coffee from the start so far as flavor and taste go, and it has righted my stomach troubles. I have improved so that my friends notice the change. I have exchanged sickness and misery for health and happiness. Through Postum I have got well all at once." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

been especially active in opposing and refuting the liquor claims.

Some of our people have been made to believe that the Gottenberg system—or, as we call it, the Dispensary—is the panacea for saloon evils. This system has been tried in several of our states, but South Carolina alone has adopted it as a state system. We are convinced that, as a temperance measure, the dispensary is a failure. In Athens, Ga., where it had the longest and fairest trial, the amount of liquor sold increased thirty per cent, while the population increased but eight per cent. Government statistics show that sales are increased, instead of diminished, by the Dispensary, as are also crime and law-breaking. The W. C. T. U. of Florida and Georgia defeated Dispensary bills.

Georgia, the last bit of ground in the United States not previously covered by a law requiring scientific temperance instruction to be given to the children in the public schools, secured such a law under the able leadership of the state president, Mrs. Sibley; and the governor of the state gave his name for membership in the W. C. T. U.

Miss Addie Northam Fields having organized a Bermuda W. C. T. U., Mrs. Emilie Burgess strengthened the work by a visit of several months.

Mrs. Fields did the same in Cuba upon her return trip to Mexico from the Fort Worth Convention, and still continues in Mexico, where she is doing a great work in many different directions and with remarkable and substantial results.

Miss Kara G. Smart, of South Dakota, took up her residence as temperance missionary to Japan by appointment of the World's W. C. T. U., the United States consenting to lose her valuable work for a time because Japan's needs were greater than ours.

The following may be said in general: The National W. C. T. U., represented by Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, has been instrumental in securing the appointment of women inspectors to meet incoming vessels at the port of New York to offer protection and advice to women and girls traveling alone. Excellent work has been done in the Y and L. T. L. Branches and in all of our departments. The work among soldiers and sailors has been particularly heavy upon Mrs. Thacher, the superintendent, during the last few years, on account of the Cuban and Philippine wars, and much has been done to ameliorate the condition of the army boys, many of them having been brought into unions auxiliary to the W. C. T. U. Medal contests have greatly grown in favor. Many states have increased their dues from fifty cents to one dollar. The number of annual leaflets printed every year for the instruction of unions has increased from 40,000 three years ago to 58,000. Curfew laws have been passed in hundreds of towns. Local option victories are on the increase in villages and towns. Law enforcement and pledge signing have had a revival of interest. The age of protection for girls has been raised in every state but two. The age is now eighteen years in three states. Ninety per cent of the railroads, seventy-two per cent of the manufactories, eighty-eight per cent of traders and seventy-two per cent of agriculturists prohibit the use of liquor by their employes either entirely or when on duty; and the W. C. T. U. claims a great share in creating this public sentiment. A national law gained this year prohibits the sale of liquor in the capitol building at Washington, and another prohibits the sale of liquor in all immigrant stations. The state of Arizona passed a bill giving full franchise to women, but it was vetoed by the governor. The state of Washington passed an anti-gambling law of great value. Many states have passed anti-cigaret laws, and forty-two forbid the sale of tobacco in any form to minors. THE UNION SIGNAL, the official organ of the National and World's W. C. T. U., has been much improved typographically and otherwise lately, and we bespeak for it the hearty co-operation of all white-ribboners and their subscription to the same, as we believe it is essential to the growth of our work and the highest development of all our members.

Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill., still continues to be the Mecca of many pilgrims from many countries. Miss Gordon carefully preserves the south side of the building, which was Miss Willard's home, just as it was when our beloved leader lived there. The north side is our National headquarters. Continued love and remembrance of dear Miss Willard and an abiding interest in our work call many hundreds of visitors to the Cottage every year, where all are made welcome.

It is of interest to know that the statue of Miss Willard, to be placed in Statuary Hall, Washington, D. C., nears completion, and it is hoped that within a year it will be placed in position. Miss Gordon, as chairman of the Statue Commission, has been indefatigable in her labors for it.

The Memorial Fund, for the extension and perpetuation of the principles and work of the W. C. T. U. as a memorial to Miss Willard, has steadily increased every year. The unions were asked to hold a public meeting on or near February 17 of each year, and to send two dollars or more from the offering received at such meetings to the National treasury for this particular work. This has given us the means of furnishing much free literature and aiding many states too weak as yet to carry their own financial burdens. It is helping to build a beautiful memorial to our departed leader in the lives and the hearts of the people.

Just now the United States is in preparation for the World's Fair to be opened in St. Louis, Mo., May, 1904. It is hoped that the exhibit made by the W. C. T. U. may be representative of all the countries having a W. C. T. U. organization.

There is much agitation in the United States on the polygamy question. It is believed that this evil is growing among the Mormon people rather than decreasing. Popular interest has been intensified by the election of one of the apostles of that church to the United States Senate. The W. C. T. U. is uniting with other organizations in asking for an amendment to the United States constitution forever prohibiting polygamy. Speakers are in the field constantly, and much literature is being published on the subject.

Our next Convention is to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, at which time our thirtieth anniversary will be celebrated by an excursion to Hillsboro, Ohio, where the Crusade of 1873-4 had its highest development and where we will pay our respects to Mrs. Eliza Thompson, leader of the Crusade Praying Band, and lovingly called Mother of the Crusade.

Are You Going to New York?

If you are going to New York a treat is in store for you if you take the Lackawanna Railroad. This line offers the most beautiful scenery of any of the great trunk lines of the east, traversing the beautiful agricultural regions of western New York until it reaches the Susquehanna river, beside which it runs for miles overlooking the beautiful valleys nestled in among the foot-hills of the Blue Ridge mountains. Next is reached the valley of the Delaware river, which the trains follow through Delaware Water Gap, conceded to be one of the most picturesque spots in America, the river and the railroad track fighting for the right of way through a great gap in the mountains cut by the ceaseless washing of the waters of the river. For miles the track curves in and about the Blue Ridge mountains, each successive turn presenting a picture seemingly more beautiful than the last. At Mount Pocono an altitude of 1900 feet is reached, and from here on the train descends through the mountains and foot-hills almost to the edge of the Hudson River, the last hundred miles having been for the most part beside the picturesque old Morris and Essex canal. Three magnificent trains daily from Chicago. For full information about them write GEO. A. CULLEN, G. W. P. A., 103 ADAMS ST., Chicago.

Two old pals met on the street.

"I saw you in the liquor men's parade Tuesday," one of them said.

"O yes."

"Now, you tell me about it. Who were those fellows in front on horses?"

"Those? Why those were the wholesalers."

"Well, who were those fellows in carriages?"

"Those fellows in plug hats, smoking the big, black cigars?"

"Yes."

"They were the distillers and brewers."

"Who were those fellows walking there with the white plug hats, white coats, and gold-headed canes?"

"They were the retailers."

"Who were the fellows that brought up the rear?"

"Fellows with cauliflower noses and fringe on their pants—the crowd I was with?"

"Yes."

"O, they were the consumers."

The Los Angeles federation of unions will hold a picnic in East Lake Park July 15 to which all white-ribboners are invited. This federation is composed of fourteen unions.

Carrie Lee Carter, National organizer, is engaged to lecture in Maine during the entire summer. She was the speaker at Washington, Lincoln and Androscoggin county conventions in June.

The Manitoba convention was held in Brandon recently. The report shows the work to be in a good financial conditon. All officers were re-elected. Miss Lillian Phelps, of Ontario, was the principal speaker.

The Eighth Ward, Minneapolis, Minn., union had Mrs. Hester Griffith, of the Los Angeles federation of unions, as the guest of honor June 26. The union has just entertained the Hennepin district convention.

Each member of the Lathrop union of Milwaukee, Wis., is to earn a dollar for the temperance cause during the summer months. At the first meeting this fall each will relate her experience in earning the money.

The Frances E. Willard Memorial Hall at Forest Park, Ottawa, Kansas, will be dedicated July 11. This is the building erected this spring by the Kansas W. C. T. U., mention of which has been made in our news pages.

The union at Rollis, Minn., reports a silver medal contest at which Dora B. Clark won the medal. Rollis is a small town thirty-five miles from a railroad, but the union is pushing the educational departments of our work.

The Nappanee, Ind., union recently enjoyed a visit from Miss Marie Brehm, state president of Illinois. The afternoon parlor meeting was well attended and the evening address was greatly enjoyed. Ten members were added to the union.

Mrs. Ada W. Unruh, National organizer, will spend the month of August in southern Michigan. She has a few September dates not yet engaged. During July her address will be 42 Ripley street, Newton Center, Mass. After August 1 address her at Adrian, Mich.

The superintendent of Sabbath Observance of Somerset county, N. J., asked the boys and girls to see who could find the most Bible verses concerning the Sabbath. Five hundred children responded, Miss Gladys Longstreet, of Somerville, leading with 125.

One feature of the centennial celebration of Indiana, Pa., was the presentation of a drinking fountain to the borough by the W. C. T. U. In accepting the fountain in behalf of the county commissioners, ex-Attorney General John P. Elkin paid a high tribute to the temperance women of the county.

Prizes of fifteen and ten dollars were offered by the Kent county, Maryland, union for the best essays on temperance subjects presented by the students of the Washington college of Chestertown. The first prize was won by a member of this year's graduating class, he also carrying off first honors for class work.

Mrs. Frank Emerson and Mrs. Daryneau are members of the Glenwood union in Wisconsin. Being some nine miles from the meeting place they can not often attend the meetings, but this does not mean they are shut out from W. C. T. U. work. Since April 3 they have held five silver medal contests and now have another in preparation.

"The Home Alliance" gives an appreciative account of the Flower Mission Day program of the Yolo, California, union. About fifty-five persons were present. The most interesting part of the program was a guessing contest. Sixteen young ladies, each representing a flower, marched into the parlors. Each young lady described the flower she represented and the audience did the guessing.

The "sunrise county of the nation" is Washington county, Maine, and it has just held its annual convention at Machias. Miss Carrie Lee Carter, National organizer, spoke one evening and the other evening was filled by the Y and L. T. L. young people. Mrs. Susan M. Grant is the faithful president whose careful plans insured so successful a convention.

Mrs. Ruth H. Spray, of Colorado, and Mrs. Maria Freeman Gray, of California, superintendents of the Peace and Arbitration department of the W. C. T. U. for those states, have been made vice-presidents of the World's Peace Alliance and are in correspondence with Princess Wiszinewska concerning a universal World's Peace day and other things of like general interest.

Pacific county, Washington, held its annual W. C. T. U. convention at Oysterville. Reports showed that the efficient county officers had accomplished much work during the year. Mrs. Mary M. Wade of Seattle, state treasurer, was present and gave an elocutionary entertainment the first evening. The generous collection showed the practical appreciation of the audience.

Miss Lillie O'Daniel, the new state lecturer of the Tennessee W. C. T. U., has had the advantages of educational and elocutionary training in Nashville, her home, and also in the best Boston schools. With her youth, her zeal, and her pleasing personality she brings, too, the advantage of extended travel thru America with pupils, and, beyond all, a consecrated Christian experience.

Mrs. Florence D. Richard, National organizer, has just finished a thirty-five days' trip in Vermont. She attended eleven county conventions, visited eight schools and ten Sunday schools, gave forty-four addresses and secured one hundred and ten new members. At Fort Ethan Allen Mrs. Richard so pleased her audience of over three hundred soldiers that she was invited to return.

The colored W. C. T. U. of Greensboro, N. C., has organized and is faithfully maintaining a Sunday school in the slum districts of the city. The union is much in need of literature for this and its L. T. L. work. Any help on this line will be much appreciated. All sent can be used either in Greensboro or in similar work in other parts of the state. Address Mrs. C. L. Bullock, 427 Bennett street, Greensboro, N. C.

The union of Churchville, N. Y., has just closed a novel contest. One year ago the membership was divided into two parts with Mrs. Chas. Davis and Mrs. M. Hughes as captains, the side presenting the largest number of names at roll call during the several meetings of the year to be the winner. The defeated side was to furnish the supper at the annual meeting. The contest was won by Mrs. Hughes, whose side had one more name to its credit.

Mrs. L. E. Bailey, National organizer, is now at work in Adams county, Ohio. She spent three weeks in Brown county, giving sixteen public addresses and attending the county convention. Two new unions were organized and sixty-three members secured. Mrs. Bailey's address from July 1 to 20 will be Greenfield, Highland county, Ohio, care of Mrs. E. J. Patterson. Any union or county desiring her services can address her there.

We are pleased to note the energetic way in which Miss Helen Hood, editor of the "Illinois Watch Tower," and Miss Clara E. Rowell, of the "Granite State Outlook," are taking hold of the subscription canvass during the summer months. Each is out with an appeal to every local union, offering the state paper in connection with The Union Signal special offer until November 26 at a very low rate. We hope Illinois and New Hampshire white-ribboners will show practical appreciation of the offer.

Miss Emma E. Page, lecturer for the Mercy department, and Mrs. Lydia A. Irons have been afield in Montana for twenty-five days. They visited nine unions, spoke on humane education in 193 schools. Over one hundred and fifty thousand pages of humane literature were distributed. During three weeks in Idaho they addressed twenty-eight public meetings and organized three unions. Seventy-nine public schools were visited and about one hundred thousand pages of literature distributed.

Mrs. Dorcas J. Spencer writes from California: "Flower Mission day has been very generally observed this year, a greater number of unions than ever before having prepared special programs for the occasion. For the first time the stock of flower mission literature at headquarters was entirely exhausted, excepting cards, and a degree of enthusiasm was wrought into the day that will insure further and increased interest in this department. An illustration of the fact that a good leader can stir up good workers."

Mrs. Adrianna Hungerford, acting president in Colorado, and Miss Rose Davison, Y secretary, have just completed a fifteen hundred mile trip in Colorado, holding sixteen institutes and a few district conventions. In the southwest they had to wait for track to be built after a wash-out and at one point a landslide had deposited a huge boulder before the locomotive; but, like their predecessors, these intrepid workers count discomfort and fatigue and danger but trifles if they may further the interests of God's work in that great country.

In spite of rain and mud Mrs. M. W. Newton, National organizer, accomplished much in Gloucester county, Virginia. Ten local unions were organized and this was followed by the organization of the county. At the close of her campaign the county voted "dry" by 102 majority. She has organized three other counties and worked in the Jamestown district, where the liquor traffic was centering its effort on account of William and Mary college. She helped to make the temperance sentiment so strong that only fourteen "wet" votes were cast at the local option election. Mrs. Newton has organized thirty-seven unions this year, all in new fields.

Promoted.

Mrs. C. J. Monroe of South Haven, Mich., passed peacefully away June 21. Mrs. Monroe was very active in the W. C. T. U. work, having been for some time president of the local union. She was a loving wife, a faithful mother and a valuable member of society.

Mrs. Maggie Nail, of the Bombay, India, union, was promoted from her life of patient toil to an eternity of joy May 20. Mrs. Nail had been for four years a missionary in India and was in charge of the Vanguard Rescue Home at the time of her death. She was formerly a member of the Greensburg, Ind., union, which passed resolutions of regret and sympathy with the sorrowing mother and sister.

Magazines of the Month.

LIPPINCOTT'S complete novel, "The Lifting of a Finger," is followed by short stories especially suited to the summer season, when every one admits unblushingly that he craves not the solid but the entertaining. The labor story by Edith Robinson, called "The Vanderdonck Sandbank," presents good arguments for both sides and ought to be read by capitalist and laborer. There is a negro dialect story by Ella Middleton Tybout and a fishing story by the son of the poet Sidney Lanier. The only exception to fiction is a paper by Maud Howe, daughter of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, entitled "A Roman Holiday," which gives intimate details regarding housekeeping in the Eternal City.

THE PILGRIM makes direct appeal to the hammock reader, but there are forceful editorial comments for those who defy atmospheric conditions and insist upon thinking. Two stories of literary value are "A Maligned Star," by Charlotte Porter and "Sealed, Directed and Stamped" by Celia Parker Woolley. Myrtle Reid shows her lack of respect for the dressing sacque and the woman who wears it. Paul Lawrence Dunbar states the problem of the negro in the North as indicated in Chicago, which has the largest negro settlement of any city in the world.

"Citizens of Nature," contributed to SUCCESS by Julius Noregard, tells the city-dweller how a short holiday, by uniting him with nature, may bring him to a realization of his true significance. "The Requiem of the Has-Beens," by Owen Kildare, throws a strong light upon the lives of thousands of hopeless ambitious men who live in the Bowery of New York—the great camping-ground of the homeless. Charlotte Perkins Stetson writes an able and inspiring article, "The Home as an Environment for Women," which claims that while the home is an indispensable base and background of life, development is restricted by the close environment of the home. The "ailing disease" is vigorously handled by Editor Marden, who has no patience with the little "absorbers of health and happiness." In the short story, "The Salmon Foot," Joseph Blethen forcibly explodes the excuses of those who say, "I can't."

In the FORUM Alexander D. Noyes outlines the most striking events of the world of finance during the past quarter, while the developments in "Applied Science" are treated by Henry Harrison Suplee. The literary article is a criticism of "Recent Biography," by Herbert W. Horwill. An interesting article by Professor James C. Egbert gives an account of "Recent Excavations in the Roman Forum." Editor Rice describes the origin, purpose and methods of "The Society of Educational Research," the reports of which society will hereafter regularly appear in the FORUM.

The larger part of the CHAUTAUQUAN makes up a souvenir of permanent value in connection with the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Chautauqua Home Reading Courses. The souvenir features include Bishop John H. Vincent's "Chautauqua Reminiscences" and "The Evolution of a Reading Course," by George E. Vincent, principal of Chautauqua instruction. There are nearly one hundred illustrations of historic interest, including portraits of the presidents of all C. L. S. C. classes since the beginning in 1878. The full program of the season of 1903 is also given with other illustrated announcements.

The ATLANTIC, which discovered Bret Harte, and which has ever had a watchful eye on the rising geniuses of California, makes its July issue a distinctively Californian number, and it contains a brilliant group of articles which will engage the attention of all appreciative and discriminating readers. Herbert Bashford, editor of "The Literary West," opens with a thoughtful paper on "The Literary Development of the Pacific Coast." President David Starr Jordan, of Stanford University, writes upon "The Voice of the Scholar." Other articles are by President Wheeler, of California University, and Professor Gayley. The great Lick astronomical settlement, its wonders and uses, are described with graphic power by Ethel J. Hussey. Typical vestern stories are contributed by Mary Justin and Mabel Clare Craft. Among subjects of general interest are natural history, the principles of school administration, and a resumé of the first year of Cuban self-government. There is fine verse and a lively Contributors' Club.

The CENTURY, in its fiction number, presents some excellent short stories by the first authors of the day. Among the solid reading is Professor C. T. Winchester's life of the founder of Methodism, which is especially timely in view of the bicentennial of Wesley. The long expected "Unpublished Letters of Sir Walter Scott," edited by Horace P. Hutchinson, with notes by Mrs. Mary Anne Watts Hughes, to whom the letters were written, will be read with the keenest interest and enjoyment. This month's "Musical Celebrities" gives intimate glimpses of many justly popular singers, among whom are Jean and Edouard de Reszke, Tamagno, and Mme. Nordica. There are contributions in verse by Edwin Markham, John Burroughs, Ruth McEnery Stuart, Josephine Daskam and others.

ST. NICHOLAS has the out-of-door flavor that makes it a delightful companion for the summer days. Boys will enjoy "A Pair of Poachers" and "In the Cavalry." There is a pretty Fourth of July story and Henry Pyle's "The Story of King Arthur and his Knights" grows in interest. There are many entertaining articles, such as "An Indian Village," "The Origin of Our Flag," "Some Ancient Fleets" and "A Four-Thousand-Mile Race," which no boy would care to miss. Nonsense jingles and verse, grave and gay, daintily and laughably illustrated, send a sparkle thruout the pages.

THE HOME COMPANION has some clever holiday features. In "Keeping House with High Explosives," Mary Annable Fanton gives her interview with Mr. Hudson Maxim, who boiled eggs over dynamite and made tea with smokeless powder. "The Terrible Danger of Being Alive" is amusingly discussed by Myrtle Reed. Dr. J. M. Buckley tells of "The Methodists and Their Good Works" and there is an instructive article on "American Reptiles." There are short stories, games and amusements for the young. There are directions for giving a July picnic and many suggestions for the summer outing.

Open Letter by Archbishop Keane.

(Catholic.)

"IN very many localities I have been grieved by what pastors and people have told me concerning the ravages wrought among young and old by the abuse of drink. And in every case the evil has been traced to the pernicious influence of the saloons. Wherever they exist, they are public temptations to drink. They solicit, they allure to this dangerous indulgence, and it is not to be wondered at that multitudes fall victims to the temptation. Once a young man has put his foot across their threshold, he has taken the first step in a slippery and downward path.

"It is no phantom of fanaticism that we assail, but a public and widespread evil, which the bishops of the whole country have repeatedly declared to be the chief source of scandal and sin among our people. It is no innocent and well-meaning body of trades-people that we are hindering and harassing in a harmless and beneficent business; but, on the contrary, a strongly organized, fiercely aggressive and absolutely selfish interest, against which church and state have raised their voice again and again, but which stands as resolute and defiant as ever, which scoffs at law and order, which seeks to control governments for its nefarious ends, which multiplies public temptations in order to multiply its unholy gains, and against which we are therefore compelled to fight in defense of Christian morality, in defense of our weak and tempted young people, in defense of the happiness of our homes and the salvation of innumerable souls. In such a contest there can be no neutrality, for Our Lord says, 'He that is not with me, is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth.' Range yourselves, then, on His side, and earn by your devoted zeal the reward which He will surely give to His faithful servants and soldiers. Multiply your societies, multiply their membership, multiply their earnestness and energy, multiply the good which they accomplish for the abating of public temptations and the safe-guarding of morality. And may he be ashamed who would dare to raise his voice against this most noble work."

Signal Notes

The gambling houses in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, have been allowed to reopen.

The Volunteers of America gave a picnic to 18,000 poor children in Chicago. Lunches, with lemonade and ice cream in abundance, were served.

The gates at the station of the Boston and Maine railroad in Boston are guarded, and drunken men who try to get through are arrested. This is done to protect the traveling public from annoyance.

A chapter of the Royal Templars of Temperance, with fifty charter members, was organized at Pontiac, Mich. The society will promote temperance and prohibition, and also carry out a fraternal life insurance plan.

One of the grave charges brought against President Droppers of the University of South Dakota, was his serving wine at a dinner. The regents do not consider him an intemperate man but say a university president should be a total abstainer from wine and tobacco.

By action of the city council of Chicago all public grounds in the prohibition district of Hyde Park are to be freed from beer gardens. The next crusade of the Hyde Park Protective Association will be against the Lake-avenue levee with its saloons and disreputable houses.

Walter J. Gibbons, who has just been elected president of the Illinois Catholic Total Abstinence Association, is a well known justice of the peace in Chicago, and has been quite prominent in politics. Justice Gibbons has been connected with the total abstinence movement for twenty years.

Rev. Charles Stuer, pastor of the St. Bravo Flemish church of Mishawaka, Ind., is very bitter in his denunciation of saloonkeepers who do not respect the law. One erring saloonkeeper, who boasted that he rented two pews in the Flemish church and did not wish to be disturbed, promptly had his money returned by the pastor.

After eight years in office Mr. Joshua L. Baily has declined to serve any longer as president of the National Temperance Society. This decision was reached because Mr. Baily's residence in Philadelphia and his somewhat impaired health made it impossible for him to give the business of the New York office the personal attention he desired. His resignation was reluctantly and regretfully accepted.

During a recent meeting of bankers at Topeka, Kan. Captain Joe Waters said: "Between the business exactions of great employers and the prohibitory law, I care not which or both, or when or where or whom, the habit of drinking whisky in Kansas has been degraded. When a man on tip-toes goes after dark, down a dark alley, in a stable, closes the door, locks it, puts the key in his pocket, then moseys up the ladder, pulls the ladder up after him, closes the trap door, goes to the darkest corner of the hay mow and takes his nip from behind a pile of hay, education beyond the kindergarten period or primary class has got its work in on that man."

An international and national convention of Christian workers is called to meet May 1 and 2, 1904, at the World's Fair, St. Louis. The call is "To all the people who believe that war and unnecessary burdensome taxation should cease, and that the people should unite and henceforth demand a direct vote of the people on all questions of vital importance, and that Christ's golden rule should be applied to all government by and for the people." The purpose of the convention is for economic discussion and the nomination of a president and vice-president of the United States. It is suggested that one of these candidates be "an able Christian woman."

Abuse of Convict Labor in the South.

Ante Bellum Slavery Days Surpassed in Savagery—The Heathen at Our Own Door.

Clarissa Olds Keeler, Correspondent.

WHEN attending the Christian Workers' convention in New York in 1887 a man from Tennessee, also attending the convention, said to me: "I wonder the Christian people do not take up the work of alleviating the sufferings of prisoners in the southern states." For years he had been an eye witness to treatment which he described as "most atrocious," and the condition of the convicts, especially those hired to contractors to work in coal mines, as one of "starvation, fear and disgusting filth."

Since these words were spoken to me I have spared no pains to inform myself about this new and most revolting form of slavery, and I can find no words more applicable than these: "This is a people robbed and spoiled; they are all of them snared in holes, and they are hid in prison houses; they are for a prey, and none delivereth; for a spoil and none saith, Restore." (Isaiah 42:22.)

Each one of the twelve convict-leasing states has had its own bloody record which has been written down in God's book. Influential politicians, United States senators from both North and South, members of state legislatures, private citizens, heartless corporations, have all shared in the money coined out of the bodies and blood of convicts in our southern states.

But it is not my purpose now to go over the past. Wherever the convict-lease system has been introduced "its presence has," as a Georgian once said, "been marked by a trail of blood." The accounts of this ghastly institution are too revolting to present.

But I want to call the attention of Christian people to the present condition of convicts, most of whom are colored, and many of whom are guilty of but trifling offences, and some of none at all.

A man in Buncome county, North Carolina, wrote to the Asheville Gazette under date of March 15, 1903: "Where are we at, and where is the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, that they or the Christian world have never heard the cries from the poor unfortunate prisoners in the buck and the ringing of the cruel, blood-stained lash? I have seen white men beaten until their persons were blue, and blood oozing from the lash from the captain's hands in the Buncome chain-gang. And negroes—there is no use talking."

These prisoners, the writer says, have been guilty of some misdemeanor, and being poor and unable to pay a fine are "sent to the road prison, and there the lash is administered on the naked back contrary to the spirit of the constitution in abolishing imprisonment for debt, and the lash at the whipping-post."

Our Saviour's last act of mercy and forgiving love was shown toward a prisoner, and shall we imitate his example, or shall we not? His last command was: "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." How many inmates of our prisons have the gospel presented to them? When we all meet at the judgment, as meet we must, how many will be there from the mining pits and prison pens who can say truthfully, "No man cared for my soul?" Neither do we care for the bodies of these unfortunates; and as proof of this I will give you a few extracts from papers of recent date:

When the National Conference of Charities and Corrections was holding its session in Atlanta the first of the present month, some of the delegates were invited to visit the city prison stockade where misdemeanor convicts are housed at night. This was done "just for the amusement of the delegates." Hear what Mr. Timothy Nicholson, of Indiana, a delegate, said about his visit to this "school of crime." He says: "I found in one room 160 prisoners—white men and women, black men and women, and even children, both black and white, male and female, all mixed together indiscriminately. I was surprised and shocked to find such a condition of affairs in a civilized country. It is simply a shame and disgrace to civilization." The delegates declared the place "inhuman and degrading." Yet this does not fully represent the awful pen picture that might be given of this class of prisoners in the county chain-gangs all over the state.

The following extracts are taken from an account given by an Atlanta correspondent of the Washington Post written under date of May 5, 1903: "Revelations made to the Ware county grand jury in regard to the horrors of the Georgia convict camps reached Gov. Terrell today. Hon. Edward McRae, one of the leading members of the Georgia House of Representatives, is involved in the findings of the grand jury.

"According to the report McRae and his brother operate an extensive camp in Lowndes county. Witnesses before the grand jury testified that in the McRae camp the brutalities are such that it is revolting to describe them. For the slightest offense, it is alleged, prisoners are stripped and chained and unmercifully lashed by the whipping bosses. It is also alleged that the McRae brothers go into counties adjoining Lowndes, pay the fines of misdemeanor convicts, carry such convicts to their Ware county (convict) camp and there keep them in servitude long after the term for which the criminals were sentenced have expired.

"The grand jury claims that at least twenty citizens of Ware county are held as slaves in McRae's camp, altho their terms expired over a year ago. * * * These men are kept in a stockade about which armed guards march in order to prevent an escape, and men thus illegally detained who escaped have been chased by bloodhounds and recaptured."

Official reports show that this class of convicts is guilty of but trifling offenses, and some are vagrants. (For further particulars see Atlanta Journal, May 5 and 11, 1903.)

The penitentiary convicts of Georgia are worked in coal mines, and are subject to the same treatment. An experienced penologist said recently concerning convicts worked in the mines: "In the rooms of the mines are perpetrated practices too horrible to mention. They become the nesting places of a beastiality that in many cases lead the liberated convict into that crime to punish which the mob, the rope, and the stake are ever ready." (See Atlanta Constitution, May 14, 1903.)

Under the heading, "Convict Camp Horrors," the editor of the Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial Appeal, says in his paper dated April 11, 1903, concerning the facts recently brought out by the legislative investigating committee: "The stories coming from Brushy Mountain mines, with side lights from the state's convict system generally, furnish painful reading to the people of Tennessee. * * * When human beings who, thru fault or fortune's untowardness, are condemned to helpless and unresisting servitude, and who are subjected to torments and tortures, floggings and flagellations which are merciful only where they terminate in speedy death, humanity is outraged and a sort of savagery in the public cries out for speedy vengeance." Continuing the editor says:

"Convicts have been whipped to death. Convicts have been whipped into physical helplessness. Convicts have been whipped sufficiently to keep them in bed for months and injure them permanently. * * * Torturing them in the prison or in the mine recesses is a sin against high heaven." These are some of the facts brought to light by the prison investigating committee.

The average number of prisoners worked in the Brushy Mountain mines is about 750. These convicts, which form but a part of the number of the state's convicts, and who were so inhumanly treated, earned last year for the state, clear of all expenses, the sum of $195,700. (See Nashville American, March 30, 1903.)

Recent developments also show that many innocent men are kidnaped and worked and treated as convicts; especially is this done in Alabama. Women and children share the same fate. During the recent investigation into the enforced slavery of negroes in Alabama by the United States Secret Service, among the abuses which were unearthed was the whipping to death of a negro woman. "This woman, accused of being rebellious, was laid across a log and given one hundred lashes. Still showing a rebellious spirit, her hands were tied, and the rope was thrown over the limb of a tree and pulled up, so as to make it barely possible for her feet to reach the ground. The woman, it is said, died two days later." (See Washington Times, May 29, 1903.)

The system of peonage slavery has been practiced for years in Alabama and Georgia. One of the most successful plans practiced is to bring a negro before a magistrate on a flimsy charge. As the matter has been arranged beforehand, the negro is convicted, and having no money to pay his fine, a white man offers to advance him money, provided the negro will make a labor contract with him for the money and trouble he has taken to keep the negro out of jail. He is taken away and begins what is usually a long term of cruel servitude, frequently whipped unmercifully, and every moment watched by guards ready to shoot him down at any attempt to escape.

Among the evils which have grown out of the prison contract system, the number of which is legion, is that of turning out men and women, boys and girls, thoroly educated in these schools of crime. They are thrown upon the world homeless and friendless to poison and destroy those with whom they come in contact. Many soon find their way back into prison, and some end life upon the gallows.

When the book is opened and we hear the words, "I was sick, and in prison, and ye visited me not," what are we going to answer?

Washington, D. C.

A DRAMATIC OBJECT LESSON.

Jane A. Stewart, Correspondent.

The cause of child labor in Pennsylvania seems to have received a much needed impetus from the dramatic object lesson afforded by the present strike which involves thousands of mill operatives,—men, women and children, in the vast textile industries of Philadelphia.

When the strike for a reduction of working hours from the legal sixty hours per week to fifty-five hours, was proposed the women and children factory workers in Philadelphia were the first to assent. In the great parade, incident to the strike, the most noticeable feature was the exhibit of child workers—the long lines of little laborers who have been forced into the ranks of bread-winners. Altho the present state law, defective as it is, forbids the employment of children in factories and stores under the age of thirteen, it was evident to the onlookers that hundreds of the boys and girls marching in the procession were not over eight or ten years of age. Many mother-hearts sighed heavily and tears came to many eyes as these child toilers streamed steadily by in seemingly endless ranks carrying their pathetic banners: 'We want to go to School;" "Our Parents are Textile Workers," "We Have the Schools and Ought to Use Them." It was scarcely credible to the onlookers that such little tots were permitted to work in mills in the great benevolent city founded by William Penn. No more striking appeal for shorter hours of labor could have been made than this marshalling of the toiling children before the public gaze.

The daily schedule of child laborers in Philadelphia is as follows: Work is begun at 6:45 a m.; three quarters of an hour is allowed for dinner at noon; work is resumed and continued until 6:15 at night. Children who live at a distance from their place of employment must walk all the way as they cannot afford to ride; many children walk two miles daily to and from their work; and their lives are made up of little else than work and sleep. In addition the nature of the work in many mills makes it necessary to keep the windows almost entirely closed forbidding the free circulation of the air which is loaded with dust from the yarns and worsted stuffs, causing many pulmonary complaints.

It is estimated that fully fifteen per cent of the children in Philadelphia mills are under the legal working age altho their parents and guardians have sworn that they are thirteen. It is evident that under these conditions the responsibility lies, not so much upon the manufacturer as upon those who should safeguard the proper training and rearing of the children.

Undoubtedly, however, enforcement would be easier if the law was changed to place the limit at sixteen years or even fourteen years as in Massachusetts, Illinois and other leading states, where a similar problem has to be met. The common plea of the parents that they need the wages earned by these premature toilers is proved to be invalid. And the state has everything to gain by the protection of its childhood; for a stunted youth means inevitably a decrepit and dependent manhood.

Whatever the outcome of the present strike, it has served in most timely way to draw public attention to the serious evil of child labor and to stimulate popular sentiment until it brings about effective legislation.

The National Educational Association.

Louise E. Purington, M. D., Correspondent.

Boston, July 8:—Boston is alive with pedagogy. Last week it was Christian Science. The week before an immense throng at the unveiling of the statue to the memory of Gen. Joe Hooker. But no one seems more at home in Boston than the pedagog;—the college town of the universe, the home of the first public school in America.

As Union Signal reporter your correspondent has been awarded all press advantages. These availed nothing, however, in the densely packed Mechanics' Building at the opening general session. The teachers were mightily in evidence and women the great majority. None of these last were on the platform, but they prevailed in the pews. Your reporter could only liken the situation to a great National W. C. T. U. convention conducted by its honorary members! Charles W. Eliot, president of Harvard University, most honorary of all.

Several auxiliary organizations are holding sessions at this time, notably the National Federation of Teachers, the National Council, the fifth annual Lake Placid Conference on Home Economics.

It is safe to say that no meeting of the association was ever more largely attended or ever elicited more general interest. The preparations to receive this great company have also been commensurate with the need. The editor of the Journal of Education, Rev. A. E. Winship, has helped to keep things lively, and also contributed to the general intelligence by his excellent paper.

The Transcript, Boston's model great daily, editorially and otherwise, has championed especially the Federation of Grade Teachers, Margaret A. Haley, of Chicago, the national president. The wonders worked in Chicago by this heroic woman and her allies are matters of history. They are full of prophecy, not only of justice and righteousness but of higher standards and greater appreciation of the vast army bearing the heat and burden of the day in our public schools.

The Work in Minnesota.

Two Successful District Conventions—Encouraging Reports.

Mary E. Hoover, Correspondent.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., July 6:—Hennepin District W. C. T. U. held its annual meeting June 16-17 in Simpson M. E. Church, Minneapolis, the guest of the Eighth Ward Union. Scientific Temperance Instruction, Mothers' Meetings, Medal Contests, Press, Jail and Prison, Y Work, Christian Citizenship, Sabbath Observance represent lines of active work. Y Work, Mrs. Warrington, superintendent, has become better understood by means of the quarterly conference of the Y's. The special work is the attendance upon the Union City Mission. Medal Contest work, Mrs. Anna Lyons, superintendent, has witnessed a year of activity; seventeen silver medal contests, three gold medal, two grand gold medal and one diamond medal contest having been held. Six unions have superintendents.

The following unions gave reports: Como, Western Avenue, Lucy Hayes, Frances Neal, Mary T. Lathrop, Eighth Ward, Orono, Willard, Hollister, Alice R. Palmer, Camden, Excelsior, Sunrise, Holbrook, Helping Hand, Nelle Burger Y and Willard Y.

The Minneapolis conference of unions reported meetings devoted to school savings banks, primary elections, anti-cigaret work and purity work, prohibition, and anti-saloon league work.

A diamond medal contest was a feature of the first evening. The second evening was platform night.

Mrs. Hester Griffith, president of the Los Angeles Federation of Unions; Mrs. Anna Moore, of Ohio (a crusader); Mrs. Cedarholm, of Marine, Minn., were made members of the convention. The enthusiasm and earnest determination following a conference of such merit as this convention provided is sure to result in a great uplift in the many communities represented. Mrs. Frances Neal, now past her threescore years and ten, presided with all her usual skill and Hennepin district owes her a great debt of love for her long years of faithful and effective service.

MRS. EVA WATERMAN,
President Ninth District.

MISS ANNIE ROBBINS,
Engaged for a year in Minnesota.

MRS. FRANCES NEAL,
President Hennepin District.

The ninth district comprises the organized counties of Anoka, Sherburne and Wright, and Isanti county, unorganized. The annual convention was held at Anoka June 18-19, Vice-president Mrs. Helen C. Gee presiding. Representatives were present from the unions of Anoka, Rockford, Buffalo, Monticello and Elk River, while Howard Lake and Big Lake sent reports. Reports from all unions showed progress and a good understanding of W. C. T. U. duties.

This district is developing workers and interest, and the experienced workers who are again in charge promise a faithful year, Mrs. Eva Waterman, president, being state superintendent of Sunday-school work and president of the Elk River union.

Separate Statehood Without Saloons Advocated—Work of Organizers.

Martha Gilmore, Correspondent.

MUSKOGEE, I. T., July 9.—There has been a radical change of sentiment in Indian Territory on the statehood question. People seem to be almost unanimously in favor of separate statehood. The union has been exerting all its influence in favor of a prohibition state and the Indian Statehood Convention at Eufaula, May 21, has had great weight. The Muskogee Y has started a young men's petition in favor of a prohibition state and the union has adopted resolutions endorsing the action of the Eufaula convention and is taking steps to have these resolutions sent to various congressmen and leading temperance workers.

Mrs. Lila Carlin Moore has been doing lecturing and organizing since April 1. She has organized eight new unions and four L. T. L.'s. Prior to June 1 she had added to the ranks seventy-five active members, forty-five honoraries and sixty-nine Legioners, and had secured nearly 400 pledge signers. If the treasurers succeed in getting in the dues Indian Territory will be heard on Jubilee Night at Cincinnati.

Mrs. A. P. McDonald has been actively preparing for the School of Methods at Sulphur, Aug 2-16, and is now on a tour of field work in the western part of the Chickasaw Nation. She is raising money for the expenses at Sulphur as well as doing regular lecturing and organizing work.

Chelsea union dedicated their reading room, May 11, and they have a fine lot of books, magazines, and papers.

Muskogee union has arranged to place on the street water barrels from which anyone can secure a good, cool drink.

Ardmore union has had with them Mrs. Maria Weed, of Chicago, and Miss Madaline Southard, of Kansas.

The district conventions will be held in July and August and the territorial convention at Tahlequah, Sept. 2, 3 and 4. We are anticipating having our National corresponding secretary, Mrs. Fry, and Mrs. Zehner and Mrs. McDonald at the convention. In addition to these we hope to have at the school of methods Mrs. Lila Carlin Moore and her daughter, Mrs. Purington, of Ft. Worth, Texas. The school of methods and the district convention are new features of the work here. The cause is gaining strength surely and steadily.

Berks County Alert and Active—Wise Plans of Wise Workers.

H. Frances Jones, Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., June 20.—I am glad to be able to give you cheering news of the activity of the workers in our good old Keystone state, and what is being done in many places.

Mrs. Myra M. Stauffer, president of Berks county, writes a bright letter describing a wonderful work in that county. A series of meetings were held in Reading, with Mrs. E. Norine Law as speaker. These were followed by an anti-polygamy mass-meeting, at which Dr. Sarah Elliott was speaker. Then came two institutes, at Mohrsville and Mohns Ville, respectively. The graduating exercises of the L. T. L. were largely attended. Cards of invitation numbering thousands were sent out to other organizations and prominent people. All the meetings were running over with interest and enthusiasm. New members have been gained and finances are satisfactory.

MISS. S. E. WENTZEL, MRS. K. A. FICHTHORN,
MRS. M. M. STAUFFER,
County and Local Presidents.

In Northumberland county our cause is doing well, with Miss Margaretta Watson as president, and Mrs. Mary E. March as press superintendent. At Milton a delightful and resultful parlor meeting was held at the home of the Misses Bailey; twenty-three members were added to the union. Our women here are trying to show what the W. C. T. U. is doing.

In Elk county, with Mrs. Emma Condon as leader, Mrs. Little is doing much to keep our literature before the workers and induce pastors to read THE UNION SIGNAL and "Bulletin."

Lackawanna county is having enjoyable meetings, and is working with a will to advance the work. Dr. Martha De Graw, county president, keeps the workers in "marching trim."

The Philadelphia County convention held recently (June 7) was one of the best. The attendance was large and interest unusual. Among the twenty-six departments great progress was reported by Mothers' meetings, Anti-Narcotics and Social meetings. The thirty-two public meetings held jointly by state and county were a marked feature of the winter's work. two new unions reported a gain of nearly one hundred members, so that the county intends to be among the number sharing honors on "benefit night" at the state convention.

The unanimous re-election of the officers shows that the white-ribboners of the county are satisfied with their leaders. The superintendents vied with each other in avancing their departments and all gave evidence of earnest endeavor to excel. The resolutions were "strong and to the point." The Northwest Philadelphia W, with the steady working Y and Senior L. T. L. formed a "triple alliance" to beautifully entertain the convention and being held in Union M. E. church all combined to make the day an especially happy one. Miss Jennie Smith was present and heard of thousands of bouquets distributed on Memorial day. She spoke in glowing terms of the great work accomplished thru this beautiful tribute of remembrance. The West Philadelphia W are rejoicing in the purchase of a fine large house and garden for their headquarters. Mrs. Russell and her corps are energetic in every good work and we predict "More to follow" in their work at headquarters. A splendid social meeting held recently took the form of a model mothers' meeting led by Mrs. Cheston, Miss Williamson of Belmont avenue being the hostess.

W. C. T. U. Work in Kansas Chautauquas.

Mrs. L. B. Smith, Correspondent.

OTTAWA, Kan., July 8.—The Winfield Chautauqua Assembly has just closed its seventeenth annual session. There were many notable improvements in Island Park. Three new departments have been added to the curriculum of study, "The Kindergarten," "The Sunday School and Teachers' Institute," and the Y. M. C. A. The management assured me that this year had been a very successful one. The "Congress of Reforms," under the auspices of the Kansas W. C. T. U., and the efficient leadership of Mrs. E. P. Hutchinson, was conducted daily in the Tabernacle at 11 a. m.

Rev. Eugenia F. St. John, National evangelist, gave two magnificent addresses. Rev. Mary Sibbitt, state lecturer and organizer, gave a powerful address, "Courage and Backbone." Rev. A. A. Parker, pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, Wichita, gave a lecture based on personal observation connected with our great seaports.

Mrs. M. J. Grinstead, state lecturer, greatly pleased her hearers. Mrs. Dorothy Cleveland, president Oklahoma W. C. T. U., read an instructive paper, "The Child's Inheritance." An animated discussion followed, in which teachers, preachers and mothers participated.

The W. C. T. U. work in the summer assemblies is one of expansion. They have been invited to become an educational factor in the six that have been established in Kansas. Mrs. Hutchinson was not able to accept them all this year, viz., those at Ottawa, Winfield, Beloit and Cawker City.

At the W. C. T. U. headquarters was an abundance of splendid literature and papers. The state paper, Our Messenger, THE UNION SIGNAL and Crusader Monthly were there before we arrived. This courtesy of THE UNION SIGNAL managers is appreciated and we hope a large subscription list has reached the office. The entire charge of this was given into the care of Mrs. N. A. Boren, of Winfield, president of the third district. Ottawa Chautauqua Assembly opened July 6.

The Anti-Opium War Still On.

By Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts. Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The Secretary of War, Hon. Elihu Root, has granted a hearing to Bishop J. M. Thoburn, many years resident in the Orient, who advocates for the Philippines the adoption of Japan's successful prohibition of opium rather than any "revenue" measure, such as England has followed so disastrously in India and China

This hearing should be supported, as infantry supports artillery, by a volley of brief, courteous letters to Secretary Root in favor of Japan's law, of which the following is the chief article: "Opium shall be sold by the government only, and only for medical purposes." Selected druggists are permitted to fill prescriptions duly authorized, full records of which must be kept on file for ten years.

The opium monopoly bill has been stayed by a volley of protests, but constructive work for a proper law is now needed. Japan has made such a record on this matter that it is safe for new comers to the Orient to follow its example.

YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH

Conducted by Mrs. Clara Parrish-Wright, General Secretary.

An Interpreter for Miss Smart—A Word for the Y Almanac.

MY DEAR STATE SECRETARIES: I hope you have all received ere this my personal letter of thanks for your part in enabling us to win the World's Y Banner at Geneva, but I desire also to express my appreciation thru THE UNION SIGNAL because in this way I reach the hundreds of district. county, and local officers who have helped, and without whose aid you could have accomplished little. I want to say "I thank you" to them for you as well as for myself. After all, it is only because of their interest, zeal, love, and self-sacrifice that we are the proud possessors of this beautiful trophy today, and not because of what you and I have done .

I want to thank state treasurers again also—both those who have helped and those who are going to help—and suggest that in case they have sent in an installment of dues in which they did not include the Y's that they correct it in their next report by denominating as many W's Y's as they denominated Y's W's before. This is what Miss Cram did in Illinois two years ago, and the result was the same in the end.

I do not want to make any one feel too bad, but in order that all may have a clearer understanding of the progress we have made in our efforts to better systematize the work I append herewith the names of the states which reported Y dues separately last year. We have spoken of the number as thirty, but you see it is really only twenty-seven, tho the list represents thirty state organizations. As has been intimated before, this apparent "inharmony" may not be due to any dereliction on the part of state treasurers, but elsewhere "in the line of succession," so let all Y secretaries in all states not represented in this list organize a "court of inquiry" at once. Thus we may be able to report a nearly doubled membership (doubled since the Portland convention) at Cincinnati in October next. Do I say too much about dues? Nothing else counts, you know, at the close of the year.

Part of the letter received from Miss Smart I want to share with you: "At last it looks as tho I am to secure the long searched for and much needed helper, a capable young woman who is an earnest Christian and a graduate of Mount Holyoke College in America. Word was brought me tonight since I began this letter that there is a possibility of my getting her. I do hope so, for there are so many, many things I want to do for the women over here and cannot reach them without an interpreter. . .

A word more in regard to the interpreter. In case she comes to me she leaves a good position in a private school where she has been for years practically the principal. Under the circumstances I would be obliged to keep her permanently for a year or two at least, and should wish to do so during all my stay in this country. . . . . Now comes the financial part of it. I find that her salary and traveling expenses will cost me 60 yen a month ($30 gold), possibly more. But in case it is more I will try to cover the balance out of my allowance. Will the Y's of the United States be able to manage this amount, think you? How did they respond to the call for meetings on April 14? I cannot go ahead and secure this young woman, much as I need her, until I feel sure that funds will be forthcoming with which to pay her. Please write me what you think is best to do under these circumstances."

I have written her, dear comrades, that you have responded most encouragingly to the call for aid, and my faith reaches an amount quite adequate to cover all this expense. This faith reaches us thru Him to you, and I have your co-operation assured in advance.

Here is another paragraph from her letter which will give you still a better idea of her need of funds: "I have already struck the first blow for 'preventive purity' work in the form of a 'White Cross' society, and with its assistance hope to get out several leaflets to use among the students and men generally. Considerable interest is being manifested among some of the medical fraternity and I hope soon to see a 'National Medical ssociation' under way. O there is so much to do and so little to do with! I could use a thousand dollars this minute if I had it, and where it would count for wonders toward helping this nation upward."

In this connection I would like to speak of the Almanac for 1904, which is absorbing my best thought just now, as it must be in the printer's hand early next month. Do you know that altho we claim a membership of half a million in our White Ribbon organization, 5,000 copies of this beautiful booklet is the highest number we have yet felt secure in publishing? It is true, however, that this year the demand overran the edition and inspires our courage for a larger edition for 1904. The fact remains, nevertheless, that we have never reached local unions with the Almanac, and that if we could reach them we would quadruple our sales at least. It would be an enormous undertaking for me to attempt to do this from my office, but would it not be possible for you, state secretaries, to compass your territory? What do you think the returns would be if you sent sample copies to all presidents or secretaries? Of course I would have to hear from you before feeling justified in incurring the extra expense. Will you not send me a postal card stating your opinion immediately upon reading this?

The states of New York and Texas have just ordered twenty-five and twenty Year Books respectively. Will not other states do the same? I have still about 300 copies I would like to put in the hands of local unions.

At the Portland Conference Miss Elizabeth Thomas of Pennsylvania was made chairman of the committee for the revision of all our literature. She is ready to begin her work now, and I want to ask that all secretaries will send her their state leaflets. Also that they will tell her what new leaflets they would like to have. Her present address is 1902 Wallace St., Philadelphia.

Yours to serve, sacrifice, and save,

CLARA PARRISH-WRIGHT.

Massachusetts Y Conference.

THE fifth semi-annual conference of the Massachusetts Y. W. C. T. U. was held at Attleboro May 13 and 14. The conference opened with a consecration service, the leader bringing out very helpful lessons from our state motto, "Look up, Lift up; Trust and Do." After the greetings, response, appointment of committees and other business, the state corresponding secretary, Mrs. H. T. Todd, gave an inspiring talk to the girls under the title of: "Advice from our Mother Organization." A letter of love and greetings from the Massachusetts Y's was written to Mrs. Stevenson and signed by all the delegates present. This letter was to be handed the state president, with other steamer letters, just as she was leaving for the World's Convention.

A paper: "The Necessity of Physical Culture in the Training of Young Women," was read by a delegate from the Northfield (Somerset) Y, after which a short demonstration was given, in which the delegates took part.

In the evening the president of the Attleboro union, Mrs. Bigney, opened her pretty home for a reception to delegates and friends. This was a success in every way, and the delegates were thus brought together socially, and thereby being better able to talk over Y plans at the conference the day following. Thursday morning a praise and promise meeting was held, after which the report of the largest Y in the United States was given: i. e., Lynn. This union is not only large in numbers, but it is probably carrying on today as great a work as any other individual union in the nation. The morning was filled with reports from unions, discussions, a talk on "Our Affiliated Interests," and the state work, the "Frances E. Willard Settlement."

Among the resolutions adopted were the following:

That we continue in our efforts to bring our work before the public thru the press department and public meetings.

That we adopt the following suggestions: (a) That we train vice-president to preside at our meetings; (b) That we have a yearly printed program of work; (c) That we take up the Loyal Temperance Legion work; (d) That we recommend to the county presidents to have a visiting Loyal Temperance Legion superintendent; (e) That we each do all in our power to aid in the twentieth century crusade; (f) That we increase our interest by holding medal contests.

That we do more to sustain our affiliated interests, i. e.: (a) That each union give at least 25 cents annually toward the Y bed in National Hospital; (b) That we subscribe to Our Message; (c) That we continue in the following resolution as adopted last year: That we do all in our power to aid the Frances E. Willard Settlement and if possible each Y union raise $25 annually for the same, thus supporting our own work and cheering the heart of our beloved Miss Caswell.

We feel a great step was taken forward when the Y's voted to make this conference (aside from the regular annual conference at the time of state convention) an annual affair.

MAY B. GOUDEY, State Sec'y.

A "German Market."

An especially fine young woman's number is the June "White Ribbon Bulletin" (North Dakota). Mrs. Grover is to be especially congratulated for securing contributions from so many of our leaders. We quote from it an account of a unique entertainment, hoping that it may prove suggestive to someone else: "Park River Y gave a successful entertainment lately which may be of interest to sister unions. We called it a 'German Market' and people were requested to come and buy their suppers from 5 to 8 o'clock. Six gaily decorated booths were lined up on one side of the hall placarded with the names and prices of their contents. Visitors, on entering, were given plate and napkin (we should have had baskets but could not get enough) and instructed to do their own marketing. Sandwiches of various kinds graced the first booth; weinerwurst and sauerkraut were dispensed in the next; creamy Dutch cheese and hot baked beans were to be had in the third; salads and pickles in the fourth; North Dakota pretzels, coffee cake and doughnuts in the fifth; and coffee, tea, sweet milk and butter milk in the sixth, prices ranging from one to three cents. Ten cents was charged for admission to the hall, which, with the small prices at the booths, made the supper average about 25 cents for each person. The affair was pronounced a decided success by everybody present and several requests were made for a repetition, so that we think of reproducing it in the near future with some changes, each booth representing a different nation in decorations, costumes, and viands."

Y Gleanings.

Miss Margaret Bilz is the new state secretary for Michigan.

The "Ensign Y" of Cleveland, O., observed its anniversary June 22.

Dr. Ellen A. Willis, of Los Angeles, is the new secretary for Southern California.

Mrs. Minnie E. Kirtland, Texas' new Y secretary, has gone to work in earnest, and faith reaches large results.

Tho she has been able to work only a comparatively small part of the time, Mrs. Cora E. Seberry has organized five Y's this year.

Her American comrades, and indeed all who know her, will rejoice to learn of Miss Christine Tinling's appointment as World's missionary at Geneva.

Whenever Miss Harriet Montgomery, Nebraska's state secretary, cannot organize a Y she forms an L. T. L., thus providing for the future of our branch.

The new East Baltimore Y, organized by the "graduating" Y last year, has grown from twenty-nine to 125 members. This new society also conducts an L. T. L. of 113 members.

At an entertainment given by the W. C. T. U. of Franklin, N. H., our work in foreign lands was demonstrated by young women dressed in the costumes and carrying the flags of various countries.

Prescott (Ark.) Y's gave a reception to Miss Mosher on her recent visit to that place. About fifty were present. Miss Mosher left a delightful impression. They also gave a reception to the returning college girls, issuing about 150 invitations.

Willard Y of Tacoma, Wash., held a unique social affair April 21. The event was to celebrate the birthday of Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, and the proceeds—from an admission price of 10 cents—almost $11, were for Miss Smart's interpreter in Japan. It was a World's missionary meeting, and young ladies dressed in beautiful costumes, representing some of the different countries in which Y work is being done, gave short reports of that work. These reports were interspersed with musical selections. The costumes were very artistic, several of them being native and coming from the "old countries," such as the Icelandic, Swedish and Philippinic. The young ladies went to the platform in groups, such as Great Britain with her Scotch, Canadian and Irish daughters. The young ladies entered into their characters with enthusiasm, and were complimented on their pleasing appearance, the costumes enhancing rather than detracting from their beauty. The affair was very successful, and we recommend it to other Y's as an entertainment both instructive and entertaining.—White Ribbon Bulletin.

MR. WILSON L. GILL.

A NEW PLAN OF MORAL AND CIVIC TRAINING.

By Jane A. Stewart.

A SIGNIFICANT development of the self-government idea for pupils of the public schools, and one which will deeply interest the W. C. T. U., is seen in the "School City" plan.

Miss Willard was one of the first to recognize the value of discipline "of the students, by the students, for the students." While dean of the Woman's College of the Northwestern University she devised a working scheme of self-government for the young women under her care which has been the model of all similar systems in educational institutions.

So highly did President Roosevelt consider this plan of moral and civic training as embodied in the "School City," which had been successfully tried in an East Side school in New York, that when General Wood was appointed military governor of Cuba, he invited the author of the "School City," Mr. Wilson L. Gill, of New York, to go to Cuba as supervisor of our educational work there. Mr. Gill introduced his method in all the public schools of Cuba in 1900-02, with such unqualified success that the government is planning to send him on a similar mission to the Philippines.

The white-ribboners will be especially interested to know that the World's W. C. T. U. missionary, Mrs. Addie Northam Fields, while working in the public schools in Cuba, aided greatly in the promotion of the school-city method, which she found to be a practical vehicle for the temperance work and strongly affiliated with it. In the Republic of Mexico, thanks to Mrs. Fields' good offices, the plan has also been favorably received by Governor Teodoro De Hesa.

The purpose of the School City is to give practical effect to the theory that the child who is taught to govern himself and help others, always striving to keep the right in mind, will grow up a better man and a better citizen. Mr. Gill, who is founder and president of the American Patriotic League, was impressed with the need of moral and civic training for the children, and evolved the idea of the School City. In his plant, each school becomes a juvenile cosmopolitan community, which governs itself under the wise direction of the teachers, in almost exact counterpart of the city charter. Each room of the school is a ward of the School City. All the children are citizens, boys and girls alike, who elect one of their own number as mayor. They select magistrates, judges, policemen, city councillors and public health directors. The principal of the school becomes the governor of the community, and the teachers are the advisers and directors.

Each class is represented in the common council by from two to four councillors, who may meet fortnightly, after school, for the purpose of taking action on any subject to come before them.

The director of public safety, or police commissioner, appointed by the mayor, in turn appoints a number of police, who are on duty in the schoolyards before school and at recess. There is a board of health, composed of inspectors for each room, who see that the children are provided with handkerchiefs, keep the streets (aisles) clean, etc. The work of the board of charities is most interesting. It send things to hospitals at Thanksgiving and Christmas, toys to missions, etc. The magistrate's court quickly decides the small offences.

The school yard is much quieter. The teachers are freer during recess; less of the teacher's energy is required in discipline and more strength left for the actual work of imparting knowledge. The beauty of the plan is that, once started, it is automatic and works itself. The sustained interest and enthusiasm for it wherever it has been tried seems to be its best recommendation.

The idea of enlisting the pupil from the first day he enters in taking an active interest in the community life of the school becomes practical under the School City method. A woman principal of a large typical American city school, in Philadelphia, having 500 children of eight nationalities, both rich and poor, under instruction, where the School City method has been practiced for the past six years with great success, declares to the numerous visitors: "It is for the most part spirit and atmosphere, and how can I exhibit spirit? Of course, when there is an election, and that is seldom, you can see the children vote, but that is all over in a few minutes. The spirit is changed, the boys are more manly and the girls more womanly, yet they are not in the slightest oppressed by their responsibilities. They are not less gay, happy and childlike because they themselves put a check upon deception, improper language, unkindness to each other, the defacing of public and private property, the mischievous ringing of doorbells, hanging on the backs of street cars and wagons, or because they encourage fair play and consideration."

An interesting and significant phase of the plan is seen in the fact that the School City involves citizenship for girls as well as for boys, and that the girls perform their duties as well as the boys. The effect of this on the future men and women is pleasant to anticipate.

Altho the first experiment of the School City was made seven years ago, it has only recently begun to receive recognition in this country. The great success of the initial school in Philadelphia led to a resolution by the city's board of education this spring, throwing open the entire school system of Philadelphia to the application of the idea. The introduction of the system in response to requests has kept Mr. Gill busy, no less than fifteen schools having adopted the plan at the present writing.

Mr. Gill, the author of the method, is a Yale graduate, and a native of Ohio, and it is interesting to note that he is a total abstainer as well as a devoted worker for children.

Readers of THE UNION SIGNAL who are desirous to learn more concerning the work can communicate with Mr. Gill at the Franklin Institute, Philadelphia.

A Noted Labor Leader and His Work.

By Belle Kearney.

JUNE 13 was a gala day in the little mining town of Arnot, Pa. The demonstration was in honor of William Wilson, the secretary and treasurer of the United Mine Workers' Association of America, who was born there. A cold rain was descending, but despite this uncomfortable fact the people came from near and from far until the hamlet was fairly overrun with its guests. There was a procession of hundreds of miners, a brass band, and at the last a carriage containing four men—chief among them the renowned president of the United Mine Workers' Association, John Mitchell. Mr. Samuel Sexton, editor of the national organ, and Mr. Wilson accompanied him.

JOHN MITCHELL.

Many persons here beheld for the first time the famous leader of the United Mine Workers. Mr. Mitchell is a man of middle height, splendid physique, erect, alert, with a leonine head, clear-cut, noble features and dark eyes full of intelligence and tenderness. He sat smiling calmly at the delighted crowd, holding in his hands an immense bunch of red roses.

The visitors formed a heterogeneous mass. On my right was a Catholic priest, and just beyond him was a member of the Pennsylvania legislature—that wonderful assemblage that passes laws for the protection of frogs at certain seasons of the year, but always fails to protect little boys from the ravages of the legalized saloon—back of me was an Episcopal rector; by him the president of a W. C. T. U., while near at hand was a young lady teacher from Scotland, who later recited a fine poem on "The Miners' Wives."

Mr. Samuel Sexton was the first speaker of the day, and among other fine things he gave an admirable resumé of John Mitchell's work. He said:

"When President Mitchell was elected in 1898; there were about 32,000 members of the organization. Today there are over 300,000. When he entered upon his office, there was chaos among the miners of the United States. They were rent with strife, distrustful, dissatisfied, with every man's hand against his brother. Today there is the utmost harmony, absolute trust, and a fine, brotherly feeling. During the first year of his presidency, there were mined 251,000,000 tons of coal in the United States. In 1902, there were mined 295,000,000 of tons. The average price paid in 1899 was 34 cents per ton, amounting to $85,000,000 in round numbers, paid alone to miners. During the national convention this year, Mr. Bogle, one of the most extensive operators in Indiana and Illinois, brought figures from the operators' book to prove that the United Mine Workers had advanced wages 80 per cent during the past five years—during President Mitchell's term of office. Taking his figures for it, it means that the average price paid for mining last year was 61 cents per ton. That is to say that thru the United Mine Workers this 295,000,000 of tons mined last year netted the miners alone the enormous sum of $179.950,000, an increase over 1898 of $94,610,000. And yet, they will tell you that labor organizations do the workers no good.

"During these five years President Mitchell has conducted and won two of the greatest strikes in the world, besides three others, involving from 20,000 to 30,000 men in each. The hours of labor have been cut down from twelve and ten to eight; but the two greatest of his achievements have been his successful crusade against child-labor and the character and standing he has given the miners. It was but a few short years ago that the general public regarded the miners as the lowest class of men. But the dignity, the decency, the ability President Mitchell exhibited during the trying times when the searchlight of the public was upon him, caused the people to examine them, and the verdict of the American public is that the miners, as a class, are the most intelligent and the most conservative of all trades unionists. The public found out some other things during those crucial moments. They found that not only was the president capable of meeting the shrewdest, the most powerful among the leaders in business, in law, in politics, but that he was surrounded by diplomats and financiers second to none anywhere. * * * When the convention in July determined that the bituminous miners should hold their contracts sacred, and support their striking brethren, there came a perfect deluge of subscriptions for their relief. Inside of thirty days there were over 100,000 donations sent Secretary Wilson, ranging in amounts from five cents to $50,000."

John Mitchell's speech, which was eagerly listened to by the large audience, was a masterly apology for trades-unions, and eulogy for their work and aims. While space will not permit us to reproduce his words, we must give a short sketch of the early life of this truly remarkable man.

When a boy of ten he worked on a farm, and at thirteen began to delve in the mines; and continued in this work for thirteen years, getting his meager education at a night school. This man who entered the labor movement at twenty-six and by the sheer force of his well-balanced brain and strength of purpose held his own against the mightiest combination of business ability and money power ever pitted against a single individual and came off victorious, must be a man of rare ability and force of character. This man of the masses speaks with the perfect ease of the finished orator. His voice is rich and softly modulated; an occasional slip in pronunciation being the only evidence of his early lack of culture.

There were more drunken men among that multitude of miners that day than I ever beheld in one company before. John Mitchell is performing his mission by gaining higher wages, shorter hours and immunity from child labor—but the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has a mighty charge to keep in saving the miner from a drunkard's life and his wife and children from the shame and poverty of the saloon curse. It is one of my dreams to realize a coalition of the labor and temperance reforms. It may not be possible to effect this officially, as John Mitchell remarked to me the other day, but, as he says, it may be done sympathetically. I hope that these words from the leaders of the labor movement may be helpful to our W. C. T. U. comrades in gaining a better insight into the situation.

Chapter XIX.

WHEN, with characteristic ardor, Hugh threw in his lot with Sam and Sam's friends, it inevitably followed that he had little time to spare for Mrs. Langley. That he deliberately avoided her drawing-room did not at once occur to the lady's mind, but none the less did she resent his neglect, and before long certain caustic remarks upon the fickleness of the world in general aroused Dr. Mann's attention to the fact that she considered herself slighted by someone in particular.

"D'ye mean Brotherton?" he asked bluntly. "What nonsense! He has taken up with the lads, and that's far better for him than hanging about a lady's drawing-room, to say nothing of them."

Nevertheless, in his fear lest "Ethel" should lose heart, and be worsted in the war she was still waging with herself, he casually remarked in the curate's hearing that Mrs. Langley had been wondering what had become of him.

Hugh called, reluctantly enough, the next day, and was temporarily set at ease, for the talk turned, not on himself, but on Sam Widgery.

"Ah, I have great hopes of Sam," he said, with something of his old eagerness; "you see, even when he was by way of being a bad lot, everything he did was perfectly open for everyone to see, and probably will be just as open still. It's easy to deal with a fellow like that. If he should happen to slip, all the world would know it."

"And you count that among his advantages?"

"I should consider it far better for him than secret drinking," said Hugh grimly.

Mrs. Langley regarded him with strange deliberation, and as, inadvertently, he looked up after speaking, their eyes met.

"What do you mean?" asked the lady slowly. "One would think that you suspected some of us of drinking in secret."

"No, I don't suspect you of anything so bad as that," said Hugh, as grimly as before.

He was looking at the carpet now, but his color heightened, and for the moment Mrs. Langley more than half suspected that the disclaimer was a lie.

If Bob had dared to reveal the secret that for years had been so carefully guarded!

Altho Hugh immediately changed the subject, she sat closely watching his downcast face, and suddenly another suspicion darted into her mind—only to be thrust angrily out again.

"Not that! It could not be! No, no; it could not be!"

Yet no sooner was she left alone than she found herself face to face with the most serious doubt of the Rev. Hugh Brotherton that had ever effected a lodgment in her mind. There was something—evidently there was something—that needed to be explained, and how much—how very much—there was to bear out the monstrous idea that had forced itself upon her. When, on a previous occasion, the same suspicion had arisen, she had speedily and thankfully rejected it, but, for some subtle reason, it was not so thoroly repugnant to her now. Since his recovery from the slight injuries received in the pit, Mr. Brotherton's manner towards her had undergone an explicable, and not altogether pleasing, change. Not that there was anything in his relations with her that she could in the least resent, but the boyish frankness and candor that had charmed the woman who had a well-guarded secret of her own had disappeared, and in its place was a grave reserve, an air almost of inaccessibility, that irritated her beyond measure. She admired his courage as much as ever, but she had begun to feel a little scornful over the airs that he thought fit to assume. Rose was often pained by caustic comments which she secretly felt to be not without justification, but she consoled herself with the reflection that whatever she and Mrs. Langley might be foolish enough to take into their heads, Chris and Mary held Mr. Brotherton in higher esteem than ever.

Mrs. Langley was not so blindly loyal. From the day of Hugh's visit, slowly and with infinite pains, by observation and deduction, she worked out a theory that by turns shocked and amused her, according to the bent of her varying inclination towards good or evil. It was guess-work chiefly; but now and again she got unexpected confirmation thru some word or look of Hugh's, and the oftener her mind went over this, that, or the other suspicious incident, the more firmly she became convinced that her woman's wit had guided her to a shameful truth. Still, it was necessary to obtain some sort of corroboration. Accordingly, in the course of one of the rare tete-a-tetes into which she occasionally succeeded in drawing the unwilling Hugh, she remarked casually:

"You and I are on a disadvantageous footing from our own point of view. Neither of us are lifelong abstainers, so we cannot boast, as some teetotallers are so fond of boasting, that we do not even know the taste of drink—can we?"

"No; we cannot make that boast," admitted Hugh. He hated the evasions to which he was still sometimes driven by force of circumstances, and congratulated himself upon this instance of the defective nature of Mrs. Langley's memory. As a matter of fact, Mrs. Langley perfectly well remembered the emphasis with which, in the early days of their acquaintance, he had been wont to speak of his lifelong abstinence from alcoholic drink. Wherefore, after this admission, she troubled herself no longer with the search for proofs; but piecing her bits of evidence together, devoted herself to the devising of plans for making use of her discovery in the most effective way. In the fierce rage of her contempt and scorn, she felt no impulse towards mercy. Nevertheless, no one knew better than Mrs. Langley how to dissemble until the time came, and not even Dr. Mann saw reason to suspect anything wrong. For his own part, he had never liked Brotherton so well as now, when, for reasons of his own, he was keeping him under pretty close observation. As for Hugh, having been warmly pressed to remain at the Vicarage until his rooms at the club were ready for occupation, he was happier and more hopeful than at any time since the few months succeeding his arrival. He knew now that, with perfect truth and sincerity, he could assure Sam and the rest that they had that within their reach that would enable them to conquer their weakness if they would. In the parish he was idolized with greater unanimity than ever, especially by the pit lads, who gathered round him, a stolidly admiring band. Yet a few of those who loved him best wearied their brains in the search for a satisfactory explanation of his changed demeanor. Enoch alone exulted grimly.

"He's gotten the one thing that he lacked. He's gotten to be sober, as well as righteous and godly. Young folks will be young, no doubt; but it allus did go agen my feelin's to hear Mr. Brotherton come out wi' that laugh of his at the most inconsistent times."

Miss Smith gloomily "misdoubted" whether he had not, after all, got "a warning for death" in the pit. Tummas pondered the subject for hours at a stretch, when the stream of inquiring strangers began to run slow; and Mrs. Langley smilingly reminded everyone who alluded to the subject in her presence that she had always held Mr. Brotherton to be too good for this world.

She was not present at the mission-room service on the Sunday evening preceding the opening of the club. Therefore she missed the famous sermon in which Hugh pleaded for toleration on the part of the more experienced towards those who were still young in the spiritual life.

"Remember that the very one whom you deem most unsatisfactory may be fighting his way, thru shameful failure, towards the light. Be merciful! Don't lose hope of him because of faults that you, perhaps, had need, long ago, to overcome."

Enoch wiped his eyes, and there and then audibly prayed God to have mercy upon him for his harsh judgments; and subsequently, Hugh's appeal was universally held to be an inspired premonition of the fact that led Sam Widgery to seek him shamefacedly the very next night.

He was alone in the tiny room which Mrs. Boyd had considerately set apart for his study.

"Halloa, Sam! come in," and Hugh dragged forward a chair. "I say," looking at him more critically, "what's up?" Then, getting no reply: "I'm afraid I know—don't I?"

"Ay," said Sam sullenly. "Twere on Saturday night, and again to-day, and I don't know that I should ha' bothered wi'it any longer if it hadn't been for what you said last night. Whiles I think I'll have another try, and whiles I say to myself: 'Where's the use o' botherin'? I was born to drink, I was; so where's the use?"

It was a question that, too often, had discouraged and defeated Hugh, but this time he found an answer on the spot.

"Where's the use? Why, man, when you started to fight your devil you never expected to come off without a scratch, did you? Tell us the worst of it."

The worst was, after all, not so bad as he had feared. Out of bravado, being dared to disobey Mr. Brotherton, Sam had "tasted" on Saturday. Out of recklessness, and as a refuge from the gibes of his mates, he had "tasted" again to-day; but overcome with wholesome shame, had fled the scene before much harm was done.

Hugh slapped him heartily on the back.

"Cheer up, old man! To run from temptation as you have run was a victory that would have satisfied many a man. You must make a fresh start. It's all we can do sometimes." and Hugh sighed. "Still, I'm sorry, Sam."

"So am I sorry, an' all," said Sam, fairly blubbering.

"Yes, it's a pity, and it may make things harder for you; don't forget that, Sam."

"Happen it may," said Sam, wiping his eyes, "but they mostly know as I'm a hard hitter. It aren't so much them I'm mindin' as you, sir."

The immediate result of Sam's contrition was that, next day, he sheepishly presented himself before Hugh in company with his first convert to total abstinence principles.

Hugh's pleasure flashed out with all the boyish fervor of earlier days.

"That's it, Sam, my boy! If you want to keep right yourself, find out someone else who needs to be heartened and backed up; take my word for it, there's nothing like it for keeping a man straight."

He was too unmindful of himself just then to notice that, not for the first time, Sam stole a perplexed and shyly inquiring glance into his face.

On his way out, after a lengthy interview, Hugh looked into the drawing-room to report Sam's exploit. Rose Glyn's eyes shone with silent sympathy, while Mrs. Boyd spoke her warm congratulations.

"Yes, when all's said and done, personal influence is the thing that tells," said Mr. Boyd, rising reluctantly to prepare for his round of afternoon visits. "Brotherton has somehow won the confidence of the men, and is doing more with them than I shall ever do. But he hasn't done it by his meetings; not in the main. You may not be aware of the fact, Brotherton, but you have changed your methods a good deal. For the better, as I cannot help thinking."

Hugh smiled as he also remarked that he must go. He always did go when the conversation threatened to take a personal turn. Rose had constantly noticed the fact. Just now, however, he had the excuse of pressing business. Altho the ceremonial opening of the club was now imminent, there was much in the way of arrangement and decoration that still remained to be done, and, with one consent, the men who were responsible for the work resorted for advice and direction to him. Since it had transpired that the ceremony was likely to be something more than a parochial function, Pitsmoor had been steadily swelling with a sense of its own importance. Was it not an ascertained fact that county people who had been wont to drive two or three miles round in order to avoid the grimy mining village, would alight from their carriages at the door of the club that day? Very strict was the scrutiny exercised by Miss Smith and Mrs. Dixon over the list of those who strove for the honor of contributing, in kind, to the afternoon tea.

"We wouldn't wish to hurt nobody's feelings, nor to shut nobody out," said Miss Smith firmly, "but it's well known there is those that don't know good bread from bad, except it's of other folks' baking; just as there's those who can make good bread, but couldn't turn out a decent cake if their lives depended on it. And on an ocasion like this, the last word, Mrs. Dixon, must be with them as is responsible, which is you and me."

"You're right, Miss Smith; and when all's done that Pitsmoor can do, some of the bettermost sweets must be got from Milborough, and only them must be set to hand round as can be trusted to discriminate as to which plates is most suitable for ordinary, and which for gentry," added Mrs. Dixon.

Pitsmoor, however, had no intention of contenting itself with a position of secondary importance at a stand-up tea. When it became an ascertained fact that the village was to be honored by an invasion of the surrounding gentry, it was at once decided that the purely parochial sentiment of pride in, and gratitude towards, its heroes should find expression at a coffee supper on the evening following the day of the formal opening. Mrs. Langley took up the suggestion with enthusiasm, and gave valuable assistance in the way of arranging in her own kitchen for the cooking of joints and pies. Her help was of real value, and Mrs. Boyd's thanks were sincere.

"Pray, don't mention it! I am only too glad to do all in my power to promote so delightful an idea. I assure you I am scheming night and day in the hope of turning Mr. Brotherton's triumph into the thing it deserves to be. I should dearly like to make it such a night as neither he nor Pittsmor would ever be able to forget," said Mrs. Langley impressively.

"How terribly intense she is sometimes," remarked Mrs. Boyd, as she and Rose went their way. "She is most kind, but I am sure that poor Mr. Brotherton would rather be without the memory she proposes to give him."

It is possible that no one would have assented more readily, or laughed more gleefully, than Mrs. Langley, had she overheard that expression of opinion.

"I really cannot quite make Mrs. Langley out. She does seem so queer and strange just now," said Rose thoughtfully.

She had still more reason for saying so on the day of the formal opening. Hugh, who was early on the scene, had worked himself into a state of nervous apprehension before Mrs. Langley arrived.

"How pale you are looking," she exclaimed, with exaggerated concern; "this is practically your canonization, is it not? Who is to undertake the role of devil's advocate?"

"None could be better fitted than myself, but happily, I am spared that ordeal," said Hugh. "Pits-

Children's Cozy Corner

The Boy and the Nest.

THE Boy lay back and chuckled appreciatively. He could see the soft, brown breast of the mother-bird quiver. Her bright, beady eyes were looking straight into his. She was prepared to flutter off the nest at the slightest threatening movement, but the Boy kept very still. He only squirmed a little in comfortable satisfaction, and dug his bare toes into the rich black earth. His blue eyes were as intent as her black ones.

"My, but she's a brave 'un," he thought admiringly. "'T ain't many 'ud do that,—mighty few thrushes. That long-tailed thrasher there hopped off quicker than scat. I didn't care if she did lose a few of her old eggs, but this 'un—"

Cautiously he extended his hand. The nest was in a low clump of hazel bushes, within easy reach. The speckled-brown mother panted and opened her bill, her bright eyes grew liquid-clear, but, just before the scrubby little boy's hand touched her, she was off and lit silently on a twig a few feet away.

The Boy chuckled again, and peered into the nest with a satisfied glow on his snub-nosed face. Four perfect egs, splashed with brown as finely as was the mother-bird's breast, lay in the grass-woven hollow. The Boy had with him a pasteboard box filled with cotton-wool. In the soft white was a cat-bird's egg of greenish, opaque blue, and the tiny, clear-white speck of the bank-swallow. The egg of a tawny thrush was a much rarer find, but the boy seemed in no hurry to make it his own. He glanced at the silent brown form only the few feet away. "You're a cute 'un," he smiled at her.

Suddenly he heard the cracking of twigs at the edge of the thicket. He made a grab for the pasteboard box, and scurried off. He effected an elaborate detour, and come up to the two other boys from the opposite direction. These two boys had pasteboard boxes also. When they caught sight of the first boy, they yelled, "Hi, there!"

He sauntered leisurely up, with apparent carelessness, but on a keen watch. He was met with an excited:

"Say! oh, say! Got a tawny thrush's egg? There's a pair of 'em around here, and betcher there's a nest."

The Boy twisted his wide mouth into a provoking grin.

"Aw, now," he drawled, "who says there's thrushes round here? You fellers be all off."

He met their derisive gaze with one as derisive, but he realized its failure as, after a minute's profound meditation, the two in one accord started away, perilously near the direction of the hazel clump. They winked at him over their shoulders, as he followed at a discreet distance.

A very little while after, and a prolonged whoop of triumph sounded in his ears. Realizing that now another encounter would not be entirely agreeable to him, he got rapidly away. But when he decided that they were safely out of the vicinity he hurried back, with something tugging at his heart. He drew apart the hazel branches, and looked in at the nest. It was empty. A slender brown bird was flitting silently from branch to branch over his head. As he watched her, he found himself wishing that she would squawk and make a fuss, as the bluejays did.

Josephine's Cake.

By Ida B. Cole.

While Mamma isn't looking
I guess I'll make a cake.
I'll stir it up so nicely
And put it in to bake.
I know the way to do it,
Take butter, just so big;
With sev'ral cups of sugar,
And lots, and lots of fig.
I'll have 'bout seven layers,
With frosting piled up high.
I think my Mamma 'll like it
When she comes by and by.

A lump swelled in the Boy's throat. He made a swift dig at his eyes with his fists,—very dirty fists. Then suddenly he threw his pasteboard box upon the ground. He kicked it and jumped upon it until it was smashed into the dry leaves and soft earth.

"There!" he said, and looked up at the quiet brown mother-bird. —Alice E. Dyar.

The A of B's of C.

By Adelaide Denning Newton.

QUEER things had been happening in the little village of Colford. Old Mrs. Green, who lives alone in the little house at the end of the road, had ordered a cord of wood to be drawn on Thursday afternoon. That evening, when she started for the prayer-meeting, the wood was in her door-yard. When she returned, an hour and a half later, she found it sawed, split, and neatly tiered in the wood-house.

Alton Ray, the little lame boy, found a new crutch mysteriously replacing the old battered one that hurt his shoulder.

Patrick Halliday's onion-bed on Tuesday night was running over with weeds, and the next morning not a weed was to be seen. Patrick himself believed it to be the work of the fairies, but since they were evidently well disposed toward him, he was not at all disturbed.

An air of mystery pervaded the whole village. Every one talked of the strange happenings which no one seemed able to explain.

It was not generally known that a new society had been organized among the boys and girls of the village. It was called the A of B's of C. Only the initiated knew that the letters stood for "Association of Brownies of Colford." Weekly meetings were held on Tuesday afternoons. The members were asked to contribute written suggestions for helping others.

It was Helena Bradford who suggested weeding the onion-bed. Her father was the village doctor, and Helena had overheard poor old Patrick in her father's office complaining of his rheumatic shoulders.

It was Eddie Hollister who suggested that the nickel collection be used for the new crutch.

Flossie Ryan told the society of the hard times that had come to the Mullens family. Mr. Mullens had been sick for weeks, and Mrs. Mullens needed to work to supply the wants of the family. She was strong and willing to work, but the babies took all her time. The result of this information was that six brownies were appointed to visit in turn at the Mullens' house, and beg the privilege of taking care of Billie and the twins during a morning. Of course, the brownies went disguised as young girls, and grateful Mrs. Mullens never suspected the truth.

The Association is adding to its membership, and its work is being carried on stealthily and with merry good-will after true brownie fashion.

A Thought For Every Day.

THERE'S many a thing for you to do,
My lad, if you but knew it,
That's sent to you, and only you—
Don't let another do it.

Don't let another lift the load
Your back was meant to carry;
Don't think your task were done as well
By Tom or Dick or Harry.

Don't say God's work can wait today—
'Twill do as well tomorrow;
Don't put your own will always first,
And count His service sorrow.

Don't wait till you are strong and wise—
Trust Him to gauge your burden;
And then at last trust Him, my lad,
To give the well-earned guerdon.

An Observation Party.

If you know of some nook or corner, some brook or river bank, some place where come the birds, squirrels, chipmunks, turtles, frogs, bees, butterflies, worms, bugs, and dozens of other forms of animal life; if you know of such a place invite your class to a party.

If you have some pennies to spare, write an invitation to each pupil upon the first page of a dainty note-book, which you may make from two or three leaves of the small size note paper, the same leaves tied with a knot of baby ribbon, one end of the ribbon being left long, and a tiny lead pencil tied thereto.

But if you have not the pennies, then extend a verbal invitation. With note-book and pencil go to this place we have spoken of. When arrived, let each one find a place where he wishes to sit, produce note-book and pencil, and in the note-book write the names of all the forms of animal life which he sees or hears in the next twenty minutes looking sharply about him

A wise teacher will find many uses to make of the results of this same "Observation Party."—Midland Schools.

"The women that publish the tidings are a great host."

Mob Crazy.

"ANARCHY exists in the state of Delaware. The mob that burned George White at the stake has the government by the throat. The police are terrorized, and the state and county officials are helpless. Established law is scoffed at, and there is imminent peril of a race war. The whole community seems mob crazy."

So states a recent press dispatch from Wilmington, Del., and the astonishing report goes on to say that the mob wrecked the county workhouse, forced the release of a prisoner, murdered a boy, and trampled the majesty of the law under foot. This destructive mob was not composed of foreign anarchists or drunken rowdies, but, as Governor Hunn himself said, "It was no ordinary mob that lynched the man who murdered Miss Bishop. The crowd seems to have been composed of good citizens." Nor was it an ordinary mob that enacted scenes of brutal barbarism in the streets of Belleville when Wyatt was lynched. The most respectable citizens were suddenly transformed into veritable demons consumed with uncontrollable ferocity. And when at Peoria, a few days later, the judge of the circuit court quietly assured a great mob thirsting for the blood of Jackson that justice would be meted out to the prisoner he was answered by his fellow citizens, "You are a liar!"

Here is an alarming state of affairs. This is barbarism in the midst of civilization. And while we do not believe that what the dispatches call "good citizens" includes the very best people, it is a matter of profound regret that any class of Americans could perpetrate the awful deeds of the past few weeks. And serious as is the crime of lynching, the cause that lies back of the crime is far more serious, and that is a disregard for the law. The selfish, shallow temper of many of our people prompts them to set all authority at naught. There is a spirit abroad of levity, irreverence, and excessive individualism that is inimical to the stability of the state. It is seen not only in the reign of Judge Lynch, but in the ever-increasing Sabbath desecration, the ease with which labor unions break their contracts, and in the defiant lawlessness of the average saloon.

So serious is this state of affairs that no pains should be spared to ferret out the cause and apply the remedy. Lawlessness may often result from thoughtlessness and lack of sympathy. It may grow out of inexperience, prejudice, and the lack of proper occupation; but all thoughtful persons must admit that the prime cause lies deeper. It is found in the practical infidelity of the day. The men are not in the church, nor are they apparently acquainted with their Bibles, nor do they cultivate a sense of reverence and submission to the will of God, which is the rule of a good man's life. Lawlessness is only another name for irreligion. Willfulness shows a lack of spiritual discipline. Murder and cruelty can arise only in a hard and unregenerate heart. What we need is a great national revival of faith in God the Father and in the Redeemer of all men as affording the only firm foundation of social order. Richard Hooker was right when he wrote: "Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is in the bosom of God, the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempt from her power."

An Alcoholized Intellect.

A MAN died suddenly in Kansas City, leaving to the world a strangely impressive record of a blighted life. The physicians upon cutting open his skull, found his brain immersed in alcohol, the fumes of which filled the room. "Evidently a heavy drinker," was the verdict of the physicians.

The physical tragedy that must have preceded this event is quite familiar. Physiologists tell us how that dread despoiler, Alcohol, making its way through the system, is rejected by an outraged stomach, spurned by an indignant heart, thrust thru the arteries, straining and distending them, crisping, parching and charring them so that they can not perform their functions, at last bursting them and allowing the blood and alcohol to flow in among the nerves and brain, irritating, inflaming and torturing the delicate, sensitive brain fibre. The nerves of sight become inflamed to see the awful visions and the nerves of hearing become irritated to hear maddening sounds. What manner of thinking must emanate from a brain thus conditioned!

Imagine, if you can, a memory poisoned by alcohol, recalling only vile suggestions, utterly lacking the power to recall stored-up truth and wisdom. Picture an imagination which has lost the power to soar, but instead crawls like a slimy reptile. Conceive of an alcohol-saturated judgment, controlling large industries, or an alcohol-stimulated reason trying to weigh matters of national moment in affairs of state, the mind now unduly elated, again depressed, becoming uncontrolled and finally paralyzed. Consider what an alcoholized affection must resemble, highly excited, passionate, lawless. Finally, let the mind pause for one awful moment to comprehend the depths of despair that have been sounded when the human conscience shall have become so debilitated and devitalized by alcoholic stimulants that it no longer stands on guard as an inward monitor, but lies manacled, drugged, wounded, a useless, dying thing.

Physicians tell us emphatically that the alcoholizing process is not sudden, but gradual, the work of months and years, and is unquestionably taking place in the physical systems of men and women who would indignantly deny that they belong to the drinking class. Meanwhile the world at large is compelled every day to have a part in the tragedy which involves not only the men and women who drink, and their immediate families and offspring, but involves every man, woman, and child with whom they come in contact.

Every day we are obliged to tolerate and submit to legislation emanating from alcoholic brains, to accept from the courts judgments distorted by alcoholized thinking, to entrust business to the vitiated intellects of men who are moderate drinkers, to take our politics and its measures of corruption defiled by the deadly drug. The fumes of it are everywhere: on the streets, in the city halls, in the street car, in the court room, even in the schoolroom, brought by innocent children upon whom the poison has been forced as nourishment.

At times one is almost compelled to believe that whole communities of respectable, abstemious, law-abiding citizens are unconsciously stupefied by its fumes as they sit insensible or indifferent to the dangers which such a condition of things portends.

To Help the Working Girl.

IN that remarkable book, "The Woman Who Toils" two women of culture and social advantage tell of their own experience as "factory girls," and in this way make a startling revelation of how at least a portion of "the other half lives." If the reader be not too mentally obtuse or too hard-hearted, he is made to see some things from a new point of view which he cannot soon forget.

What those two resolute women did was to give a faithful picture of things as they now exist. They have given voice to those that were dumb. They have compelled attention to voices that are again "crying in the wilderness."

After many weeks spent among them as one of them, one of the women who went to "these spirits in prison," says she came away convinced that no earnest effort for their betterment is fruitless. She is hopeful that her faithful descriptions will perhaps suggest to the hearts of those who read some ways of rendering personal and general help to that class who, thru the sordidness and squalor of their material surroundings, are condemned to slow death—mental, moral, physical death!

In all these factories there are two distinct classes of girls; those who work there because they have to or starve, and can find for themselves nothing better to do, and those who, only partly dependent, work that they may have the wherewith to spend for showy finery. Because the latter class can afford the lower wage, they create a cruelly oppressive competition against those whose pitiful wage earning is all that keeps them alive.

One part of the remedy suggested is that the girl who works for luxuries should go elsewhere—seeking some field of work which requires instruction, and a higher order of skill. The American factory girl has ambition; she has a hunger for knowledge, for opportunities to better herself. Who will help her to get the special training she needs to free herself from the slavish, brutalizing machines that have no use for brains or self-respecting personality? It is a moving appeal for help in this double emancipation—that of the woman who toils for bread and the girl who works for luxuries.

New Child Labor Law of Texas.

THE twenty-eighth legislature of Texas, recently adjourned, passed a most excellent law regulating child labor, and its provisions are so good that our readers will be glad to know them. This law was the special work of the organized labor of the state, altho women everywhere assisted in making the sentiment that passed it:

1. No child under twelve years of age can be employed in any factory or establishment where machinery is used. Employers are subject to fine of not less than fifty (50) dollars nor more than two hundred (200) dollars, and each day is a new offense.

2. Between the ages of twelve and fourteen the child must be able to read and write in the English language, exception being made in favor of a child having a widowed mother or parent incapacitated to earn a living, and who has no means of support other than the labor of the child, and then in no event shall such child be permitted to work outside the hours between 6 a. m. and 6 p. m. Penalty same as above.

3. All children under the age of sixteen are prohibited from laboring in mines, breweries and distilleries. No exceptions whatever. Penalty same as above.

We congratulate the great state of Texas on its humane and progressive legislation. It should completely vindicate that noble commonwealth in the estimation of people who have been prone to consider it the "tag end of creation." We hope that other states of which more is expected will emulate this illustrious example.

The Millennium Not Here. Notwithstanding the assertion that this is the "woman's age"—and it probably is by comparison—we have yet a long way to go before we find our millennium. We still receive far less compensation than men for the same work; we are not permitted a voice in making the laws that affect the welfare of our families; and in the church itself matters are not much better. In the great Christian Endeavor Society, which claims over 4,000,000 members, and has its organizations in every country on the globe, women, young and old, form two-thirds of this mighty host; but they have no official voice in the administration of its affairs. In fact, the sex is scarcely recognized in the roll of 150 trustees representing the various churches and organizations of which it is composed.

Our Next Red Letter Day. August 3, the birthday anniversary of Lady Henry Somerset, President of the World's W. C. T. U., is designated as Fresh Air Mission Day on our W. C. T. U. calendar. A program for the proper observance of the day is given in this issue, and further details of Lady Henry's magnificent work at Duxhurst, the farm colony for inebriate women, will be given in our magazine number for August.

Mrs. Stevenson Abroad. Mrs. Katherine Lente Stevenson is speaking in England with great success. She has many more calls than she is able to accept. She is warmly welcomed wherever she goes, not alone to the public meetings held for her, but to the homes which open to receive her. Among the latter the home of the daughter of John Bright. Mrs. Stevenson expects to return to America in August.

National Officers at Home. Mrs. Stevens and Miss Gordon landed in New York on Tuesday, July 7, and proceeded immediately to Mrs. Stevens' home in Portland, Me. There will be little or no time for rest, as these tireless workers are on the programs of several important summer meetings, notably Chautauqua, N. Y., and Old Orchard, Me.

A Personal Word. We beg the indulgence of our many friends for the belated appearance of the last two numbers of the THE UNION SIGNAL. Difficulty in the press room is responsible therefor.

State Secretaries, Attention! Send in the dates of your next state convention to be placed upon our fall convention calendar. Give the place of meeting and names of special speakers engaged.

Opinions of Leading Educators Concerning Spelling Reform.

Dr. L. Clark Seelye, President Smith College, Mass.:

I approve of the recommendations of the National Educational Association with reference to simplifying our spelling and shall be glad to see them adopted.

H. H. Freer, Professor of English Literature, Cornell College, Iowa:

I am in hearty sympathy with the use of the short spellings adopted by the N. E. A. No educational reform equals in importance the simplifying of the spelling of the English language.

Paul H. Hanus, Professor of Pedagogy, Howard University:

I sympathize fully with the general purposes embodied in the resolutions adopted by the state teachers' associations of Illinois and Wisconsin last December with regard to simplified spelling.

Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews, chancellor, State University of Nebraska:

Too much cannot be said or done to emphasize the importance of simplifying English spelling. I see no reason why a principal should not rule and declare and give his teachers and pupils to understand that the short forms adopted by the N. E. A. are, to say the least, good alternative spellings, insisting that when they appear in written work they shall not be stigmatized as erroneous. Were this done thruout the country the next generation of Americans would almost to a man employ the abbreviated forms.

SERMONS FROM CITY PULPITS.

THE SALOON QUESTION AND CERTAIN FUNDAMENTALS OF REFORM IN A REPUBLIC.

By John Merritte Driver, D. D.

"Glance a moment at Chicago. This saloon question is omnipresent. Do we lack money? Our mayor says so. But the federal government levies and collects more than $100,000,000 in taxes on liquor, and the nation pours more than $1,100,000,000 into the saloonkeepers' till. Take Chicago's wanton waste in the saloon and you could keep every street as clean as the linen of a duchess and as sweet as a child's unsullied breath.

"Is it a matter of charity? But for the saloon nine-tenths of our charity work in Chicago would be unnecessary. With one hand we supply the saloonkeepers with licenses and with the other we are kept busy trying to supply the wants of the paupers they create. Family after family I visit is desolated by the saloon. There is practically no more righteous want. Employment is seeking both men and women, wages are amazingly high, hours are prodigally few, the well have an abundance everywhere for themselves and for their loved ones, sick or aged or infirm, except where the saloon and the vices it engenders breed and intensify squalor and vagabondage.

TAXES WOULD BE SAVED.

"Is it a matter of taxes? Three-fourths of our judges, juries, court employes, policemen and members of the fire department could be taken off the pay roll and turned to productive employment but for the continual havoc and criminality in the saloon, and of those sent forth from the saloon crazed and maddened by the vile concoctions and associations. Instead of increasing the number of judges and courts let us decrease the number of saloons and saloonkeepers.

"Is it a matter of crime? Mr. Deneen says we have a murder each day and two on Sunday. When to this appalling record we add the number of suicides our Christianity and civilization seem to have failed. But back of almost every homicide and suicide you find the saloon and the saloonkeeper. The accursed are drunkards or drunkards' victims.

"Many of the crimes are commited in saloons when they have no legal right to be open, and by people whose custom they have no right to accept. The state and city statutes are made to be enforced. Is Mayor Harrison enforcing them? If not, is he not responsible for the deluge of crime directly traceable to his negligence? Are there not men and women in the jail, penitentiary, insane asylum, cemetery, perdition, who would not be there had the saloonkeeper been held to a strict account, as other men are? And why should he not be?

SUPREME COURT IS DEFILED.

"But we must not be too hard on the mayor. We, the people, speak the saloon into being. The United States Supreme Court has unanimously declared that the saloon has no inherent right to exist, because it is inimical to the welfare of the people. But we defy the Supreme Court and open this anarchy factory; indeed, to the extent of licensing an unlawful and anarchistic institution become anarchists ourselves.

"Yes, deliverance will come, but it will be from the sober and august Anglo-Saxon South, unspoiled and unpoisoned by the wine-tainted beer-sodden, whisky-crazed, Sabbath-desecrating, God-defying and anarchy breeding and practicing minions from over the sea, and from the vast and virile countrysides where the Bible is not yet effete nor Christ a myth."

The River Rhone pours into the beautiful Lake of Geneva a turbid, milky stream, and issues from those pure depths as blue as the sky above and as clear as crystal. This is just what Christianity can do for any life, no matter how clouded and polluted by sin. The only conditions are complete renunciation of the past, grateful acceptance of redemption thru Jesus Christ, and full adoption of the new life that is in Him.

There are some things which it seems that we could take for granted in our prayers. "Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." But even tho we do need them, and God knows we need them, it does not follow that He will give them to us unless we ask for them. We may be depriving ourselves of some of the necessities of life because we take God's goodness and knowledge for granted, and do not make these things the subject of our petitions.

O, let me then at length be taught
What I am still so slow to learn:
That God is love, and changes not,
Nor knows the shadow of a turn.
Sweet truth, and easy to repeat;
But, when my faith is sorely tried,
I find myself a learner yet,
Unskillful, weak, and apt to slide.
Thou art as ready to forgive
As I am ready to repine:
Thou therefore all the praise receive;
Be shame and self-abhorrence mine.
—William Cowper.

The wisdom and the follies, the successes and the failures, the losses and disasters, the facts and the fables of the past, have crystallized in the present. The same holds good in our personal life and training. What you are to-day is a result of what you were yesterday. Swedenborg taught something like this when he said: "The garments of the angels grow mysteriously out of the emanations of their own characters." A wondrous law of unity pervades all things, small and great, past, present, and future.—Rev. Cyrus Mendenhall.

I can not always trace the onward course
My ship must take;
But looking backward, I behold afar
Its shining wake,
Illumined with God's light of love, and so
I onward go
In perfect trust that he who holds the helm
The course must know.
I can not always see the plans on which
He builds my life;
For oft the sound of hammers, blow on blow,
The noise of strife,
Confuse me till I quite forget he knows
And oversees,
And that in all details with his good plan
My life agrees.

We know not precisely what is best for us. We know not what will make us truly happy. We know not what will help us best in our struggle against temptations. And if we were to try to make a distinction between our mere passing wishes and that which our souls really needed, we should utterly fail. But we need not try. Let us take all our wishes, all our longings, all the promptings of our consciences, to the feet of our Father. He will hear and He will do. He will hear all we say. He will know what parts of our prayer are best for us to have, and what are not. And He will give us what His fatherly love will choose. And therefore to all our prayers we will add, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven."—Frederick Temple.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF MISS ANNA GORDON.

August 3, Fresh Air Mission Day.
BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR SISTERS:—I am already beginning to think of the program for our National Convention and of the various reports which must be in hand before that time. The blanks for annual state reports will be sent to the state corresponding secretaries in September. In the meantime, if any one wishes a sample copy, she can have it by asking. No changes will be made this year. As our convention does not meet until November 13, I earnestly hope the state reports may be received by me as early as October 15. This will give opportunity for me to compile some facts from these valuable reports. Blanks for the annual report by organizers will be sent out in good season.

Before this reaches you, Mrs. Stevens and Miss Gordon will have arrived in this country, if all goes well. They were obliged to defer sailing one week later than at first announced in order to obtain suitable accommodations, which they did not regret so much as they were hard at work preparing the World's Report for the printer. Miss Slack was obliged to remain in Switzerland some time for recuperation. It will be remembered that her mother passed away but a very short time before the convening of the World's Convention.

White ribboners expecting to be in Chautauqua this summer should bear in mind that Mrs. Stevens is to give an address at 4 p. m., Aug. 4, in the auditorium. This is one of the series of addresses provided by the management for "Liquor Problem Week." The temperance topics before the Woman's Club will occur the same week, and it is expected that Miss Gordon will speak on temperance work among the children. Mrs. Unruh, Mrs. Bullock, and Mrs. Fry will be the other speakers.

Rest Cottage had a much appreciated visit a few days ago from Miss Downs, principal of the girls' grammar school, Rockhampton, Queensland, who is paying a short visit to the United States. Mrs. Flora B. Harris, president of Queensland, writes that Miss Downs is one of their W. C. T. U. members who has helped greatly by her influence.

The Responsive Reading for July is on the subject of organization and the memorial fund. The W. T. P. A. management says it should have wide circulation and asks me to call attention to it in my Notes.

I hold in my hand a beautiful red, white and blue song book for soldiers and sailors, prepared by Mrs. Thacher, with appropriate original cover designs. It contains national and patriotic songs especially suited to the soldier boys. A number of hymns are written by our own white ribboners, and we are glad to have this booklet go into our army and our navy.

Letters are coming to headquarters in regard to the situation at St. Louis. It is asserted that dens of vice are already being located in that city, preparatory to taking advantage of the opportunities which the World's Fair will offer to carry on a nefarious work of ruin. We are told of the awful degree of depravity which this evil has already reached and are urged to arouse white ribboners everywhere to protest against the toleration of this infamy during the St. Louis Fair. The National is asking for an investigation by our own women, and will have something to say after they are heard from. Evil-minded men and women have always taken advantage of such occasions to ply their trade, and doubtless it will take the combined influence of all good people to even hold the evil to a minimum during the World's Fair.

I am wondering how many are taking advantage of the offer of THE UNION SIGNAL from now until the middle of November for fifty cents, and how many unions will appear on the Honor Roll because every member is a subscriber. Yours cordially,

SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Organizers.

DEAR SISTERS: My last word of greeting was written from Post Falls, Idaho, the first of last November. I remained in that state until December 6. During that time I held many meetings, and also attended the state convention held in Weiser, Southern Idaho. I had a most delightful trip of two months and over in beautiful Idaho. No one ever worked harder to "make the wheels go round" for a speaker than did Mrs. Ora Oakes of Caldwell, the noble and untiring state president, who has the support of her gracious, chivalrous husband, who is indeed a brother-in-law to the W. C. T. U. After leaving Idaho, I went to Baker City, Ore. I never was in a place of the size where the members of the W. C. T. U. had more opposition, but they know no defeat. They are really doing a great work, and in spite of difficulties that would dishearten many, that union is one of the largest, if not the banner union of Oregon. I gave sixteen days in February to the work in the city of Portland. I held many meetings during that time; I organized one new union in the suburbs, and added altogether sixty-five new members to the various unions of the city, of which Central is the "mother." Since February I have held many meetings in Western Washington, chiefly under the direction of our capable corresponding secretary, Mrs. M. C. Munns. I organized three unions and one L. T. L.. I have now been in Southern Oregon three weeks working in Douglas county, under the direction of Mrs. Ida Marsters of Roseburg, the county president, whose time and talents and money are devoted to the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Marsters has been untiring in her efforts to make my trip a success in her very large county, and it has indeed been full of blessings all along the way.

I have attended the Douglas county convention, and can report a very interesting session. My appointments have been mostly in organized places. About thirty-two persons have joined our ranks during these meetings. While in Roseburg I went out to the state soldiers' home, and gave an address; a number of the W. C. T. U. women accompanied me, and they carried large baskets of the choicest roses, and gave each old veteran (there were about seventy-five in the home) a bouquet with scripture text. They seemed overjoyed to receive them. One of them belongs to the Roseburg union. I want to make special mention of the help given me in Portland by our brave organizer Mrs. Unruh. She did all in her power to make my stay profitable, while at the same time she was exceedingly busy preparing to go on her long trip south. MATTIE N. GRAVES.

Peace and Arbitration.

DEAR COMRADES IN OUR PEACEFUL WARFARE:—It is gratifying to hear of so many public meetings having been held in commemoration of the anniversary of the great conference of nations held four years ago, the mother of the International Court of Arbitration which enables nations to adjust their differences in a humane way without the cruel force of arms. They can thus secure entire justice, while warfare always decides in favor of carnal strength without regard to justice. Peace by arbitration builds up communities and draws nations together, but warfare separates them. Peace alone can bring all men into one vast brotherhood. Let us work, talk, and pray for peace. Let us sing also for peace, and our songs will be in harmony with the song of the angels at the advent of the Prince of Peace.

Since my report to the World's Convention was sent to Geneva, I have received three reports; one from South Africa, one from Tasmania, and one from the Bahama Islands, which I wish could have been incorporated in my combined report. Mrs. Fernie reporting from South Africa says: "South Africa has just passed thru a terrible experience, but, thank God, peace has now been proclaimed and all right-minded Africanders and settlers are doing their utmost to further the building up of a peace-loving, united people thruout South Africa."

Mrs. Lodge writes from Tasmania: "What I really have done does not seem of much account, but of this you may be assured, that when I write or speak it is with no uncertain sound, for I am fully convinced of the enormity of war. Writing to the daily newspapers, and also getting articles copied from anti-war papers or magazines inserted in their columns, is one means I employ to spread our principles, and as opportunity offers I bring the matter before the Council of Women Workers and our state and local W. C. T. U.'s. In this little island we are so far removed from the rush and turmoil of the world that it is difficult to arouse enthusiasm on any subject tho even here we suffered loss thru the last war. The L. T. L.'s are being well taught the advantage of Peace Arbitration instead of war among the nations."

Mrs. Dillet, from Nassau, N. P., speaks of the work having been retarded by illness, but she says monthly peace meetings were held by her assistant and extracts from "The Advocate of Peace" which have been frequently read in the W. C. T. U. meetings were listened to with much interest.

Every least effort to promote our beautiful cause is valuable in helping to swell the influence that will put to flight the armies of the aliens and help to establish the everlasting Kingdom of our Lord. May it be said of each one of us in the great day of account, "She hath done what she could."

HANNAH J. BAILEY.

SLOW STARVATION.

The Dyspeptic's Diet Leaves no Chance for Regaining Strength.

The dyspeptic who starves body and brain because food will not digest has no chance to get strong again because bodily strength cannot be built up except on food that will digest.

That is the mission of Grape-Nuts which any dyspeptic can digest and which will begin to build up and nourish at once.

A Wisconsin man says: "For the last 7 years I have been a great sufferer with stomach trouble and for 18 months I could not eat or drink anything, not even a spoonful of milk, without great suffering.

"It seemed I had tried every remedy in the world and I had given up all hopes of ever getting better when a friend advised me to eat Grape-Nuts food. I was just about too much discouraged to do so for I expected to die and all my friends expected I would too but I finally did send for a sample box and when it came I was so weak I could not turn over in bed.

"Then I began to take the Grape-Nuts, just a little bit at first, moistened with hot milk and from this I began to grow stronger and before I had finished the fourth package I could eat and drink anything I wanted and it did not hurt me in the least. So the right food helped me to health after everything else had failed.

"Experience, actual use, proves absolutely the great power of the scientific food Grape-Nuts." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"Race Suicide," as Viewed by a Woman.

OF late I have read various articles in regard to race suicide. In these woman is charged with having lost the God-given desire to become a wife and mother. Various reasons are assigned for this, but I have not seen what I believe to be the greatest cause of this loss. Is it not because our nation has refused to protect the home that the American woman refuses to become a wife and mother? She has wept, prayed and petitioned our state and national governments to throw around the home of this country some protection from the greatest curse this world has ever known. But instead of granting her request "this land of the free and home of the brave" has gone into partnership with the home destroyer, so the only reply weeping, petitioning womanhood receives is: Go help make homes, be patient, bear children, and each year we will only lay about 100,000 of them in drunkards' graves, and we cannot tell just how many of them we will place in almshouse, county jails, penitentiaries, and insane asylums.

It is not because woman loves a poodle dog more than a baby that she chooses the dog, but if she pays the tax and puts a collar on her dog, she is protected by the law from the dog-slayer. But tell me, if you can, how a mother can protect her boy? She went down to the gates of death to give him birth. She counts this as naught for the joy that a man child is born. She watches over him, sleeping and waking, warns him of the dangers of the intoxicating cup, but it availeth not. Ere the blush of youth has left his cheek she sees him offered a sacrifice on the altar of his nation's greed. What wonder that woman buys a ranch, goes into sheep raising instead of raising boys? Wool growers are protected, and if the wolves should abound our government would pay so much per head for their destruction. But the destroyer of our sons is protected by law; his business is legalized. When the voters of the country make the raising of children a safe business, then will our daughters become wives and the joyful mothers of children, "and the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof."—Elizabeth A. Ivey, in Michigan Christian Advocate.

When I find a woman whose heart is as my heart in solicitude for the success of the W. C. T. U., conversant with its history and its plans for the future, and intelligent on all lines of work, I say to her, 'Do you take THE UNION SIGNAL?' She invariably replies 'I do. I could not do without it.'"

Three unions and thirty-eight members have been added to this district since May 1. Miss Annie Robbins, National lecturer, will spend September in the district and Mrs. Bessie Laythe Scovell, state president, will be in this field during October.

One of our National organizers writes: "When it is known that The Union Signal is taken by every member of the Armstrong W. C. T. U. it does not seem strange that this is Minnesota's banner country union. It has a membership of nineteen, with ten of the good husbands as honorary members. Its meetings are held twice a month, with honorary members and husbands as well as the women, in attendance."

Active work in Christian Citizenship is going on in New Hampshire. Mrs. Richardson, the president, who has a day of W. C. T. U. Institute in connection with the Hedding Chautauqua, calls in the clergy, laity and young people's societies to discuss the topic from their various points of view. Mrs. Richardson has been acting as state superintendent of this department, but is now relieved by Miss Helen Melvin, of Chester.

The W. C. T. U. of West Virginia contemplates the erection of a Memorial Chapel at Tesmalinston, Grafton, as a tribute to the work done in the state generally and in that locality in particular by the late Mrs. Mary M. Love, former state president. The movement originated at Tesmalinston and it has been indorsed by the state executive, who recommend that public meetings in honor of Mrs. Love be held on the evening of August 23, the collections to be devoted to the Memorial Chapel fund.

A free reading room and library is one of the praiseworthy enterprises of the Lancaster, Kentucky, union. About $400 has already been subscribed by several public-spirited citizens. One liberal young Lancastrian has also promised to place his fine collection of books, consisting of 500 volumes, within the shelves of the library. All the current magazines, newpapers and first-class literature of the day will be a conspicuous feature of the library table and Mr. Louis Landram, editor of the "Record," has donated his entire list of exchanges as a contribution to this worthy scheme.

The Pennsylvania L. T. L. convention, which met at Lancaster June 28-July 2, was a very enthusiastic gathering. The sessions were held in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium which was beautifully decorated in red and white, the Pennsylvania colors. Mrs. Elma M. Preston, L. T. L. secretary, was the presiding genius of the convention. Over two hundred and forty delegates and many visitors were present. The march of the graduates, 196 in number, elicited great applause. Many of these young people already hold positions of trust and responsibility in business and professional life. The commencement address was given by Miss Margaret Wintringer, editor of The Crusader Monthly. The convention expressed its approval of The Crusader Monthly by giving 300 new subscribers to it.

The Frances E. Willard National Temperance Hospital.

The regular July meeting of the Board was held Monday, July 6, in the pleasant dining room of the institution. An unusually large number was in attendance. Much business of importance was disposed of and action was taken toward the erection of a new hospital in the near future. This has ever been the heart desire of the board, but never until the present time has this great object lesson seemed near realization. Several years ago property was bought by the Association in view of a permanent home. This property has since been paid for and is now unincumbered. This location is not in what would be called an attractively situated corner of the big round earth, but has some things to recommend it to the general public as well as to its many friends.

First, it is in a great medical center. The object of our hospital is "The practical demonstration of temperance principles in administering medicine and the inculcation of temperance truths in medical education."

If this be true, and we know it to be true, the selection of this spot upon which to build a permanent home for our hospital has been well chosen, and its many friends and those who have carefully nurtured its small beginnings, predict for it an enlarged and useful future.

Few, not in close touch with the details of the work, can realize the self-sacrifice and devotion of the members of the board to what they believe the greater, if not the greatest, principle in all of this mighty temperance movement, and in taking up this new "departure" they do it expecting trials and perplexities, but full of trust in the All-Wise Father, whose guidance and aid come ever in response to the cry of faith.

Mrs. Margaret Inglehart, Pres.

EXPERIMENTS

Learn Things of Value.

Where one has never made the experiment of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum it is still easy to learn all about it by reading the experiences of others.

Drinking Postum is a pleasant way to get back to health. A man of Lancaster, Pa., says: "My wife was a victim of nervousness and weak stomach and loss of appetite for years and was a physical wreck; although we resorted to numerous methods of relief, one of which was a change from coffee to tea, it was all to no purpose.

"We knew coffee was causing the trouble but could not find anything to take its place and cure the diseases until we tried Postum Food Coffee. In two weeks' time after we quit coffee and used Postum almost all of her troubles had disappeared as if by magic. It was truly wonderful. Her nervousness was all gone, stomach trouble relieved, appetite improved and, above all, a night's rest was complete and refreshing.

"This sounds like an exaggeration, as it all happened so quickly, but we are prepared to prove it. Each day there is improvement for the better, for the Postum is undoubtedly strengthening her and giving her rich, red blood and renewed life and vitality. Every particle of this good work is due to Postum and to drinking Postum in place of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Program for Fresh Air Mission Day, Monday, August 3.

Birthday of the World's W. C. T. U. Leader, the Lady Henry Somerset of England.

"She has a tear for pity and a hand open as day for melting charity."

HOLD the meeting, by all means, out of doors, on porch, lawn or in a grove. Many local annuals are held this month and by having an all-day meeting the business may be transacted in the morning and a special Red Letter Day program arranged for the afternoon.

It is a nice plan for members to invite friends as special guests and provide luncheon in the open air, each member asking as many as she is willing to provide for, either in provisions or money. By this means the effort may be carried out with little expense or labor to each and yet all may assist in the bounty.

Appoint a committee to attend to the serving of the meal. Fix the hour at half-past nine or ten a. m. if the annual business is to be transacted. If not, have the guests come at eleven and serve the luncheon at twelve, followed by the meeting with its special Red Letter Day features. If there is money in the treasury for the department of the Fresh Air Mission it will be a lovely act to invite for the day some shut-in city mothers, closely confined shop girls, or office clerks. We all know deserving individuals whom such an outing would benefit and delight. Members should notify the committee on collation beforehand, as to the number of their guests, so that everything will run smoothly. A pretty feature for the luncheon will be to have place cards or menus for souvenirs, fan-shaped, in significance of the day. (Tiny Japan fans may be found at Japanese stores or they may be made by deft fingers). Write upon them quotations from Lady Henry's utterances and tie them with white ribbon. Have an organ on the grounds or upon the porch for the music.

Program.

1. Hymn—"The Lord Is My Shepherd.
2. Scripture Reading—Isa. xxxv., with comments.
3. Prayer.
4. Vocal Solo—"London Bridge," Molloy.
5. Paper—"The Farm Colony at Duxhurst."
6. Reading—Selections from Lady Henry's address to the Geneva convention. (10 minutes).
7. Solo—"If I Were a Voice," White Ribbon Hymnal.
8. "From a Castle in England to a Castle in Spain," Elizabeth Gordon in THE UNION SIGNAL of Feb. 15, 1894.
9. An Address on the Fresh Air Mission Work of the W. C. T. U.
10. Sentiments from members. Paragraphs about Lady Henry and her work or quotations from her addresses and writings. White Ribbon Benediction.

Number 9 should, of course, contain a brief outline of the Fresh Air Mission work carried on by the W. C. T. U. and the characteristics and practical charities of Lady Henry Somerset. Refer to UNION SIGNAL editorials of March 29, 1900, and August 3, 1899. For Lady Henry's last address see THE UNION SIGNAL on July 9, 1903.

The Farm Colony at Duxhurst.

By Lady Henry Somerset.

NO greater problem faces people than how to arrest the alarming increase of inebriety among women. We cannot be blind to the fact that England stands in the unenviable position of being almost the only nation that has a drunken womanhood.

Woman has been specially associated hitherto in England with the sale of intoxicants, and the fact that her presence is to be found in every drink-shop has caused the safeguards that surround her in other countries to be set aside; but the hour has come when more people have begun to think, and it is to this arrest of thought that I believe we owe the legislation that has been granted to us during the last few years.

Some time ago short penal sentences were the only means by which habitual drunkenness was dealt with. It was looked upon wholly as a moral crime, and men had ceased to remember that from a moral crime it passed into a physical failing; that the habitual drunkard was utterly unable to resist the craving he had created when he came face to face with temptation, and that consequently when the term of imprisonment was over the wretched inebriate went back to his former life as certainly as he was turned once more upon the world.

It was in order to meet this great evil that the Farm Colony at Duxhurst was started, but since that day, now nearly eight years ago, the eyes of many have been opened. The Habitual Inebriate Act has been several times amended, and this year we have at last arrived at the point where the drunkard is no longer free to ruin his own life and the life of those who belong to him, but his personal liberty is sacrificed for the benefit of humanity at large. The great question comes, however, what are we to do with them? And this is where the homes at Duxhurst have, I believe, been a pioneer work.

Our farm home consists of a colony village, built on the slopes of the hills of Surrey. Far up the road in its own grounds is the manor house, which has been opened as a sanatorium for ladies. The most important feature of the scheme is the arrangement for the recognition of the individual among the patients. Each little cottage contains from seven to ten inhabitants, and a nurse sister who superintends the small family.

We long ago realized that to deal with large bodies of people suffering from one disease—a disease both mental and moral—was to court failure. The influence of thought would be far too strong to be overcome, and it was impossible to contemplate housing so many people together who were likely to harm one another.

Part of the success of the scheme has unquestionably been due to this system of dividing the colony into these small sections, where normal home life can be maintained, and where each individual feels herself of importance in her own small circle.

The Adirondack Mountains.

The lakes and streams in the Adirondack Mountains are full of fish; the woods are inviting, the air is filled with health, and the nights are cool and restful. If you visit this region once, you will go there again. An answer to almost any question in regard to the Adirondacks will be found in No. 20 of the "Four-Track Series," "The Adirondacks and How to Reach Them;" sent free on receipt of a 2-cent stamp. by George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

The cottages are simply furnished with just such utensils as every self respecting laborer ought to have at home—clean, dainty and pretty—and the women take immense pride in what they call "our little home."

The occupation that is given to them is almost entirely out of doors, for we have realized that we are combating an evil which is not only moral, but which is physical also, and that therefore it is absolutely necessary to give them an antidote for the poison which has destroyed their lives. Nothing better can be found than the wholesome outdoor work on the lawns, among the flower-beds, in the vegetable garden, and in the forcing house; and the way in which the women who have come to us utter wrecks are built up, the manner in which they regain their youth, proves that our theory is correct.

Early tomatoes and cucumbers are grown for the market under the superintendence of a lady gardener from Swanley. All the vegetables for the colony are grown by the women themselves, and I think that we shall be able to prove that gardening is not only a healthful occupation, but a good opening for the industries of women.

We have had most encouraging cases, we have also had some bitter disappointments; but I may safely say that when the women leave us it is sometimes impossible to believe that they are the same who came to us twelve months before; and parting with the patients is so sorrowful a scene that we realize at any rate that happiness has come to them during their stay with us.

When we met together at Easter time to celebrate the Resurrection festival many women who had left asked leave to come back. In one instance a woman was to come with her husband, another was to bring two or three of her children, and the eagerness with which they desired to be with us showed that their residence with us had been something more to them than mere hospital treatment—it had brought them an understanding of the happiness of being cared for and the realization of home.

Individual dealing with women, the influence of individual character, individual happiness, and individual thought must in the end tell for nothing but good.

I think we even care in the colony what the patients wear on Sundays; we notice their new bonnets and their new dresses and all sorts of frivolous things that go to make up our own home life, and I do not think that when we speak of these so-called little things it makes the prayers of those who join together on Sunday in our pretty church any less devout.

The women that come to us are the wives of artisans who earn small wages; women who perhaps have not been taken before a magistrate, but whose homes are desolate enough thru drink; servants who have lost their characters and consequently their situation; young women who, on account of hard work and late hours in shops and other places of business, have begun to drink and are ruining their lives at the very outset.

All these come to us voluntarily, stay a year and put themselves of their own free will under restraint; and the letters we get from husbands and brothers, fathers, mothers and sisters are heartrending. Their willingness to pay all that they can toward the maintenance of the inmates and their eagerness to cure those who are bringing wretchedness and degradation into their lives show us daily the necessity of such a home.

In one year we refused 3,000 cases, and since we opened we have been obliged to deny over 10,000 women admittance for want of room. It is, however, cheering to know that our medical man gives it as his experience that 65 per cent of our cases are standing well today.

Hugh Brotherton, Curate.

moor thinks better of me than I deserve, but it has not the most remote intention of promoting me to its very brief list of saints."

"What a lucky escape for you!" retorted the lady with so odd a glance from her laughing eyes that the curate wondered what she could possibly mean. Just then, however, the first carriage appeared in sight, and for the next two hours he had more than enough to occupy his mind.

Pitsmoor will never allow it to be forgotten that as many as six private carriages set down their occupants at the door of the club that day. Not for one moment did it suppose that this unpretentious building was the attraction. As everybody knew, the gentle folk had come to do honor to the two brave lads to whose deed the club was to be a standing witness. The miners crowding together at the lower end of the room, watched Hugh as he modestly received the congratulations of the guests and, to a man, were proud of him. They were more than ever proud when he authoritatively dragged Sam out of a remote corner and, grasping his arm, held him forcibly by his side. Sam Widgery, senior, in his working dress, leaned over the back of a bench and watched his perspiring offspring with a sardonic grin. While thus engaged he was urbanely accosted by a portly visitor.

"You have a son to be proud of, Mr. Widgery," said the non-resident squire, who had diplomatically requested that any relative of the "fine young fellow" might be pointed out to him.

"So-a they say, but darned if I ever should have found it out for myself," was the uncompromising reply.

"Well, Mr. Widgery, between you and me, both Sam and I know perfectly well that we are not worth all this fuss," said Hugh, with his usual readiness.

"Oh, I say nowt agen you, but oor Sam aren't nor ever will be, that's sartin," persisted Widgery the elder, with the air of one who knew.

But other strangers were already claiming the attention of the two heroes of the day, and the squire, moving on at the same time, left the old man to finish his grumble alone.

"I think I never before saw Mr. Brotherton look so absolutely saintly," murmured a voice at Rose Glyn's side; "so happy, too. I suppose it is comforting when the world shows that, for once, it can appreciate solid worth at its own value."

"Does he look happy?" said Rose, in her matter-of-fact way. "I rather fancied that he was wishing it were all over."

"Oh, surely not! Such a day comes but once in a man's life. Look at Enoch. Scandalized as that good old man would be by the suggestion, he is simply worshiping his idol."

Rose turned her eyes in the direction indicated and her face softened.

"Enoch appreciates him, certainly," she said, with a smile.

Mrs. Langley laughed softly. She was thinking how greatly she would enjoy being present should anything occur to shatter Enoch's confidence in Hugh. It was not possible just now to follow out the idea, for Mr. Boyd and some of the more influential members of the company were ascending the temporary platform, and an eager crowd pressed forward to secure an advantageous position. Mrs. Langley drew Rose onward with the rest, and managed to secure standing room in a conspicuous position directly opposite to Hugh. Rose shrank behind a stalwart figure at her side, but Mrs. Langley maintained her advantage smilingly. The speeches that ensued were more remarkable for enthusiasm than brevity, and the burden of them all was the praise of the curate and Sam.

"All honor be given," said one speaker, "to that man who fails to see any merit in his own heroism. Nevertheless, Pitsmoor takes leave to feel proud"(anticipatory cheers, in which Mrs. Langley ostentatiously joined, with her laughing eyes fixed on the discomposed Hugh), "and not Pitsmoor alone, but the county—nay, the whole country, I venture to say, claims its right to be proud of the two young men to whom we do honor to-day."

Again the speaker was interrupted by a burst of cheers, in which Mrs. Langley seemed incapable of joining, she was laughing so immoderately. Hugh regarded her fixedly during the next few minutes and his face, if possible, grew paler than ever. A reference was made to the happy association of culture and labor in the noble work of rescue of which this club was the memorial, and the young men of Pitsmoor were exhorted to live up to the example of which they would ever be kept in mind by the two admirable likenesses that so fitly adorned their reading-room. Personally, the speaker admitted, he knew but little of Mr. Sam Widgery, but he felt himself safe in saying that he was an honest, manly chap, whose example any Pitsmoor lad ought to be proud to follow; while as for their curate, they all knew what his life was. Let them all pray that they might have grace to copy it.

Hugh, with his eyes still fixed on Mrs. Langley, flushed crimson. The lady, laughing helplessly, was reduced to wiping her tearful eyes.

"My dear Miss Glyn, you must excuse me," and she glanced again at Hugh. "I know how rude it must seem; but it really is too funny for anything."

"It is? It had not struck me in that way," said Rose stiffly. She was both puzzled and displeased.

The surprise of the afternoon proved to be the presentation, on behalf of the colliery proprietors, to each of the two rescuers of William Sellers, of a handsome gold watch, suitably inscribed. The secret had been well kept, and when, in response to the invitation of the chairman, the two young men ascended the platform, there was an outbreak of enthusiam such as Pitsmoor had never before witnessed. Mrs. Langley joined in it tumultuously, with her clapping hands raised high in Hugh's sight, and her laughing eyes, full of dreadful mockery, fixed on his. There could be no mistake about it now; it was pure mockery. Hugh turned his eyes away, and his face grew rigid.

When silence was at last restored, the chairman, turning to the two young men, thanked them in the name of the proprietors, in the name of the community, and in the name of humanity, for the act of heroism that had averted from their midst one of the saddest of calamities, and asked their acceptance of these small tokens of the unbounded admiration and gratitude they had so nobly earned. Hugh essayed to reply, but some minutes elapsed before he was permitted to utter a word, so deafening was the roar that greeted every successive attempt at speech. When at last he was permitted to proceed, his voice was strained and hoarse. He could only say for himself and his friend Sam that, unworthy as they knew themselves to be, they would henceforth do all that in them lay to justify the kind things that had been said of them to-day. He warmly thanked the proprietors for the handsome and unexpected gifts that he and Sam had just received; with all his heart he thanked the liberal donors who had so spontaneously promoted the foundation of the young men's club, and tho, for the life of them, neither he nor Sam could bring themselves to thank those generous contributors who had insisted upon placing their photographs in their present conspicuous position, he prayed that those same photographs might serve as a continual reminder of what Pitsmoor had henceforth a right to expect of them both.

In the midst of renewed applause, one lady was heard to laugh outright.

"May I venture to add a hope," added Hugh, as soon as he succeeded once more in making himself heard, "that if, in the future, either or both of us two, should unhappily disappoint those who have shown to-day that they think far more highly of us than we deserve, these photographs, placed where they are—not, let me repeat, by our will—may at least serve to remind you that once in our lives we tried to do our duty."

In the midst of prolonged cheers, he stepped down from the platform and made his way thru the crowd to Mrs. Langley and Rose.

"How glad you must be that it is over," said the girl, with shy sympathy.

"I am." He gave her a grateful glance, but turned at once to the lady at her side.

"My dear Mr. Brotherton, what an ovation you have had! So well deserved, too. I would not have missed it for anything. How I wish Bob had been here. He said I was to tell you how very much he regretted being unable to be present. He has missed the chance of a lifetime, for, as you and I are aware, the circumstances are probably unique, are they not, Mr. Brotherton?"

She smiled slowly and broadly into his face before turning to Mr. Boyd, who, at the moment, hurried towards them in search of helpers for the tea-room. The vicar looked from her to Hugh with some anxiety, before despatching the latter to his duties, and was manifestly relieved when, with some laughing excuse, the lady took her leave.

"I never liked Mrs. Langley so little. I think she is just horrid to-day," said Rose to her sister, over a late and tepid cup of tea.

Mrs. Boyd laughed.

"I saw you were very wroth about something. What was it?"

"Her manners. They were simply atrocious," said Rose, with severe reticence.

Almost at the same moment Hugh was saying.

"Vicar, I can't stand this any longer. I must see Mann, and then there is something you must know."

"Is it about Mrs. Langley?" asked Mr. Boyd quietly. "I feared that it was too manifest to-day to pass unnoticed. It is a shocking thing. Mann will be in a terrible way."

"I—I—I don't know what you mean," uttered Hugh. But even as he stammered the words, an awful conviction forced itself upon his mind.

"Oh, if you have noticed nothing, I am sorry I spoke," and Mr. Boyd turned to an approaching parishioner. "You'll be going home soon. Brotherton?"

"Yes, I shall be going home soon," said Hugh mechanically, and taking his hat, he walked away in the direction of Dr. Mann's house as one dazed.

Literature Superintendents' Take Notice.

Mrs. Jennie E. Rhoads, of San Jose, Cal., has the following "open letter" in a recent issue of "The Pacific Ensign:" "A continual dropping wears a stone," and this Ensign and SIGNAL superintendent keeps right on trying to impress every white ribboner she meets that it is a case of "must have it" if they are to keep "up with the times" of our W. C. T. U. work; and if the readers of the Ensign see that at our institutes and conventions the State and National papers are always in evidence, and are spoken of by superintendent, or some one interested, it would be more certain to enthuse them in our department. Right here I want to enlarge upon "my point of privilege" by asking every Ensign and SIGNAL superintendent in Bi-County, Santa Clara and San Mateo to feel that ours is (shall I say it?) the most important of all, and that they try to help our sisters to see that they can no more do without them than they can do without their cook-book—in fact, I am not sure that they could not do without the latter better, for, after all, the cook is often a law unto herself, and in our W. C. T. U. work we must, more or less, depend upon our leaders, and how can we know of their leading but by closely following the printed rules and regulations as they come to us week by week in the Ensign and SIGNAL? Think of a train running along its own pace, without the dispatcher's message at each station!

I think we have eight superintendents. Let us astonish the publishers before State convention, and incidentally win that banner.

Government Will Conduct Experiments with Tobacco.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 10.—Prof. Wiley, chemist of the agricultural department, will conduct another experiment this fall which will attract as much attention as did the famous squad of twelve "poison eaters" that for seven months was subjected to experiments with food adulterants at Prof. Wiley's "borax boarding house." The experiments to begin in the fall will be for the purpose of determining the effect of tobacco, good, bad and indifferent, pure and impure, and domestic and imported, upon the heart, lungs and digestive organs and the human system generally. Cigaret fiends, snuff "dippers," cigar smokers and devotees of pipes will make up the new squad, which will consist of eighteen men of all ages.

During the first thirty days of the experiments the members of the squad will not be permitted to use tobacco in any form. Thus all the members will begin on the same basis.

One month prior to the date set for the conclusion of the experiments and the disbandment of the tobacco users, the men will again be forbidden the use of tobacco in any form, and the results of this sudden stoppage and the effect upon the physical condition of the squad will be carefully noted. A large number of clerks of the agricultural department have offered their services for the experiments.

The convention was called to order at 2 o'clock by President Francis E. Clark, father of the Christian Endeavor movement.

URGES INCREASE OF MEMBERSHIP.

The president's address, which was loudly applauded, was a call to increase the work of the society. Along two great lines he urged this increase; first, an enlargement of the membership of the local societies. As a definite proposition to insure this increase Dr. Clark proposed that every state strive to gain at least 10 per cent annually for the next ten years, thus entering into a ten years' extension campaign. An increase campaign book will be opened at the headquarters of the united society, in which a page each year will be devoted to each state, telling the story of its growth in every line of its endeavor.

The secretary-treasurer's report showed a large growth in the membership of the society, both at home and abroad.

A Veteran Teetotaler.

At the late meeting of the National Temperance League, at the Mansion House, London, General John Desborough was in the chair, which had been held for so many years by the late Archbishop of Canterbury, so long known in the temperance world as Bishop Temple. General John Desborough is nearly eighty years old, and has served his country in many climes. Thirty-five years ago, when strenuous efforts were being made to further the cause of temperance in the army, Colonel Desborough attended a meeting at Shoeburyness, and was so much impressed by a speech of the famous Samuel Sims, that he signed the pledge as an example to the men. He became one of the pioneers of the movement, and to-day there are over 40,000 total abstainers in the British army. The General remembers the day when officers openly declared they would rather take their men into action half drunk than sober. When telling the tale, the veteran officer adds, "but to-day none, from a field marshal to a drummer boy, would say such a thing!" He has all these years been a firm believer in the safe canteen where the men can find everything to interest, instruct, and refresh themselves with, but drink. Wherever he was stationed, no matter in what quarter of the world, he set about starting a place of this sort; so much so that for years he went by the "soubriquet" of the Canteen (alias Cantin') Colonel. General Desborough is a brother of Louisa A'hmuty Nash, long time state reporter of Oregon.

Clergymen Who Abstain.

Some recent English statistics of the habits of clergymen are of interest from a temperance standpoint. Out of 2,887 Congregational ministers, 2,551 are total abstainers. The Free Methodist, New Connexion Methodist, and Bible Christian bodies report an aggregate of 6,638 ministers, of whom 5,602 are abstainers. The Society of Friends have 369 ministers, 350 of whom are abstainers. The Baptists have 1,953 ministers and missionaries who are enrolled abstainers. Eight Baptist colleges report the whole of their 179 students as teetotalers. Of 2,409 Baptist churches 1,959 have a Band of Hope and 1,964 use unfermented wine at the communinon.—The National Advocate.

He hired a small room in a mean portion of the city and in ten months died of what the doctors called "galloping consumption." But the on's secret plot and found that he had poisoned himself by consuming 3,500 cigars and about 100 pounds of tobacco.

Publishers' Notes.

An Inspiring Booklet.

No more tender tribute to Miss Willard was ever penned than is found in "Frances E. Willard's Message to the Womanhood of the Age," by Rev. Frank M. Bristol, D. D., of Washington, D. C. Having been a pupil of Miss Willard, at the Northwestern University, in Evanston, Dr. Bristol speaks with knowledge of her wonderful life and its value to the world. Place the booklet in the hands of your friends, reserving a copy for your own desk, that her "message" may often inspire you. Only a limited number of copies are left. Price 15 cents.

David Douglas and His Wife.

Glimpses of the very natural home life in a minister's family, very human and lovable children, the white ribbon mother and the evolution by which the father becomes one whose vote is in harmony with his prayers and sermons, with the serious consequences of this stand which he took for conscience' sake—these are found in "David Douglas and His Wife," by Mrs. O. W. Scott. With its pleasing phraseology it is a book well worth reading for the story alone, and the reading will surely give to many the needed arrest of thought. Speaking of those persons who are said to "sit on the fence," it says: "Nowadays this fence is upholstered and has become a fashionable resort. There is so much doubt and uncertainty in the air that one begins to waver before he knows it." Notice the offer of this book to subscribers: Cloth bound 50 cents, paper cover 25 cents.

The Crusader Monthly.

We are pleased indeed with the hearty words of commendation which come to us from all directions, showing that the Young Crusader with new name and new form is delighting its many friends.

CONGRATULATIONS on the courage which has put The Crusader into the new form. You have made an especially happy hit, it seems to me, in the new name. It removes the difficulty of using the paper as the organ of the Seniors as well as of the Juniors, while preserving enough of the old to link the two series together. I heartily approve of the change, and the June number is GOOD.

ALICE M. GUERNSEY,
L. T. L. Secretary of New Jersey.
(First Editor of The Young Crusader.)

What his manual is to a soldier; his chart to a mariner; "Dun's" or "Bradstreet's" to a merchant, is The Crusader Monthly to the Legioner. Just laid on my desk, not yet have I read it thru in its new form, but from every page I catch larger enthusiasm, larger plans, larger inspiration;—every column is gripping in its interest. And twenty-five cents for a whole year's subscription! Surely no well-informed, thoroly equipped L. T. L. Crusader would think of being without this indispensable official organ. We ought to include it in our pledge, and I promise to subscribe for and regularly read The Crusader Monthly!

CHARLES WESLEY BURNS,
Ex-President Pennsylvania L. T. L.

The copies of the June Crusader Monthly came all right, and I was much interested in the change. I am very much pleased at the improvement, both in the contents and the appearance. I think it will appeal to the Senior Legioners much more closely—it seems more like "our" paper, and I am sure will accomplish a greater work for our young folks than it could have as it was before. I hope the change will stimulate the Legioners to better support. I am confident that this will result.

HERBERT C. SHATTUCK,
President New York L. T. L.

I have carefully read The Crusader Monthly. I like the new arrangement very much, and I enjoyed reading the paper. I have shown it to two district conventions.

Our Cause in Canada

Mrs. Ella A. Boole's Valuable Work—Temperance Talk by Pro-Whisky Paper—Strong Methodist Endorsement.

Elizabeth Griswold Waycott, Correspondent.

MONTREAL, July 6.—The Province of Quebec has just had a great uplift by the coming of Mrs. Ella A. Boole, president of the New York State W. C. T. U., who spoke in different towns and cities for a fortnight. She attended the county conventions all day, assisting in many ways with advice and encouragement and giving spiritual and practical noontide Bible readings. No praise can be too great for her work.

That she made a stir in Montreal was proved by an editorial in one of the largest daily papers whose whisky advertisements are proverbially prominent and whose attitude on all questions of social reform is diametrically different from ours. The paper said: "The victory for temperance is being won by business men who have learned that in these days of fierce competition sobriety is essential to success. The W. C. T. U. and some of its kindred organizations are, if anything, brakes on the wheels of progress." And have the business men found that sobriety is essential? Then our prayers are answered.

But another tone is taken by the Methodist Conferences all over Canada. At a recent meeting one of the ministers called us "our good brethren, the W. C. T. U." In Toronto the conference endorsed the campaign of the W. C. T. U. against cigarets, strongly protesting against the sub-section of the criminal code legalizing gambling on the race course during race meetings, and urging the enactment of a law similar to that recently considered in Great Britain, prohibiting the publication of all betting intelligence in the newspapers.

In Kingston the report of the committee on temperance, prohibition and moral reform was as follows: "We rejoice that there is decided progress in sentiment, activity, and liberality toward the cause of prohibition, and we desire to express our appreciation of the self-denying efforts set forth by ministers and other Christian workers individually or in organizations, especially the W. C. T. U., all of which have done much to create and sustain a healthy public sentiment." Dr. Chown, the newly elected secretary of Temperance and Moral Reform for the Methodist Church of Canada, delivered an inspiring address. In the bicentenary year of John Wesley's birth he could begin his remarks by a reference to Mr. Wesley's attitude on the liquor traffic, who had characterized the traders in alcohol as "Butchers general, driving their patrons to hell like sheep."

The London conference endorsed our methods, advocating the education of the children in temperance in the public schools, in the Sunday-schools and in the Epworth League. "Educate, agitate and legislate, and the temperance people will put their heel on the greatest evil this community has ever known. It is the business of the church to so reveal the evils of strong drink that it will find no place in the civilization of the twentieth century."

The good news has come that there will be a W. C. T. U. Institute at Grimsby Park, the Chautauqua of Canada, from August 9 to 12. This has been a desire that the officers long hoped to have satisfied and are anticipating excellent results. If any of our sisters from the States are near Niagara Falls on a tour at that time it would be a short trip and one well worth while.

Successful Crusade in the Northwest.

Special Correspondence.

In the liquor fight at Montavilla, a little suburb of Portland, Ore., to which reference was made in a recent issue of THE SIGNAL, the liquor side is for the present apparently victorious, as the saloonkeeper's license has not been declared void. The fight hinged on the point as to whether the saloonkeeper had the number of names required by law as signers to the petition for his license, and as to whether these persons were actual residents. The decision of the court was in favor of the saloonkeeper.

Forest Grove, another little town near Portland, and the seat of Pacific University, has been more successful in a recent temperance campaign. The town has never had an openly licensed saloon, but liquor has been obtainable. The question as to whether the town should have regularly licensed saloons or not was agitated, and it was decided to leave the matter to a vote of the people. Some of the earnest consecrated temperance workers of Portland went down to Forest Grove and did what they could to help the temperance cause along; college authorities and the churches lent a hand; temperance literature was sent to the voters, and the result was that the temperance people scored a victory of 158 to 111 at the election.

Woodlawn, another suburb of Portland, downed a saloonkeeper who was petitioning for a license to run a saloon in Woodlawn. The saloonkeeper had forty-four names to his petition and the temperance people had about 200 names, and so they carried the day.

Hood River, a little town of Northern Oregon, voted down three petitions for saloons about the middle of last month. Garfield, Wash., which has not had a saloon for twelve years, is making a brave fight against the liquor element, which is trying to get the upper hand there, and so, "here a little and there a little," something is being done.

Mrs. Harford's Splendid Work in California.

Mrs. Dorcas J. Spencer, Correspondent.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 11.—Mrs. Helen D. Harford, president of Oregon, has been kindly doing neighborly service in California, having recently made a trip down the Sacramento Valley from the Oregon line as far as Sacramento and back. During this little trip she visited twenty-one towns, organized eight local and three county unions, preached nine sermons, gave twenty-eight lectures, nearly always meeting the next afternoon with the women; held three conventions and two institutes; addressed three young people's societies and a number of Sunday schools; took the names of 113 new active members and 36 honoraries; pledged 64 adults and 50 children; addressed nearly 4,000 children in the public schools; three L. T. L.'s, and various other efforts too numerous to mention. The organization of one union involved seventy-two miles of stage travel at an expense twice as great as the collection received, but it paid in moral results. Regions like these are crying out for workers to be sent, and the more settled communities should provide the means to reach them. Such heroic souls as Mrs. Harford are doing more good than can be estimated.

Good Tidings From Maryland.

Enthusiastic Meetings—New Unions in Baltimore—Manifold Work at State Headquarters.

Mary R. Haslup, Correspondent.

BALTIMORE, Md., July 14.—Our work goes steadily on in Maryland. Four counties have had their annual meetings, all occasions of interest and enthusiasm for the work, and two counties have held institutes with carefully prepared programs. Baltimore city has several new unions, with additions to the membership of the old ones.

Dr. Mead of New York spent the month of May in the state under the direction of the Prohibition party workers. He spoke for a number of our unions while here. Rev. Alfred Smith of Wilmington conference has given some fine addresses at our meetings.

Meantime our state headquarters stands as a beacon light in our chief city. The free kindergarten, Sunday-school, boy's league and mothers' meeting that have their homes in this building are closed for the warm season, after months of faithful seed-sowing, but the gospel meeting at noon knows no intermission. On every day of the week save Sunday someone is here to lead in song and prayer, to read a message from God's word, often with hopeful comment, and to greet in kindly fashion any who may come into this place of worship and rest. For thirteen years the state union has owned and occupied its present headquarters, and through these years, and even before, the noon Gospel meeting has been constantly maintained. Many wandering wayward ones have here found the Master, while to others, worn and discouraged, the hour's communion has brought new faith and trust.

Virginia Nuggets.

Mrs. Howard M. Hoge, Correspondent.

LINCOLN, Va., July 6.—Cape Charles W. C. T. U. has secured twenty-three new members in its membership contest. Mrs. James Sterling is president of this union and Mrs. W. T. Townsend corresponding secretary. Mrs. Townsend had the honor of securing the most members in the contest. A reception was given the new members.

Winchester union has just celebrated its eighteenth anniversary. The occasion was an enjoyable one, and $23 was added to the treasury by sale of refreshments.

James City county W. C. T. U. has been organized by Mrs. Newton, with Mrs. Louthan, wife of a Baptist minister, as county president.

Under the Mann bill the temperance forces of Isle of Wight county have driven all the saloons from the county except those in the town of Smithfield, and they are preparing for a local option election there.

Loudoun county convention was held at Philomont June 17. While there is no union at this point the convention was well attended and all the unions in the county had good representation. Much interest was manifested by the people of the community and they furnished enjoyable music for the occasion. The Loudoun Camp Meeting Association invited the county W. C. T. U. to take charge of one day of its camp meeting in August.

Lincoln union has been honored recently by visits from two ex-state presidents, Mrs. R. D. Wilson, now of Chattanooga, Tenn., and Mrs. R. H. Jones, of Norfolk.

Conditions in Tennessee.

From the State President's Outlook.

Silena Moore Holman, Correspondent.

FAYETTEVILLE, Tenn., June 26.—The outlook in Tennessee is more encouraging than I have ever known it to be When the legislature renewed so many charters of towns in our state last winter and spring, reincorporating without saloons, most of the saloons were given a few months in which to close out their business. Now every day we hear of some town closing out its last saloon. Out of about 3,000 cities, towns, villages and postoffice hamlets in the state, intoxicating liquors can be sold in only about a dozen, and nowhere in the country.

The temperance sentiment in our state is very strong and grows stronger ever day. It is believed that the saloons could be voted out of Nashville today if the people were given the chance to vote on the question. The recent election of the law and order candidate for mayor in that city over all competitors seems to give some ground for the belief.

For years the W. C. T. U. and the Prohibition party have had their speakers going up and down the land undermining the citadels of the evil one by their invincible logic. The Anti-Saloon League, a comparatively new force in this state, did magnificent work last year in securing the change in our laws which has rid so many of the larger towns of the saloon.

The W. C. T. U. did what it could to create the sentiment that brought about that result, and was no mean factor in the fight. In addition, the organization stood practically alone in the fight against the dispensary, which, with the help of the Lord and our magnificent governor, is dead forever, we think, in this state.

The unions all over the state are taking on new life and increasing in their membership as never before. Miss Lillie O'Daniel—not Miss A. Daniel, as recently wrongly published—a lovely, talented, Christian young woman, has been selected state organizer for the Tennessee W. C. T. U. In her we feel that we have a new and very efficient force in the work and one who will do much to move the work onward and upward in this state.

The Mountain Branch of the Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, being built at Johnson City in this state, will be ready for occupancy some time during the fall or winter. We are hoping and praying and working that "the powers that be" will not permit the establishment of a canteen in this home. Johnson City is now in prohibitory territory, and they have not the excuse that the canteen is necessary to keep the soldiers from the temptations of the outside saloon.

Thursday, August 6, is W. C. T. U. day at Monteagle. Frances Beauchamp, Lide Merriwether, Mary Jewett Telford and Miss O'Daniel will be with us. We are expecting a large attendance from all parts of the state and will be glad of the attendance of friends and W. C. T. U. women of other states. I am specially anxious to have southern state presidents and southern W. C. T. U. women interest themselves in this day and so far as possible be in attendance. It is our Southern Chautauqua and our work should be ably and attractively presented from this platform.

November 4, 5 and 6 is the date of our state convention at Morristown. I have never been so encouraged in the work, never so hopeful of building it up to goodly proportions.

Tasmanian Notes.

Mrs. C. E. Morton, Correspondent.

HOBART, Tasmania, June 1.—To begin with, we are all congratulating the Australasian union on their selection of a president. Mrs. Rooke, for some years our state president, has been chosen Australasian president in succession to Mrs. Nicholls, who has ably filled the post for (I think) three trienniums, and represented this part of the world at the last World's convention.

Members of the local unions in Hobart, Launceston and some parts of the county have much enjoyed the visit of Mrs. C. E. Clark, press superintendent of the Australasian union, and her clear, forceful speaking on women's duties and rights has aroused much interest. Other visitors specially welcomed by the unions in the cities were Mana Ramabai (daughter of Pundita Ramabai, whose work in connection with the child widows of India is known thru out the civilized world), and Miss Abrams, an American lady who accompanied her. Both in Hobart and Launceston special meetings were arranged in their honor, and a fresh impetus given to the cause of Indian missions.

Members of the Launceston union recently discussed the advisability of providing a home where discharged prisoners might be received and helped to make a fresh start in life. A work such as this is urgently needed in both our cities.

Members of the W. C. T. U. and others who desire to see female suffrage the law of the state are much encouraged by the possession of the commonwealth franchise, and there seems some likelihood of the introduction of a state measure this session conferring this right on the women of Tasmania.

Earnest preparations are being made for Crusade week by the local unions, which are realizing the need of determined effort to keep present members and obtain new ones.

Winning Its Way in Colorado

The "Institute Team"—The Power of Saloon in Mining Towns—W. C. T. U. Allowed Delegates at Charter Convention in Denver.

Esther A. Gaymon, Correspondent.

DENVER, Colo., June 14.—Our "institute team," as we lovingly call Mrs. Hungerford and Miss Davison, are out on a two months' trip, during which time they will travel 1,500 miles in the western portion of the state. They are everywhere meeting with success. There are some discouragements, one of which is the isolation of the unions from each other and the great expense of traveling. In the southern and western parts of the state the unions are often from eighty to 100 miles apart, and with car fare at five and six cents a mile it is difficult for our workers to visit them.

MRS. E. A. MC KINNEY,
Successful Solicitor.

MRS. A. A. HAWLEY,
State President.

ROSE A. DAVISON.
Y Secretary.

There is great need of temperance work in all these towns. In a recent letter Miss Davison, our Y secretary, says of one of the towns visited on this recent trip: "Rico is a silver camp in the southwestern part of the state that flourished during the years when silver was high. It still clings to the side of the mountain in a forlorn and hopeless condition, but the most desolate condition exists in the lives that have been ruined by the saloon element. It rules the town, intimidates the men and crushes the women. A little handful of brave souls try to stand for the right, and the backbone of this group is a young man but twenty-three years old, thru whose efforts a W. C. T. U. Institute was held here and a union organized." This is only one town of many, but in all there are a few faithful ones who are working for temperance, and their power is beginning to be felt.

At Monte Vista, Mrs. Boutwell, with the aid of the Y girls, has solicited money for the support of a reading room. The rent of the room is now paid by the city and the W. C. T. U. is responsible only for the literature and attendant. The city is building a new hall which is to contain a new reading room.

Mrs. McKinney of Grand Junction is also doing some good work. By personal solicitation she has secured nearly $50 for the Cottage Home at Denver and was the chief factor in making $150 worth of articles for a sale, the proceeds of which go to the Temperance Hospital, Chicago.

By the passage of the Rush Amendment Bill a new charter for Denver was made necessary and at the recent charter convention the W. C. T. U. of the city were allowed ten delegates who assisted in naming the twenty-one men on the civic ticket which was elected on June 2. Thru their influence a brewer's name was struck from the ticket and a prohibitionist's added.

Those elected on this ticket are also pledged to maintain the temperance laws which now exist in the suburbs of Denver.

Rhode Island Items.

Temperance Work in the Schools—Enthusiastic District Conventions.

Mary E. Olney, Correspondent.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., July 6.—Since last reporting to THE UNION SIGNAL the local unions of Rhode Island have carried on their regular lines of work with usual interest and zeal. The prizes offered in the public schools, for the best essays on the "Effects of Alcohol and Tobacco on the Human System," awakened an unusual interest in the subject both among teachers and scholars, the latter doing themselves and their teachers credit through their efforts. The temperance advertisements in the street cars have appealed to the young people's societies in the churches, many promising financial aid, and bidding the work "God speed."

In connection with new headquarters, the East Greenwich union has a room for the boys which has been kept open one or two evenings each week. The ladies thus come in touch with many boys whom they could not otherwise reach, and assist them in learning how to do practical work, as well as seek to uplift them morally and educationally. Thru this effort the town authorities have also become interested in the boys and their needs. One union has devoted much time to contest work, within a few months having held four oratorical and three musical contests, the latter greatly aiding in connection with the former.

District conventions have been held with the usual degree of enthusiasm. The last was exceptionally well attended, and of unusual interest thruout. It was held in connection with the two hundredth anniversary of the building of the Friends' meeting house at Saylesville. Mrs. Mary A. Babcock, state president, presented impressively the subject of Purity, based upon the Savior's words, "Blessed are the pure in heart." The district president, Miss Allie Parker, added illustrations from personal contact with working girls, showing the vast need of purity work in our cities.

The convention was favored with the presence of Mrs. J. K. Barney, who came a long distance so as not to disappoint this gathering. This convention surpassed all others in Rhode Island in that it was honored by the presence of the Governor of the state and an address from him. A part of the time of the convention was devoted to the W. C. T. U., the other part to the Friends; the whole being mutually helpful and enjoyable to all.

Tribute to a Faithful Nebraska Worker.

Dora V. Wheelock, Correspondent.

SUPERIOR, Neb., July 3.—While our regular UNION SIGNAL correspondent is on her vacation, I will take the opportunity to say something about her and her work. With all our efficient women we have few such "all-around" women as Mrs. Medora D. Nickell, of Beatrice, vice-president of Nebraska W. C. T. U., UNION SIGNAL correspondent and Medal Contest superintendent. Her first state work was as superintendent of L. T. L., in which position she was most efficient. For four years she did good service as recording secretary. In every position and in local work she is emphatically a "minute woman"—ready at a moment's notice to serve as organist or leader of devotionals or music, secretary, chairman or principal speaker. And she is always so willing—a much appreciated virtue in a W. C. T. U. woman.

MEDORA D. NICKELL.

Mrs. Nickell is an acceptable speaker and inspiring leader, having the faculty which brings things to pass. She wonderfully attracts young people to her. In the power of expression with her pen she is especially gifted. Such a woman devoted to the work of the W. C. T. U. is invaluable. We are sure of wider fields and a greater usefulness.

Many Missouri Accomplishments.

Field Work—New Unions—Conventions—Chautauquas.

SAVANNAH, Mo., July 20.—Missouri is wide awake and has several workers in the field. The vice-president-at-large, Mrs. Mary L. Woods, is doing excellent work in the last three months. Miss Roena E. Shaner, state organizer, is organizing and strengthening new unions in the southeastern part of the state. She goes to the thirteenth district for two weeks. R. Foster Stone, one of the best prohibition speakers, is using his talents for the W. C. T. U.

Twenty-three W's and seven Y's have been organized this year. The largest union, that at Madison, consisting of fifty-four members, is the result of Mrs. Hoffman's visit. The absence of this logical, forceful speaker from the state has been widely felt. There are new unions in five county-seats. At one of these points, only a few years ago, Rev. John A. Brooks, prohibition candidate for vice-president, was burned in effigy.

Conventions have been held in the Second, Fourth, Tenth, Eighteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-sixth and Twenty-eighth districts. In all but two medal contests were a part of the program, with fine results. The state president attended three of the conventions. Mrs. Hoffman spoke at three district conventions and was "a great help in many ways." Mrs. Hoffman, Miss Bowers, Miss Shaner and Mrs. Guild were Fourth of July orators in different counties.

Miss Berthe J. Bowers, state organizer, conducted a School of Methods June 23-July 3, at Carthage Chautauqua. She will speak August 3-4 at Maysville Chautauqua, and August 8-9 will give an address and sermon at Rock Port Lecture Congress.

Missouri expects to hold three diamond medal contests this year. In fact, Missouri will be heard from in many ways.

Ohio Happenings.

The Old Crusade Spirit Still Alive—Many New Unions Formed—Conferences at Lakeside.

Mrs. Anna B. Stillwell, Correspondent.

TROY, Ohio, July 14.—Our youngest state organizer is Miss Jeannette Fuller, who began the work only last September, but who has to her credit twelve new unions, four of which have L. T. L.'s, over 250 new members and more than 100 subscribers to our official organs. She organized Kingsville with twenty-eight members and Amboy with fourteen last month, and the union at Perry, Lake county, in December. The latter holds full and very interesting mothers' meetings, and recently had two successful contests, and has a junior and senior L. T. L. of seventy members, under the able leadership of Mrs. Helen Green.

Stark county convention met at Alliance. There was a fine program and good attendance. On the first evening the Alliance Y's held a well-attended public meeting, with addresses by representatives of other young people's organizations. This Y, as well as the W. C. T. U. of the county, has been greatly bereft in the recent death of Mrs. J. E. Andrup, its efficient president. Miss Frances Ensign gave the address on the second evening of the convention.

Mrs. L. E. Bailey, national organizer, has been in southeastern Ohio, and has organized new unions at Feesburg, Mt. Orab and East-side, Portsmouth. The Ensign Y of Cleveland recently celebrated its tenth anniversary. A helpful series of conferences are being given at Lakeside during the present month. These are in charge of Miss Olivia Thomas, state recording secretary, and some of the state superintendents will be present. On W. C. T. U. Day, July 24, the state president, Mrs. Annie W. Clark, will give an address on the World's Convention.

The W. C. T. U. Home at Lakeside has been remodeled so as to accommodate more guests, and a commodious reception room added, which will make it one of the most attractive places on the grounds.

Chautauqua assemblies are being announced in various parts of the state, and at most of these the W. C. T. U. has an honored part.

Many medal contests are being held and fine educational results obtained. Carroll, Damascus, and Clarksville Y's deserve special notice.

Cambridge union has made a gain of eighty-two members, and Cumberland, of the same county, a gain of eighty-three.

Connecticut Notes.

M. Josephine Lockrow, Correspondent.

MERIDEN, Conn., July 6.—The semi-annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of New Haven county was held in Milford June 3. Sixty-nine delegates were present and a large number of visitors. An unusually interesting program was presented. Mrs. Alta H. Downs, county president, was made a life member of the state union. The banner was awarded to Wallingford for the largest net increase in membership.

MRS. ALTA H. DOWNS.

The Anna Gordon L. T. L. of Yalesville recently gave a largely attended evening entertainment. The children did credit to themselves and their superintendent. Tho only a few months old, the Legion numbers eighty. The Bramford union is active in Flower Mission work. Every Thursday flowers are sent to the New Haven hospital and to the sick ones in the town.

A Legend.

THERE has come to my mind a legend,
A thing I had half forgot,
And whether I read it or dreamed it,
Ah, well, it matters not.
It is said that in heaven at twilight
A great bell softly swings,
And man may listen and hearken
To the wonderful music that rings,
If he puts from his heart's inner chamber
All the passion, pain and strife,
Heartaches and weary longings
That throb in the pulses of life;
If he thrusts from his soul all hatred,
All thoughts of wicked things,
He can hear in the holy twilight
How the bell of the angels rings.
And I think there is in this legend,
If we open our eyes to see,
Somewhat of an inner meaning,
My friend, to you and me;
Let us look in our hearts and question,
"Can pure thought enter in
To a soul if it be already
The dwelling of thoughts of sin?"
So, then, let us ponder a little;
Let us look in our hearts, and see
If the twilight bell of the angels
Could ring for you and me.

The Science of Children.

By Mrs. Isabella Webb Parks.

SCIENTISTS of today plume themselves upon the superiority of the modern "scientific method" over the lack of method of old-time scientists. The boasting is by no means vain, for the modern method, to base all conclusions upon the most careful observation and comparison of all facts attainable, is the ideal for arriving at truth. By this method science has made its wonderful strides during the nineteenth century. But, tho the method leaves little to be desired, the men who use the method are subject to many of the frailties of the men who had no method to speak of. It is true that the modern method represents a broader spirit than that which characterized ancient times, yet modern scientists sometimes fall into the very errors for which they condemn their predecessors and against which the modern method is a protest. Even yet, scientists of repute allow their theories to blind them to facts, and base their conclusions upon such facts alone as seem to support their hypothesis and sometimes even distort the facts to bring them into harmony with their pet theory.

We owe much to the science of paidology, and it will do much more in the future than it has done in the past for the development and proper training of children, but, had all the errors which paidologists have taught been carried out in practice, its evils might easily have overbalanced its good.

Evolution teaches that the human body passes in the embryotic state thru all the changes by which, thru the centuries, it has attained its present form. From this physical fact paidologists have been quick to infer that the individual human soul likewise passes thru, from infancy to maturity, the stages of development which have marked the progress of the human race. There is truth in this, and much good results from taking it into account in our training of children. The child's small appreciation of the value of truth, and still smaller of the quality of mercy, was taken by our ancestors as proof positive of his total depravity. Wise trainers of children in the present time, while appreciating as strongly the need of teaching children the sacredness of truth and instilling into them lessons of tenderness and mercy, reach the results more surely by very different and much better methods. The child is no longer treated as a hardened criminal and inhumanly whipped, but as an undeveloped soul whose eyes have not yet been opened to see the difference between good and evil.

Our school system sadly needs reconstructing in accordance with some of the truths of paidology. Far better would it be for the children if, following the broad hint which their natural curiosity, keen observation, and uncontrollable activity give us, we took them, in their earlier years, out to study nature in her manifold forms instead of shutting them up like prisoners for long hours in the schoolroom, to studies for which they have no taste. How many of the modern ills to which flesh is heir, what injury to brain power, what permanent dislike for intellectual pursuits are the result of this wrong method, how much defective eyesight is produced by forcing the immature eyes to the close work of the printed page, we shall never know until a wiser method has had time to show its better results.

These and many other truths paidology has to teach us that we cannot heed too soon. But when a scientist asserts that because the more primitive, not to say savage, traits of human nature characterize the earlier years of childhood, we should cultivate those traits to the neglect of the gentler virtues, it is time to call a halt and inquire whether this conclusion is in accordance with all the facts or whether it is the mere carrying to a logical conclusion a theory based upon only partial facts. As this teaching has back of it no less an authority than President Hall of Clark University, we cannot ignore it. He, with other paidologists of his stamp, hold that in early childhood not only does the child pass thru the barbarism and cruelty of the early ages of the human race, but that it is incapable of appreciating anything better or of being actuated by other motives than those belonging to its period of development. He "would not," therefore, "present to the child, until the child was about fourteen years of age, anything with regard to Christ, excepting perhaps at Easter and Christmas." Until that time he would confine the child's teaching in the Bible to the warlike characters of the Old Testament.

If the old-time discredited scientists can furnish any more extreme examples of theory run mad to the utter exclusion of masses of contradictory facts, we have yet to learn of the case. A congress of mothers could in five minutes bury this absurd theory as completely as Vesuvius did Pompeii. Every mother of experience and discernment knows that the average child of five is capable of such appreciation of the "altruistic emotions and motives" that Jesus of Nazareth can easily be made to him a most fascinating character. I, myself, know personally one little five-year-old who, in her constant demand for stories, usually asks for "a Bible story about Jesus." Another, when under ten, preferred above all others the entirely unsensational story of the call of Nicodemus and his frank and simple faith. And these are but instances which stand for a large class known to us, proving beyond a peradventure that little children may easily be interested in the characters whose strength lies in their gentleness and loving self-sacrifice for others.

There is some truth, too, in the statements concerning the selfishness of children and their indifference to suffering. Yet we know many children much below the age at which Dr. Hall thinks them first capable of appreciating the great Altruist, who show the greatest generosity, true unselfishness, and deep sympathy with the suffering, physical or mental, of those around them. No mother of several children but can cite numerous examples of little children of five and over freely sacrificing their own pleasures to minister to mother when she is suffering from headache or other bodily ills, and sharing their own gifts with brothers, sisters, and playmates. Like their elders, too, these children find the truest joy in thus doing and giving for others. Note these children at Christmas. Fully as much as they enjoy their own gifts do they enjoy the giving of what they can afford from their slender purses to their companions. The Sunday-school is learning this fact, and note the change so rapidly being introduced of having the children give instead of receive in their Sunday-school Christmas festivities.

The mothers of the past, like the other workers by whom they were surrounded, were sadly unscientific in their work and knew far less about children and how to rear them than they should have known, but they do know, Dr. Hall to the contrary notwithstanding, that children are not hopeless barbarians or savages up to the age of fourteen or even four, but that, even in infancy, the virtues which Jesus of Nazareth came to exemplify are lying dormant in the child's breast ready to respond to the first call. The child does not need to pass thru its barbarous and savage stage before it can appreciate and aspire to the nobler and higher virtues. Indeed, if we should follow the theory of the paidologists in this regard, the chances are that the majority of our children would never develop beyond barbarism.

The Referendum in Oregon.

By James P. Cadman.

IT is a year since the Referendum amendment to the constitution of Oregon was adopted by the overwhelming vote of eleven to one. Altho in operation for so short a time some of the good effects of the new plan are already apparent. Some of these results are: 1. Exploiting schemes have been kept out of the legislature thru fear of this veto power of the people. 2. Good measures that had been vigorously attacked by interested corporations were allowed to stand, the people refusing to sign their petitions for a call for a referendum, thus showing the trustworthiness of popular judgment and incidentally refuting the slander sometimes made that "any one will sign a petition."

Hon. W. S. U'Ren, a member of the legislature of Oregon, in a late letter to Eltweed Pomeroy, president of the National Direct Legislation League, says: "The first effect of the Referendum in Oregon is the comparative absence of charges of corruption and partisanship in the legislature. The newspapers have generally spoken well of the last assembly or said nothing, while for the previous ten years at least, the rule has been that some bitter things were printed about the want of honor and intelligence among the legislators. Altogether, the last session of the last assembly was the best for many years, and we credit a good deal of this to the direct legislation amendment."

After speaking of the failure of certain parties to secure the referendum on several laws, Mr. U'Ren continues: "We may logically deduce from this experience that the referendum is not easily invoked, even tho only five per cent of the voters are required; that a law must be very unpopular if the people will not permit it to be tried, when there is no reasonable ground to believe it was corruptly passed; that if the people have any good reason to suspect that the referendum is sought from selfish motives or for personal profit they will not sign the petition in such a case. So far the results have been very satisfactory."

Referring to the same subject about which Mr. U'Ren has just been quoted, The Oregonian, of Portland, says in a late editorial: "The result may be accepted everywhere as it is in Oregon, as a fresh testimonial to the wisdom and safety of popular government. The referendum stands accordingly as a safeguard in the people's hands against pernicious acts of an unworthy legislature and a conniving governor. Any hope of using it as an instrument of improper purposes must be infinitesimal, after the late severe test, in which powerful interests conspicuously failed in their attempt to invoke the plebiscite by widely circulated and strenuously urged petitions.

"The amendment is the stronger for its trial; and while it is likely to remain a dead letter except in its operation as a potential check on legislative misconduct, it may yet have a day of abundant triumph in actual employment to defeat a pernicious law."

Alabama's Single Tax Colony.

By Anna Brown Hall.

ALABAMA has something unknown to any other part of the world. It is the possessor of the one and only single tax colony in the world.

Founded at Des Moines, Ia., some eight years ago, it is now located in the piney woods of Baldwin county, Ala., on the shore of the beautiful Mobile Bay, some twelve miles across from the second city of the south, old Mobile.

Many were the hardships of those who were the first settlers, but the outlook is bright today for the men and women who are making true the motto to "make good theories work."

No land speculation is inside the colony, but the land speculator sees his advantage, and many from the north are coming to fill up the country back of the colony grounds, reaping the benefit created by the colony.

Five years ago a W. C. T. U. was organized, and out of this grew the work of Mrs. Callie Howe, National organizer, who blazed the way for state organizer, Mrs. Anna D. Elder, and later, Mrs. Maude L. Greene, National chalk talker, whom we have now adopted as our very own. Her membership is in the Mobile union which she herself organized.

A district organization was effected, and convention was held last September. This district brought in 200 of Alabama's new members, and helped to put Alabama in on Benefit Night and to win us the loved National banner.

All this work is due to the Fairhope Single-Tax Colony where men and women have equal power in voting as well as in taxation.

Last January a Congregational church was organized, with members from seven different denominations. Rev. George L. Dickinson, a broad-minded W. C. T. U. brother, from Northfield, Mass., has accepted the call and is now pastor of the church.

Our people are liberal and progressive, and we offer to industrious people a rare opportunity to secure homes in a climate said to be equal to California.

A W. C. T. U. MISSION HOME.

MARY S. A. WEBB.

READERS of THE UNION SIGNAL will be interested in a detailed account of the work of the Mission Home at Savannah, Ga., which has been briefly alluded to in press reports from that state.

This Home is, as expressed by a local paper, "a monument to the untiring and unselfish interest of Mrs. Richard Webb, president of the local W. C. T. U." The building cost $26,000 and was dedicated last November. The following description is from the pen of Rev. J. A. Smith, a local clergyman:

A few years ago a called meeting of the several pastors of the city was held in the parlors of the Y. M. C. A. and ministers of the various denominations were present. The meeting was called to devise ways and means looking toward the opening of a home where meals, beds, and comforts could be secured at prices within the reach of the poor, the unfortunate, and the downtrodden.

The need of such an institution had been realized for years. The movement contemplated the material, the moral, and the spiritual welfare of an unfortunate but oftentimes deserving class of people. The value of such an institution was not questioned. The discussions recalled the fact that every minister present realized the necessity of such a work in Savannah. Preliminary steps were taken looking toward the opening of such a work. Committees were appointed to investigate the plan of building, cost, etc. Another committee met with the mayor to discuss the matter of assistance from the city. At a later meeting, however, unforeseen difficulties made it necessary to discontinue further efforts.

A few days ago by invitation of Rev. J. R. McCornica, superintendent of the W. C. T. U. rescue and mission work, I had the pleasure of inspecting its new home, erected on Liberty street near the Central Railroad depot. I found the ideal plan and building for just such a work as the one desired. It is well worth the time of any person to visit and inspect the institution. Under the consecrated energy and management of Rev. Mr. McCornica, his wife, and daughter, the building and work were destined to fill a long-felt want in Savannah. For eighteen years Mr. McCornica has been engaged in this kind of work. He came here at the call of the W. C. T. U. from Montreal, Canada, where he was engaged in similar efforts.

The entire building from bottom to top is a model of neatness and convenience. On the first floor is the chapel, where evangelistic meetings are conducted each night by Supt. McCornica or some visiting minister. Every Saturday night a free supper is served after the service. The average attendance at these meetings is about thirty or forty. This number will be largely increased when the public generally know of the service. In these meetings sit the rich and the poor, the learned and the unlearned, the saint and the sinner. Every person is made to feel at home. Not a few have professed saving faith in Christ in these meetings since the opening night. Next to this room is the library and reading room. Here the tired, the footsore and the stranger can spend a few hours reading, writing or resting. A number of good books are on the shelves, but there is room for several hundred more. There are families in this city that could donate dozens of good books to this worthy institution and never miss them. Across the hall are the dining room and kitchen. Here a good meal may be obtained for fifteen cents. Numbers are availing themselves of this opportunity to secure a good meal surrounded by such homelike influences.

Upstairs are the rooms occupied by the superintendent and his family. On this same floor is the dormitory for girls and women. Here are a number of nice, clean beds that can be secured for fifteen cents a night, or, when taken by the week, seventy-five cents. Adjoining the dormitory is a nicely fitted up parlor and reading room. On the third floor is the men's dormitory, where beds can be secured for the same price. The building is steam heated, lighted by electricity, and supplied with shower baths thruout.

Here the man with a depleted pocketbook—the toiler on a meager salary—can find board and lodging for $2.50 per week. Not to speak of the many other comforts with which the home is supplied. It is the intention of the ladies who have this noble work in charge to add fifteen single rooms to their equipment at an early date.

It is the proud boast of those who have this work in hand that no deserving man or woman without money shall be turned away from their doors when applying for a meal or a bed.

In the rear of this building is a two-story outhouse, that could be made very comfortable for a few hundred dollars, where free beds are given to men who have no money, provided they are sober when applying. In this building are thirty beds. Every month hundreds of free meals and beds are given to the poor and unfortunate.

The superintendent has recently got out a little book containing twenty tickets which he sells for one dollar. One of these tickets whenever presented entitles the holder to soup and bread; two, a good meal, and three, a night's lodging. Quite a number of merchants, doctors, lawyers, ministers, and others have provided themselves with these books, and give out the tickets when approached for assistance.

In connection with this work garments of all kinds are received and distributed. Thru the partial assistance of the city several sick and unfortunate ones have been sent back to their homes and friends. Hospital and jail work is also a feature of this institution.

Here is an abiding work in our midst which deserves and ought to have the sympathy, prayers and assistance of the citizens of Savannah. Here is an opportunity for those whom the Lord has blessed with this world's goods to transmute some of the gold which perishes into the coin of the King's realm by assisting this most worthy institution in its unselfish labors of love. Here is an investment that will not only pay large dividends in this life, but larger by a thousandfold in the life to come.

A Foe to the Human Race.

Chas. H. St. John, M D.

THE use of alcoholic beverages is as old as civilization. The demoralization wrought by the beverage use of alcohol in various drinks is beyond computation. Its physiological effects upon the human body and the mind faculties are a decreased tissue resistance resulting from alcoholic indigestion. It prevents oxidation and causes other nutritive disturbances. Tho taken into the system in small quantities, it coagulates the pepsin and albumen of the food and destroys the solvent powers of the gastric juice. It also decreases the motor and the absorbing power of the stomach. It profoundly affects all the tissues of the body, and especially those which enter into the structure of the nervous system.

Alcohol excites the mucus membrane of the stomach. The first to suffer are the brain cells, by thickening of the tissues. Alcohol acts upon the blood, destroying the red corpuscles, or causing them to shrink. Healthy protoplasm is essential to healthy life, but alcohol produces disease. Persons who take no alcohol live longer, and can work harder, than those who do.

Alcoholic beverages produce disease and incite to crime. One form of heart disease is a result of alcoholism and produces exhaustion and irritation. Every vascular organ of the human body suffers from alcoholic effects if the use is continued. The constant use of alcoholic beverages will finally overthrow the most brilliant mind and all its powers, and arouse all the lower and violent passions.

The unquestionable consequences of alcohol seen in hereditary law should alarm the physiological student of to-day. Statistical evidence is abundant showing the blighting effects of alcoholism in parents upon their children. Let us consider Morel's table of alcoholic neuropathic degeneration extending through four generations:

"First generation, immorality, alcoholic excess, and brutal degradation. Second generation, hereditary drunkenness, maniacal attacks, and general paralysis. Third generation, hypochondria, lypemid, maniacal attacks, and general paralysis. Fourth generation, feeble intelligence, stupidity, attacks of mania."

From a careful observation extending over many years we believe this table of hereditary sequences to be approximately correct. A legacy of low and defective vitality, feeble powers of resistance, and inability of adjustment follows. Untold numbers of children are born into this life weaklings, and go down under the fascinating power of appetite thru lack of physical, mental, and moral strength. Medical science, true to its mission, rejects alcoholic depressants as a remedial agent to-day, and treats the powerful destroyer as other dangerous poisons.

If for the next four or five generations our race would be absolutely free from alcohol and tobacco, we should see men and women with superior bodies and minds, with an increased limit of life reaching beyond a century.

Only One Way.

HOWEVER the battle is ended,
Though proudly the victor comes
With fluttering flags and prancing nags
And echoing roll of drums,
Still truth proclaims this motto
In letters of living light—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Though the heel of the strong oppressor
May grind the weak in the dust,
And the voices of fame with one acclaim
May call him great and just,
Let those who applaud take warning
And keep this motto in sight—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Let those who have failed take courage.
Though the enemy seems to have won,
Though his ranks are strong, if in the wrong
The battle is not yet done,
For sure as the morning follows
The darkest hour of night,
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.—British Weekly.

Chapter XX.

DR. MANN was not expected home for another hour at least, and, moved by some irresistible impulse, Hugh asked for Mrs. Langley. With some hesitation on the part of the maid, he was admitted and shown into the drawing-room, where he was almost immediately joined by the lady of the house.

"What an unlooked-for pleasure!" she exclaimed gaily; "at the very earliest, I did not expect you before tomorrow. What a delightful meeting we have had!"

"It was far from delightful to me," said Hugh, gloomily.

"My dear Mr. Brotherton! How ungrateful! After all the nice things we have been saying about you, and all of them so true!"

Hugh raised his troubled eyes to her face, and shrank, not entirely for his own sake, from what he saw there.

Mrs. Langley sank, less gracefully than usual, into a chair.

"Do you know, I heard for the first time this afternoon that there is actually not one of the odd dozen who still has the temerity to hold out! Even that terrible old Sellers, I am told, has signed the pledge. Is it really so?"

"Yes, he has signed it, for what his signature, poor old boy, is worth," said Hugh, as gloomily as before.

He did not raise his eyes this time, and so missed the smile with which his answer was received.

"And all this is the fruit of your labors. How thankful you must be for what you have been privileged to do!"

This was too much.

"If you did but know—" began Hugh.

"And don't I know?" she asked softly.

He looked up then. She smiled strangely into his face, but gave him no chance to speak.

"One has but to look around this parish to see what, by your influence, and, of course, by your example, you have done for us all. I wonder what other man, in the course of less than twelve months, by sheer force of goodness and sincerity—most of all, I do believe, by pure transparent sincerity—"

A cold sweat broke out on Hugh's brow.

"Mrs. Langley—"

"Stay!" she said imperiously. "There are times when one must speak. Shall I tell you of one who owes"—she laughed a little—"yes, owes all that she is at this moment to you? I have never spoken to you of myself as I mean to speak now. Long before you came to the parish I had lost faith in—everything; not willfully; circumstances were too much for me. So far as I could see—and I tried honestly enough at times—there was nothing to believe in. Then you came, and with you came reality. Don't interrupt me, please. And don't think that I was at once convinced. Do you remember your first visit? Your anxiety to secure me as a district visitor, or something of the kind; and Bob's determined opposition? Let me confess now that I was simply making game of you, as he said. But I soon lost all inclination to laugh; your earnestness was more than a match for my levity. As you know, you won the day."

Hugh bit his working lip, and stole another glance at her flushed and excited face, but he made no further attempt to interrupt.

"The fiasco of your first temperance meeting simply amused me; so did the claptrap of your sermons, at times. But your goodness—your real honest goodness," she repeated, with smiling insistence, "those were not so easily laughed away."

Involuntarily, Hugh covered his face and groaned. The next moment he looked up impetuously, but she was smiling strangely still, and he looked into her face without speaking.

"I do so want you to understand all that you have done for me," she went on softly. "One moment!" for Hugh had risen suddenly to his feet. "I meant to have kept what I still have to say for a more dramatic moment; but, somehow, it will out. You will not have forgotten my message to that despicable hypocrite—despicable was your own word, I think; at any rate, it should have been—whose course of deception you sketched so remorselessly in the pit? I said then that I was chiefly sorry for him, but were I to say so now I should be wrong. To-day my strongest feeling toward that most miserable fraud is one of contempt. For you spoke of yourself, you know," and she laughed gently. "That hypocrite was you. I hope to have the pleasure of proving it to all Pitsmoor, in spite of all that you may say."

"I have nothing to say. It is the truth," said Hugh, in a smothered voice.

"Exactly so. Now listen. I had been drinking for years, whenever I could elude Bob's vigilance, until you came. You know how, by degrees, I was led to give it up; and I don't know, but I think that I might some day have become a good woman but for you."

"My God, have mercy!" gasped Hugh, for mercy there was none in the pitiless eyes that still smiled into his.

"What about Enoch and the odd dozen? What mercy do you expect to get from them? You will soon know. Oh, be very sure that you shall soon know!"

The young man lifted a haggard face.

Do you think it was of that—do you think it was of myself at all that I was thinking?"

She laughed again.

"Really, I supposed it possible; but if you say otherwise—"

He raised his eyes shrinkingly to her face, and turned them quickly away.

"Oh, I see! You fear that I have been drinking too freely, and are greatly scandalized. Well, you are right as to the fact. What then?"

Hugh said nothing. There was nothing, as it seemed to him, that he had any right to say.

She looked at him for a moment before turning away, but vouchsafed no further word. He heard the door close behind her, and a few moments later he left the house, and returning to the deserted club, locked himself into the room that had been prepared for his own use. Deeply as he had repented of his sin, Hugh Brotherton had never before seen it as he saw it now in the light of Mrs. Langley's scornful smiles. Verily that "unmitigated scoundrel," poor old grandad, was not without his peer.

"A scoundrel, an unmitigated scoundrel, that is what I have been—I, Hugh Brotherton." He said it over and over again to himself in incredulous misery, unable to realize it, yet knowing it to be true. And who would believe in his repentance since, thru no fault or cowardice of his own, even the poor merit of confession had been wrested from him? There was but one thing left to him to do. He wrote, at considerable length, to his father, and, having read the letter thru, addressed and sealed it without delay. Then, having taken it to the post, he called again at Dr. Mann's surgery door, and was at once admitted. The doctor, in his smoking jacket, was enjoying a glass of something hot with a pipe. The pipe, however, came out of his mouth at the sight of Hugh's face.

"Halloo!"

"You would have done better had you allowed me to own up when I was anxious to do so," said his visitor grimly, as he dropped into a chair.

"The deuce I should! How's that?" demanded the doctor, in dismay.

"Because Mrs. Langley has found me out."

"The deuce she has!" said the doctor again. "What makes you think so?"

"I had it from her own lips a couple of hours since."

Dr. Mann whistled softly. "I haven't seen her since I came in."

He half rose, and sat down, as if undecided as to the advisability of some step that occurred to him.

"I think I know why you asked me to keep my own secret," said Hugh, in the same sunken voice. "Was it—partly—for her sake?"

"Yes."

"I was afraid so."

The quietude of his voice was the quietude not so much of composure as of despair; but the doctor had, at present, no thought to spare for him.

"Excuse me, will you?" and he abruptly left the room.

It was some little time before he returned to the room, looking careworn and hopeless.

"Yes, she seems to have found you out; but you may as well give me your own version of the facts."

"The facts? Oh, for that matter, the principal fact is that I am a finished scoundrel. There is no doubt whatever about that," said Hugh, bitterly. "And yet," he added, after a pause, "I declare to you that I started honestly enough."

"And then?"

The younger man glanced toward the half-emptied glass upon the mantelpiece, and paused.

"Do you remember the first evening I ever spent with you here?"

"I remember it very well."

"The conversation turned, as you may also remember, upon the total abstinence question. You objected altogether to the principle, and gave some excellent reasons in justification of your position. You were sipping whisky-toddy—hot, and very fragrant—as you are now, and I was looking on. You needn't sneer. I've not the slightest desire to shift the blame of what followed on to your shoulders; but those are the facts."

"I wasn't sneering," said the doctor untruthfully; "go on."

"Mind, then, without blaming anyone but myself, I am simply telling you how it began. I had been an abstainer—strictly so—up to then; but, for all my principles, I had the craving for alcohol in my blood. I had been brought up in the belief that it was humanity's greatest curse, and I hated to see it in your hand, yet the very smell of it attracted me, and even while I was denouncing it, I knew that I dared not have taken it from your hand into my own."

Dr. Mann ran his keen eyes impatiently, yet professionally withal, over the young man's face, and turning toward the window, waited for more.

"The longing to taste that stuff haunted me," said Hugh, very low; "consequently, I had very little difficulty in persuading myself that your arguments were sound. I got some whisky soon afterwards, and experimented with it."

A more or less perfect recollection of the nature of the arguments he had used, and of the malicious pleasure he had taken in driving them home, served to rouse the doctor's ire.

"I see; and, unless my memory plays me a trick, you contrived to work those experiments in side by side with some very striking temperance oratory in support of your former principles."

"They were my principles still, and before long I had a wretched experience of my own to draw upon as a warning to others," said Hugh bitterly.

The doctor stared.

"But—excuse me—what am I—what are any of us to make of such admissions?"

"Make of them what you please. It is scarcely possible to make your interpretation too black for the facts."

The doctor eyed him again, rather dubiously.

"You are not, by chance, reveling in the joys of piling up your iniquities? It is a phase of religious enthusiasm not altogether unknown."

"It isn't that with me. I don't know that I would have owned to anything—now—if I could have helped it. I tell you I have been found out."

"Ah, true! Did she tell you?"

"No; what does it matter? I may have been seen at some time throwing the stuff away."

"Throwing it away?"

"I have done it often enough. You don't suppose that I went under without a struggle, do you?"

"I don't, for the life of me, know what to think," confessed the doctor, rumpling his hair. "Let's see now. You began to drink, as I understand you, soon after that evening spent with me; that beginning being the direct result of the arguments I used. Well, I was a fool for my pains, and in one way or another every fool has to pay the price of his folly. You know that, don't you, Hugh Brotherton?"

He paused, took up his glass in a meditative way, gazed steadily at its contents and, rising, flung the hot drink out of the window into the parsley bed.

Hugh knew well enough what the action signified, but he said nothing.

"You began to drink soon after that night," pursued the doctor, in his most matter-of-fact way; "and have continued to drink, as heavily as you dared, ever since?"

"Up to the day of the accident; yes," admitted Hugh.

Dr. Mann recollected something.

"Talking of accidents," he said smoothly, "there was that little affair, you remember, when your landlady found it necessary to come for me."

Hugh colored violently.

"You had been with some friends, and had met with a mishap for which they alone were responsible," continued the doctor, narrowly watching the other's face.

"That was a lie. There was no accident, as you understood it. There were no friends. I alone was responsible," said Hugh steadily. "I went too far and by dint of lying had what I thought at the time was a lucky escape."

"Where, if one may ask, did it happen?" inquired the doctor, with his most pleasant air.

Hugh winced, understanding all that the pleasant air implied.

"At Milborough; that is, I was pretty right when I left the place, but I had some with me."

"I see. And then—"

Dr. Mann still spoke in the pleasant tone that Hugh found so remarkably unpleasant, but he answered him doggedly.

"It was dark before I ventured back, and somehow or other I managed to get into the house and up to my room without being seen. It was the row I was fool enough to make afterwards that did for me."

"Quite so," said the doctor. He recalled the ingenuous confession that had so readily been made to him, and smiled openly.

Hugh made no response to the smile, and after glancing at him a second time, the doctor dropped his eyes to the hearth rug and softly whistled a bar or two of a popular air.

"Those designing friends of whom you spoke so candidly were then entirely fictitious characters. You lied like an expert, Brotherton. I am scarcely ashamed to say that at the time you completely took me in."

"I have no right to resent the insinuation; but, as a matter of fact, I was not an expert in lying at that time," said Hugh.

He spoke without the resentment he disclaimed, and perhaps, for that reason, the doctor felt a little

Children's Cozy Corner

The Boys Who Camped Out. By James Buckham.

MY first experience in camping out was the most exciting I ever had, thou a big boy, I suppose, would have called it both tame and funny. But I was only ten years old then, and my brother Proctor, who was really the hero of the adventure, was only eight. There was one other boy with us, Freddie Childs, our next-door neighbor, and he was the oldest of all, for he was going on twelve.

We camped on father's lawn, in a tent made of three sheets. It was a very warm, still night in summer, and mother had made us a nice bed on the ground with a rubber blanket and old mattress, and some comforters, sheets, and pillows. Father had put up the tent, and it was just as tight and comfortable as a real tent in the woods. If we hadn't known that we were in it, we ought to have slept just as soundly as in our own beds upstairs. But we didn't, somehow, and that was the funny and exciting part of it.

We ate our supper on an old box in the tent at half-past six o'clock, and then we played Indians until eight, when mother came out and helped Proctor undress and get to bed. She left a candle for us, and after she had gone in, Freddie and I undressed, blew out the candle, and crawled under the blankets, too. For about twenty minutes we all lay pretty still, expecting to go to sleep like real, tired hunters. But somehow our eyelids didn't get heavy, and we kept feeling just as wide-awake as when we first got into bed. The crickets and grasshoppers were making an awful noise all around us, and there was a treetoad up in one of the trees that kept giving such a hoarse, croaking scream as would almost have frightened older boys than we. By and by I asked:

"Freddie, are you asleep?"

"No," said he, in a kind of faint voice.

"Are you sleepy?"

"No."

"Do you suppose anything would touch us here in the night if we should go to sleep?" I asked.

"I dunno," answered Freddie. He lay still for a minute and then said: "What I'm afraid of is catchin' cold. I guess I'd better go home and get some of those little homœopathic pills of ma's to take if I feel a cold comin' on in the night."

Freddie crawled out, lit the candle, and put on his clothes. The treetoad kept screaming hoarser and hoarser all the while.

"Come back soon, Freddie," said Proctor.

Freddie pushed back the flap of the tent. "Uh-uh!" he said, and then he was gone. We heard him walking kind of fast until he climbed the fence, then he ran like everything thru the grass. I guess he didn't know how well we could hear with our ears so close to the ground.

We watched and waited for him to come back, but he didn't come. It seemed kind of scarey for just us two to be out there all alone in the night. But somehow Proctor didn't seem to mind it as much as I did. By and by there came an awful yell from somewhere out in the dark. I knew it was cats, and yet somehow I couldn't quite believe it. It might have been a panther escaped from a circus, or a lynx, or something of that sort.

THE SHIP OF THE DESERT.

"Proctor," I whispered.

"Yep," answered Proctor.

"I believe I'm catching cold, too; aren't you?"

"Nop; I'm warm as toast."

"Now look here, you little foolish," I cried. "I know it ain't safe for us to lie here so close to the ground all night. If we don't catch cold, we'll get the rheumatism sure as the world. I'm going back into the house."

"'Fraid cat!" said my little brother.

I suppose I was really too nervous and frightened to get angry at him, though if he had called me "'fraid cat" in the daytime I would have made him howl for it. But as it was, I only got up and hurried into my clothes, coughing and trying to sneeze all the time, tho it was so hot and close in the tent that the sweat ran off the end of my nose. When I thought I had enough of my clothes on, I grabbed the rest as fast as I could and blew out the candle.

"There, Smarty!" cried I, as I was bolting out of the tent, "you can stay here all alone and see how you like it!"

Mother and father were reading in the parlor when I sneaked into the house and said that I was afraid I was going to catch cold out there. They both laughed until they cried.

"Where's little Proctor?" asked mother, when she could get her breath.

"He's out there," said I in a sulk.

"And Freddie Childs?" asked father.

"Gone home. Backed out 'fore I did."

"What! Proctor out there all alone?" cried mother jumping up.

"Yes'm. He felt so smart he wouldn't come in."

Mother lit a small lamp and went out to the tent. The air was so still it did not even toss the flame of the lamp. I watched from the window and saw her come back without Proctor.

"He won't come," she said, with a kind of shining eyes.

"Good for him!" cried father. "He's got some grit."

"But what are we going to do about it?" asked mother.

"Do? I'll go out and camp with him myself," exclaimed father.

And that was the way Proctor happened to stick it out. I've often wondered whether he would have done it all alone. But it taught me a lesson in self-control, not to give way to every foolish notion that enters one's head without stopping to reason it out. That's what makes the habit of cowardice.—Boys and Girls.

The Ship of the Desert.

EASTERN peoples, with their happy faculty for imagery, call the camel, their useful beast of burden, "the ship of the desert." And the name is indeed very appropriate. The hundreds of miles of treeless sand which constitutes a desert is very like a sea, and all merchandise and travel that go over it are conveyed by these useful animals. Their feet are like broad, spongy pads, which will not sink into the sand, and they can travel for days together without food or drink. In fact, the camel stores up a lot of nourishment in the big hump on its back, and when food cannot be obtained uses the fat thus laid up, and the longer it is used for food the smaller grows the hump.

The camel is a very useful animal, but he has a very ugly temper and snarls and bites when he gets angry, as one might expect him to do considering the desolate country he lives in and the hard work he has to do.

The use of the camel as a beast of burden dates back to earliest history. When Moses lived in Egypt many centuries ago long caravans of "ships of the desert" carried the rich stuffs and gold and spices from the East to Egypt, and Egypt's commodities in return to the far East.

You can see from the illustrations how nicely one may travel on a camel's back. The camel always has to kneel down for loading and unloading. His joints work like hinges, and they double up so quickly sometimes that if you were riding one you would be apt to plunge off head-first without much ceremony. It was one of the most amusing things at the World's Fair in Chicago to see the funny descents people made who were not used to riding camels.

1.—Numerical.

I sat at my mending one evening, and May,
My well-beloved daughter of twenty,
Sat with me, so I'd not be lonely, she said.
Oh! would that such girls were more plenty.

"How does 1 2 made such 3 4 5 6?"
Asked May with a slight little shiver,
"I just wouldn't mend those 1 2 5 6 7,
I'd toss them straight into the river."

"But, May," I remonstrated, "surely you know,
When your 1 2 3 4 5 6 7
Request you to do them a favor or two,
You do it, and don't grumble, even."

The Hand That Casts the Ballot.

A BISHOP of the Protestant Episcopal Church has taken exception to the old refrain "The hand that rocks the cradle is the hand that rules the world," insisting that the undue influence of women in our churches and in our Christianity weakens them, and urgently pleads with the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for big, masterful men to counteract this debilitating tendency. While the women of our land may feel an almost uncontrollable inclination to propound to the bishop a few questions relative to what would have been the status of certain departments of church work—for example, missionary, home and foreign; social and benevolent work—if this weakening influence had been withheld during the last half century, nevertheless the bishop is so pertinent that they gladly add their entreaties to the bishop's for more of the eternal masculine in our Christianity and our civilization. The Christian Church has not been lacking in those feminine attributes of loving-kindness, mercy and tenderness to the sick and suffering, and there never can be too great an emphasis placed upon such qualities in this world of sin and pain. It would, however, be strengthened by certain purely manly characteristics.

First, the Christian Church needs to assert itself with all the force of its basso profundo voice on every question that concerns the deepest moral interests of humanity, not alone from the pulpit, but in legislative hall, market and street, and this self-assertion should find expression in the masculine language of conviction, denunciation, and condemnation, where necessary. Too long has the church sat in the background, an interested observer of affairs, fearful of elevating its voice above a whispered protest. When the world, the flesh, and the devil come to understand where the Church of Christ stands on these vital questions, they will have been half conquered.

And, second, it is the right and privilege of the Church of Christ to assume the position of protector of the weak, to go out as did the knights of King Arthur's Round Table and champion the cause of those whose arm is feeble, whose will is a reed shaken by the wind, who are manacled with the chains of appetite. If the Church were to stand forth in righteous wrath and say to the liquor interests of the land, "The cause of these victims of yours is my cause, their wrong is my wrong, and their enemy my enemy. I am their advocate. Hereafter you must reckon not with their weakness but with the might of my millions in the church militant, and millions upon millions in the church triumphant." If such were its attitude, the bulwarks of evil would fall to the ground as the walls of Jericho at the sounding of the trumpets.

Thirdly, this is a Christian nation, and the Church of Christ, as a body and by its individual members, has a right to dictate on certain questions which vitally affect the lives and character of its people, and with its million-tongued voice to demand of the common councils of our cities, the legislatures of our states, and our national Congress that vicious legislation shall be dropped, that wise and beneficent laws shall be framed, adopted and enforced, and that corruption in places of authority shall be done away with. The Church of Christ, as a unit, casts a large and powerful ballot, and wields as well a mighty influence in the forming of public opinion, and its demands will not be ignored.

Gladly, thrice gladly, will the women welcome the day when the Church, clad in the masculine virtues of courage and valor, its strong right arm muscled with justice and righteousness, shall proclaim itself as the defender of the wronged and tempted and the dictator in affairs ethical.

Child Labor in Georgia.

BY a vote of 89 to 75 the lower house of the Georgia Legislature defeated, on July 8, the bill restricting the employment of children in "factories and establishments." Nothing new was brought up against the bill with the exception that one speaker attempted the twofold patriotism (!) of stirring up sectional prejudice and using it as a weapon. He declared that the movement started in New England and originated in jealousy of the South, just as when, years ago, New England discovered that slave labor was not profitable in that section, she began to preach against slavery in the South. For the rest, the arguments were those usually presented by the opponents of the measure; that it is sumptuary legislation; that it is the first step toward the establishment of a paternal government; that it is an infringement upon personal liberty.

In so far as these arguments represent honest opinions, they are expressions of a false conservatism—the Chinese kind of conservatism which effectually blocks progress by refusing to "lop the withered branch away." "Individual rights," of which we hear so much in these discussions, and which meant so much to our ancestors, have to a large degree, under present conditions, become individual serfdom, because to-day the individual no longer struggles against individuals, but against great combinations.

The right of the individual to sell his own labor on his own terms is not liberty, but slavery, when combinations of capital make the individual helpless before its demands. The only hope of the individual laborer lies, then, in combinations of laborers who shall give up their individual right to dispose of their labor, and shall pledge themselves not to sell their labor below a living wage.

The right of the parent to sell the labor of his child has become the most oppressive tyranny under present conditions. With our modern machinery, much work can be done by children which once required the trained skill of an adult. Child labor is of course cheaper, and merciless combinations of capital refuse to pay for this work more than child's wages. This produces the abnormal conditions of throwing the parents out of employment and leaving the family dependent upon the labor of the little children. When such a condition is reached, it is time for the state to interfere. If the parent cannot prevent the physical, mental, and moral destruction of his child, the state must. No more sure and terrible form of race suicide can be imagined than this destruction of children in mines and factories, and the state, by the laws of self-preservation, is bound to prevent it.

The truth most important for our modern statesmen to recognize is that our free institutions are, like everything else, in a state of constant evolution. That the past is secured only by going forward to its natural development in the future. A new movement, therefore, is not necessarily antagonistic to liberty because it is destructive of some institution or custom which in the past served the ends of liberty. On the contrary, it is probable that this institution has become an instrument of tyranny and must be lopped off.

"Each hard-won freedom withers to a bond, Freedom forever is beyond—beyond."

An Hour of Grace.

IT does not take a field of wheat to tell which way the wind is blowing, nor a cloud of witnesses to evidence the growing supremacy of the liquor interests in our municipal affairs. One little incident of a Chicago justice shop is sufficient: Five saloonkeepers being prosecuted for repeated violations of the midnight-closing ordinance appeared before the magistrate and pleaded guilty. The magistrate, with a logic which claims notice solely because of its absurdity, decreed that inasmuch as the courts allowed an hour's grace after a case was called, saloonkeepers should be allowed the same privilege, and have an hour after midnight in which to clear their saloons.

By such circuitous mental processes are the misdemeanors of this specially privileged class of lawbreakers rewarded with further license. There is no class of citizens who are allowed to play with our city ordinances and state laws in such a reckless and insolent manner. In how many dramshops is the ordinance regarding the sale of liquor to minors observed? How many saloons make any pretense of closing all their doors on election day or legal holidays? How many concern themselves as to the restrictions regarding public gambling? How large a proportion can be trusted to close at fixed hours when not watched?

An eminent English student of sociological conditions in this country once said that the greatest danger threatening our civilization was our large and easy tolerance of social and political evils; our disposition to submit to injustice and wrong rather than to involve ourselves in the trouble necessitated in facing it. Doubtless this characteristic, which every observing American must admit, is an outgrowth of a truly admirable national trait of character—a large-hearted charity which withheld from no nationality, nor creed, nor sect freedom of thought, speech, or action, and which has made us unique among the nations of the world. That charity, however, has become so diluted by indifference and inertia that it is now nothing more than a pale, colorless, vapid tolerance, lacking strength and power.

It is not necessary that a city or community be steeped in crime and corruption; that its officials and a majority of its voters be scoundrels and villains, in order that the ruin of that city be compassed. As in the physical universe, so in the social and political, a mere neglect to fight evil at every turn, a cessation of effort to encourage the process of evolution to a higher type of municipal life, a lazy sufferance of things as they are—these things are sufficient to open the way for the operation of the law of degeneration, and at every step the impetus downward makes it more difficult to regain lost ground.

"How shall we escape," saith the scriptures, "if we neglect"—that is all, and the warning is for society no less than for souls.

Progress in Russia.

SOME reforms recently instituted by the Czar of Russia prove anew the humane tendency of the autocratic ruler of the darkest land in Christendom. The world cannot but rejoice over the welcome news conveyed by a late telegram that the Czar has abolished the harshest punishments of barbaric times. According to this edict, the horrors of the "knout" are a thing of the past. There is to be no more castigation with cudgels and cat-o'-nine-tails, chaining to the car and shaving the head, which were still inflicted for certain offenses on persons exiled to penal settlements or to the mines.

Castigation with cat-o'-nine-tails and even with cudgels not infrequently ended in death, and was one of the harshest forms of the death penalty, being death by torture. Only the most hardened prison administrators could stand the terrible sight of the death of human beings under the measured blows of the cat-o'-nine-tails.

As a result of the Kishineff horrors the plan for the formation of a new police force to maintain order and assure security in the rural disticts of forty-six provinces of European Russia will be carried out immediately in fifteen of these provinces, but owing to the large expenditure involved, $2,250,000, six years will be allowed for its complete execution in the other provinces.

Also, in furtherance of the proposed domestic reforms, a new law has been promulgated, giving factory employes the right to appoint delegates from the co-workers to represent their interests in conferences with the factory inspectors.

So it seems that even Russia moves.

Our Next Convention. With the passing into history of our great World's Convention held at Geneva, Switzerland, June 9-11, our thoughts turn involuntarily to our next National gathering, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, November 13-18. This convention will be of extraordinary interest, as the Crusade State is the mecca of all white-ribbon hearts, and "Mother" Thompson, the leader of the first praying band, hopes to be able to greet all those who join in the pilgrimage to Hillsboro. THE UNION SIGNAL will present a series of crusade sketches and illustrated articles on the convention city during the next few months. Let each reader consider herself a member of the committee on convention arrangements and help to insure a large attendance by calling the attention of non-subscribing members to these special articles. Incidentally ask them to take the official organ and learn what the W. C. T. U. is doing all the year round.

The Young People and Temperance. Temperance was given a very prominent place on the program of the recent great Christian Endeavor convention at Denver. Eleven rallies devoted to the cause were held on one evening in as many different churches. All were largely attended, and the People's Tabernacle was literally filled to overflowing. Eloquent speeches were made by prominent people in the Christian world. Veritable thunderbolts of facts were hurled at the appreciative audiences, and burning denunciations of the liquor traffic stirred enthusiastic response. The same gratifying program was repeated at the Epworth League convention held a few days later at Detroit. With literal millions of Christian young people pledged to temperance work surely another generation will not pass away before the legalized curse shall have been swept from existence.

EXPERIENCE CORNER

DEAR COMRADES, ESPECIALLY DISCOURAGED ONES:—Two or three touching appeals have come to me lately. It's easy to talk over things we want different—with our mother. That is why, no doubt.

One is from a certain Far-West president, who wonders if anybody could teach Eastern workers the peculiar difficulties of her region; of a land where no unions can come in touch with each other, for the settlements are so far apart; where railway rates preclude visiting, even by state officers, with their chronically empty treasuries, and where a generally unsettled state of society prevails, because nobody is so very sure the family will stay more than a year.

Three propositions inside of one hard problem! But, far-away worker, you may take this comfort to your soul:

When a woman really does come into a sense of her duty in your part of this dear old green earth, she is pretty apt to get up and do something. Inertia doesn't inert "way out west," at least not permanently.

Let me whisper what somebody has lately told me. It's a National woman, one of our very own, whose business it is to introduce new ideas. And what do you think she says, you half-disheartened friend? That all thru the west our folks take hold of her notions better than anywhere else. Seem to have a perception that something ought to be done, and so something shall be done. It's real legitimate W. C. T. U. business, but there are sections where they think the questions would better be dreamed over a generation or two before anybody moves—much.

I am sure you have noticed, too, that the four states which lead in placing woman politically where she belongs lie toward sunset, beyond what used to be called the Great American Desert. Now hearten up, comrades, hearten up!

Coincidences are not all in novels. It is less than a month since a letter came to me in which an official we all know and honor, particularly the staid old conservative state where she resides. She is almost bewailing the dearth of helpers who are willing to take up a line of temperance activity heretofore neglected there. This Corner has a note of cheer for her. When once that department of work does enter into the inner consciousness of those people to the degree that it is adopted, every wind of heaven will strengthen it. It is not only there; it is there to stay.

The meadowlarks that sing to me from the orchard this morning sing the song their forefathers sang ages ago, and the song will lose nothing of its persistent sweetness in the ages to come. Wasn't it Browning who said the bird kept on going up and singing the tune over

"Lest he forget that first fine careless rapture."

That is what your generations of Eastern workers will do.

Another letter is personal, but, hiding beyond the incognito of the Corner, I must place it before THE UNION SIGNAL readers. The writer is brave. I know her. And few have been able to bury a sad past and take up a happy present as she does. But she is one of only a dozen white-ribboners in a city of twenty thousand living souls, and she gets lonesome. Born and reared there, she finds the forces that stand for individual and civic and national righteousness thru our magnificent society can be counted on the fingers of one hand. A bread-earner herself, in a community where women are more shielded than in many another city, this devout woman mourns that so few know the joy of "doing good according to a plan," and she pours out her anxious mind thus:

"Resident missionaries of our sweet faith are being sent beyond the seas to plant and nurse our principles until bearing time. Oh, will not somebody send some of these radiant beings, with a good living to keep them radiant, into such of our cities as seem to support every conceivable enterprise except this for the home? Why not? Our own folks are as well worth saving as the heathen beyond, are they not?

"In the little time I have, I have done my best. Our state officers are grand women. They have done their best, till I am afraid they will all be 'done out.' But no light breaks above our beautiful city where the omnipresent saloon, with its concomitants, goes on unchecked year after year. Will somebody sound the tocsin for us?"

I pass this on to our constituency. At least a hundred thousand Christian women may remember a number of cities on this continent where our badge is practically a stranger, and where a handful of characters who honor God and practice His laws thru both church and Union stand alone for the latter.

We all know this is one of the vexed questions for which our general officers of nation and states are trying to find an answer. Someone who holds a good deal of God's gold may furnish the means for a few special missionaries. Could even heaven hold a greater happiness than to put a living, moving, breathing entity into our friend's historic but needy city till scores of other responsive entities tingle with a desire to minister to others?

But "even God cannot use a discouraged soul."

The Vine and the Branches.

By Rev. Emily C. Woodruff, National Evangelist.

READ John xv, 1-8, keeping in mind the words, "My Father is glorified that ye bear much fruit," "Without me ye can do nothing," "Abide in me."

I was leaving a home where I had been making a pastoral call when a very large grape vine attracted my attention. I began to ask questions about it. The owner of the vine took me to it and said, "See what a vine it is! See how deeply it is rooted, and what branches it can support. But I cut back every year to avoid too much unproductive growth, for I want to keep the fruitful branches well nourished from the vine. What I want is fruit, and fruit of the best quality. I wish you might see," he concluded, "what I gather from this vine, in the autumn."

That great and fruitful vine gave me food for thought. Yes, it was rooted deeply in good soil. So is Jesus, our Vine, rooted deeply in the character of God. It looked dead, for leaves and fruit do not grow upon the vine, but upon the branches; yet the vine has power to impart to the branches that vital life which enables them to grow and bear fruit. Jesus, our Vine, seems dead to the world and far away, the crucified, historic Christ only; but to the believing branch He is the risen, ever-present Christ whose grace alone enables us to grow, and grow Godward and Godlike.

The leaves upon the branches, and especially the fruit, are evidence of the life and power of the vine. The Christian's good life and power to be useful is evidence to the world that Christ lives and can give the power of his grace to save and to perfect.

There is no fruit upon a branch which is not in vital union with the vine. So Jesus said, "Abide in me and I in you," "Apart from me ye can do nothing."

The farmer cultivates his vine for grapes; the divine husbandman puts his vineyard under cultivation for fruit. "My Father is the husbandman;" "My Father is glorified that ye bear much fruit." The farmer says of the cultivation of his vine, "I cut it back; I trim and prune." Jesus says of the divine husbandman: "He purgeth it," or, "He cleanseth it" for more fruit and of the best quality.

Do the disciplinary things of life disappoint us and seem too hard? "He cleanseth it" for fruit. "He scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

He is seeeking fruit of the Spirit of the branches tempered like Christ, that in the midst of life as it is, as it must be, to us in our surroundings and duties, our relationships and circumstances he may find growing, under the power and pressure of the "purging" or "cleansing" "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."

He would see us "add to our faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, love."

But he said, "Apart from me ye can do nothing;" "Abide in me and I in you."

How beautiful a parable for Jesus to teach us as he was about to come into the world again in his resurrection, to abide with us always in the Spirit!

And then the prayer that followed, asking in high priestly spirit and office, "That they all may be one," branches and true vine and husbandman, one in vital life and spirit; branches one with Christ and with each other, as the Trinity is one. Such a oneness brings fruit, and fruit is the best object lesson to the world that Jesus lives to save. "All one," "that the world might believe," "that the world might know" Jesus as a Savior.

Red Letter Day.

August 3, Fresh Air Mission Day.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR SISTERS: It is a little early to say anything about the program for our National Convention at Cincinnati, but it occurs to me it might be refreshing these hot days to know something of what is in store for those who attend the next National gathering. We are planning to make our program handsomer in appearance than ever before and better, if possible, in its real merit. Everything is not decided as yet, but I can share with you some particulars.

You will be interested to know that one evening is to be filled by a diamond medal contest under the supervision of Mrs. Carman, National superintendent. There will probably be nine contestants, and great preparations are being made for this, not only that the recitations may be of a high grade, but the music appropriate and representative of the young people.

The annual sermon will be Sunday afternoon, and Mrs. Rounds, formerly president of Illinois, has been invited to deliver it.

One-half day will be given to an excursion to Hillsboro, Ohio, where services will be held in the Memorial Crusade Church where one room is set aside for souvenirs from the Crusade and various objects commemorative of that event. A call will be made upon Mother Thompson, and the procession will follow the line of march as nearly as possible of the Crusaders of 1873. Many intensely interesting features will be introduced into this half day, which cannot be entered into now. We are sure all of the delegates and visitors will want to go on that excursion. Cincinnati is so near Hillsboro that we hope to have Mother Thompson at the opening session, Friday. The excursion will probably be Monday forenoon.

Jubilee Night will not be omitted, on which occasion the presidents of the states having made a net gain of 500 members will be in charge of the program, and you may be sure they will not emphasize the trials of the year, but its encouragements and achievements. It is hoped they may also tell the Convention "how they did it," so others may go and do likewise.

On Platform Night our principles and purposes will be set forth by eloquent and forcible speakers.

The state presidents are to have an evening wherein each of them will be expected to tell many things concerning the work in her own particular state in one minute of time! If this "exercise" proves as entertaining and instructive as it did the last time minute speeches were tried, it will be not only one of the talking, but one of the taking, features of the program. The Cincinnati women are already at work and we may expect the old Crusade State "to do itself proud" on our thirtieth anniversary.

Suffer this one reminder as a closing remark. Much of the enthusiasm of the Convention, much of its glory, will depend upon the showing made by the organization. We are already beginning to inquire what our net gain will be, how it will compare with other years, how many states will take part Jubilee Night; and well do we know that the answers to these questions will be traced back to the action of individual unions and individual members. Dear sisters, are you alive? are you sufficiently alive to have already paid your dues? If not haste, haste, there is still a refuge for delinquents.

Yours in white-ribbon bonds,
SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Superintendents.

DEAR SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS: September 20 will be our next Temperance Sunday. The Quarterly Temperance Lesson is found in 1 Peter 4:1-77. Title, "Abstinence from Evil." Golden Text, "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess."—Eph. 5:18 Temperance Topics, "The Evil of Intemperance," "The Christian Duty of Total Abstinence.

The quarterly supplies are now ready, and we urge our workers to order early. Help the Sunday-school teachers and adult students by a generous use of the Quarterly Leaflets. The Quarterly Responsive Reading is used much in class work as well as in the opening exercises of the Sunday-school. The blackboard exercise is unusually attractive and will add much to the program of the Sunday-school hour. The great demand for the new Illustrated Bible Temperance Text-cards proves that they are a very acceptable help to our temperance work in the primary, junior, and intermediate grades. The department will issue a series of the cards. The second of the series is ready for next Temperance Sunday. They appear in assorted colors and are attractive as well as helpful, and pupils will readily memorize the temperance texts given.

Sunday-school workers are constantly improving in their methods of work. There is now a growing interest in class organization as a means of holding and increasing the membership and creating a class spirit which is productive of good results. We wish to take advantage of this, another opportunity of stimulating the temperance and purity work in the Sunday-schools, and therefore we bring to our workers new suggestions which we trust will be put into practice in many schools.

We recommend that "Frances Willard Circles" be formed in the primary and junior departments. A circle can be formed in each class or one circle in each department. Leaders of each circle will be chosen from among the children, but the teacher or the superintendent will have a general oversight. The following pledge will be signed by all who become members of the "Frances Willard Circle:"

"I promise, by the help of God, that I will not do, say, or listen to anything that I cannot tell my mother."

The purpose of the circle, as suggested by the pledge, is to promote purity of thought, word, and deed, and mutual confidence between mother and child as a safeguard against sin. We have chosen the name "Frances Willard Circle" because we would have every child learn to know and emulate the pure and beautiful life of our sainted leader.

We also recommend that boys' and young men's classes of the intermediate and senior departments be organized into companies known as 'The Knights of the New Chivalry." The following beautiful pledge, which forms the basis of membership in this class organization, was penned by Miss Willard and intended by her to promote purity, temperance and high ideals of life among the boys and young men:

"I pledge my brain God's thought to think,
My lips no fire or foam to drink
From alcoholic cup,
Nor link with my pure breath tobacco's taint,
For have not I a right to be
As wholesome, pure and free as she
Who through the years so glad and free
Moves gently onward to meet me?
A Knight of the New Chivalry
For Christ and Temperance, I will be."

Details of these two plans for class organization are given in circulars issued by the department. These should be circulated freely among teachers; and local superintendents will find it possible to assist much in the new plans suggested. The revised manual of the department, "Hints and Helps for Sunday-school Workers," contains complete instructions for the above class work, and also many other new and valuable suggestions for Sunday-school temperance work.

The harvest time of the year is at hand. We urge all local, county, district and state superintendents to begin at once to gather in the items for reports and be sure that the state superintendent receives the same in season for her to make her annual report to the National superintendent. All state reports should reach the National superintendent by Oct. 1. Report blanks have been sent to state superintendents in sufficient number to supply all local workers. If you do not receive a copy soon write to your state superintendent and enclose stamp, and you will doubtless receive a blank by return mail.

State superintendents will please remember that our large department banner is awarded for the largest per cent of gain in local superintendents. Our bannerets are awarded for the second highest honors, the model report and the best organized department.

All pledges which are to become a part of our great National Sunday School Pledge Chain should be sent prepaid to my associate, Mrs. Dora B. Butts, 595 Central Ave., Albany, N. Y.

The Infant

takes first to human milk; that failing, the mother turns at once to cow's milk as the best substitute. Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is a cow's milk scientifically adapted to the human infant. Stood first for forty-five years.

"SUMMER FOOD"

Has Other Advantages.

Many people have tried the food Grape-Nuts simply with the idea of avoiding the trouble of cooking food in the hot months.

All of these have found something besides the ready cooked food idea, for Grape-Nuts is a scientific food that tones up and restores a sick stomach as well as repairs the waste tissue in brain and nerve centers.

"For two years I had been a sufferer from catarrh of the stomach due to improper food, and to relieve this condition I had tried nearly every prepared food on the market without any success until six months ago my wife purchased a box of Grape-Nuts, thinking it would be a desirable cereal for the summer months.

"We soon made a discovery; we were enchanted with the delightful flavor of the food and to my surprise I began to get well. My breakfast now consists of a little fruit; 4 teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts; a cup of Postum, which I prefer to coffee; graham bread or toast and two boiled eggs. I never suffer the least distress after eating this and my stomach is perfect and general health fine. Grape-Nuts is a wonderful preparation. It was only a little time after starting on it that wife and I both felt younger, more vigorous, and in all ways stronger. This has been our experience.

"P. S. The addition of a little salt in place of sugar seems to me to improve the food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Resolved, That we re-affirm our adherence to the principle of total abstinence as the corner-stone of our organization, and we are greatly encouraged by the increasing volume of scientific and physiological evidence in support of this position, which is also in harmony with the spirit of Christ's teaching.

Department Resolutions.

Miss Lilian Wood, National organizer, is at present in California. Her address is 1130 Santee street, Los Angeles.

The Casper, Wyoming, union has for years successfully carried on a reading room. This is one of the best unions in Wyoming.

Mrs. A. P. McDonald, of Kansas City, will have charge of the W. C. T. U. School of Methods at Sulphur, Indian Territory.

Snohomish and Island counties, West Washington, held a convention at Everett. Delegates from all the unions in both counties were present.

The union at Arisne. Iowa, has held ten well-attended and successful medal contests. Work in the Franchise department is now receiving attention.

Miss Annie Robbins, National organizer, was the guest of honor at a dinner given by Mrs. E. W. Soule, of St. Paul, Minn., to the officers of the state W. C. T. U.

Miss George, of Victoria, has been appointed organizer in Australia. She was one of the first women appointed in South Australia as a local preacher of the Methodist church.

Miss Belle Kearney has recently presented the Mississippi W. C. T. U. with a gavel made from a bit of a tree from the battleground of Gettysburg. A minie bullet is yet imbedded in the wood.

On account of the difficulty of securing funds for its maintenance the W. C. T. U. of Hastings, Neb., is compelled to give up the Bethany home for orphans which has been conducted for years.

The W. C. T. U. is well represented at the Devil's Lake, N. D., Chautauqua. Mrs. E. Preston Anderson, state president, is in charge. Mrs. Callie Howe, National organizer, was the speaker on W. C. T. U. day.

Mrs. Hannah T. Guild, National superintendent of Fairs and Open Air Meetings, spoke July 4 at a picnic in Benton county, Mo., in which seven churches united. Several members joined the W. C. T. U.

Inspired by reading in THE UNION SIGNAL of the rest room at Chadron, Neb., the union at Ashland, in the same state, is working out a like blessing for its own town. It will also care for the babies while the mothers go shopping.

The Central and South unions of Grand Rapids, Mich., united in an interesting meeting. The work of Madame Boise, a pioneer temperance worker in the city, was recalled and a poem written in her memory by Mary T. Lathrop was read by Mrs. Fox.

The newly organized union at Middleville, N. Y., has already planned for a public meeting and a medal contest. Much enthusiasm is manifested and aggressive work is promised. Mrs. G. H. Nellis, who was instrumental in the organization of the union, is the president.

One feature of the July 4 celebration at Hastings, Minn., was an industrial parade. The W. C. T. U. was represented by a temperance life-boat in white and gold, trimmed in pond lilies. The float of the L. T. L. contained thirty children. The W. C. T. U. float was awarded first prize.

Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, National superintendent of Parliamentary Usage, conducted a class in parliamentary practice for five days under the auspices of the Secretaries' Institute of the Y. W. C. A. at Detroit, Mich. The class was large and very interesting. It contained girls from nearly every state and representatives of many colleges and universities.

Miss May Russell, Mississippi's uniformly successful state organizer, has just formed a fine union at Wesson of twenty-three regular and twenty honorary members, to which numbers more were added at their first meeting. This is the thirteenth new union organized by Miss Russell since the middle of last October, and Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman has added three others.

The Fourth district (Louisiana) annual convention met at Shreveport and was cordially welcomed by the press, the ministers, and the people of the city. The Shreveport union numbers fifty members and had made excellent arrangements for the convention. Evening meetings were largely attended and great interest awakened. Subscriptions were taken to THE UNION SIGNAL and "Crusader Monthly."

Mrs. Platt and Mrs. Munns, president and corresponding secretary of West Washington, have completed a successful tour of Whatcom county. Two W's and a Y were organized and the Whatcom union divided. Eighty-nine members and seventy-nine honoraries were secured. The work closed with a successful county convention at Sumas. The state convention meets in Whatcom in September.

Before returning to their home states, Mrs. Nichols, Mrs. Harris, and several other workers are holding meetings in and around Melbourne, Australia. Several splendid articles on the drink question have recently appeared in the "Melbourne Age." Attention has thus been called to the iniquity of employing women in bars, as well as the open contempt of the law displayed by clubs which supply members with drink at all hours and without restriction.

The Chelsea union has just entertained the first district convention ever held in the Indian Territory. This union, which was organized less than a year ago with three members, now numbers fifty, has a nicely furnished reading room, and has created much public sentiment in the community. Mrs. Lila Carlin Moore, National organizer, was the speaker at the convention. Mrs. Harsha, territorial president, was in attendance and the recipient of a shower of flowers from the L. T. L. children.

The eighty-third birthday of the oldest member, Mrs. Selestman, was celebrated by the McDonald union of Kansas City, Mo., not long ago. The union united with churches, schools and citizens in an endeavor to prevent the location of a beer garden in their part of the city. Consideration of the application was put off week after week, but the temperance forces could not be worn out. Then the council held a special meeting and the license was granted before its opponents knew of its consideration. Jennie Smith, National evangelist, was a very welcome altho unexpected visitor at a recent meeting.

A district union of four counties (seven unions) was recently reorganized at Towner, ... Dak., after being in a state of innocuous desuetude for seven years. A district convention was held in May and the following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Johnston, Velva; vice-presidents, each local president ex-officio; vice-president at large, Mrs. Brand Branton, Towner; recording secretary, Mrs. ———, Grass Lake; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Goozer, Granville; treasurer, Mrs. Turner, Bottineau. Mrs. Jean McNaughton Stevens was appointed press correspondent. The Towner Mary Young union holds a meeting in the church parlor every Thursday evening, and a monthly social. It has had one matron's contest, one gold medal contest, and will hold another oratorical contest in September. Altogether the district seems to have wakened up full of vitality after its long nap.

The "W. C. T. U. Evening" at the summer normal school in Monroe, Louisiana, was very successful. Mrs. A. L. Wilson, president of the Fifth district, presented the W. C. T. U. greetings and spoke of our work. Excellent music was a feature of the meeting.

The Thousand Islands.

There may be somewhere on the earth a more delightful region than that of the Thousand Islands, but if there is, it has not been discovered. It is the Venice of America, but also has good hotels that can be kept warm if there shall happen to be a cold rainy evening. It is as fine as the Bay of Naples, with 2,000 picturesque Islands scattered along the twenty-five miles of one of the most beautiful rivers in the world. You can find out a great deal regarding it in No. 10 of the "Four-Track Series," "The Thousand Islands." Copy will be mailed free on receipt of a 2-cent stamp by George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

COFFEE SENT HER

Back to the Country.

A young woman of Bradford, Vt., made her way to a good position in a big Boston store and gave it up because of sickness at home, but it all came out right at last and she tells the story this way: "Two years ago I had to leave a position as bookkeeper in a Boston department store to go back home to take charge of the old place, as mother's health seemed shattered and what do you suppose proved to be the cause that forced me to return?

"I found her very weak, unable to sit up all day and with a dizzy feeling if she tried to move about. She had been advised to stop coffee drinking, but as she had used it from childhood it seemed as though nothing could take its place. I had settled down to stay at the farm when one day I got to thinking over the situation and concluded to try an experiment. I got a package of Postum Coffee. It was not cooked right the next morning and we were all disappointed. That was because we had tried to make it like coffee. Next morning I had Postum made according to directions and we were all delighted. In a few days you should have seen the change in mother. Since that time we have never drank coffee and now we all drink Postum twice a day and sometimes three times and think it superior to coffee.

"The change in mother's health since she quit coffee and took up Postum has been wonderful. She is once more able to take the work again, quite well in fact, with no more weakness and nervousness, no more sour stomach, no more trouble of any kind. To cut a long story short, she is now entirely well and I am going back to Boston in a few weeks, thanks to Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Among the New Books.

In his Story of the Conquest Flag, Rev. S. M. Johnson tells how our national flag in the during the unfurling of early part of the Cuban war, the thought came to him that there should be a flag for the church universal, that Christians of every name should rally about it and show to the world their loyalty to it, the Biblical, "Thou hast given a banner to them that fear Thee, that it may be displayed because of the trust." Out of this grew the thought of combining this flag of God with each national flag of the world, the united flags to stand for Christian citizenship. The design of the flag came as an inspiration to the author during the solemn hour of President McKinley's funeral. The colors chosen for the flag were red, white, and blue. The blood-red cross on the white union stands for Christ; the words, "By this Sign Conquer," were placed in white on the field of blue as a message direct from the living God to living men.

This Christian Conquest Flag and emblem are being rapidly and enthusiastically adopted by Christian societies and organizations of all names. They have been officially adopted by the state Sunday-school associations of Missouri, Maryland, Ohio, Georgia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Oregon, Illinois and Indiana, and by the Deep Sea Mission of Gloucester, Mass.

At least twelve other organizations are using the color print of crossed flags on stationery or in other ways cooperating in the Christian Conquest Crusade, and the movement has spread to several foreign lands. The subject of Christian citizenship is to receive special attention each year on Temperance Sunday, the fourth Sunday in November, and mighty will be the influence of such teaching on the 25,000,000 youths of North America.

There are addresses by Orrin N. Carter, judge of Cook county, Ill., and Alderman Charles Alling, the latter presenting a municipal patriotism. The last chapter of the book is devoted to a history of the stars and stripes. The book is a strong plea for the Christian Conquest movement, and this plea should be heeded by all Christian men and women. The volume is attractively bound in white cardboard showing the color prints of the Conquest Flag of fourteen nations. (Chicago: Conquest Supply Co. 50c.)

In The Woman Who Toils, Mrs. John Von Vorst and Miss Marie Von Vorst have jointly produced a book of timeliness, pathos, and power. It is timely because it is high time such facts, such industrial and social conditions as are here so vividly sketched, were better known. The pathos is only too pervading, altho there are frequent gleams of pleasanter things. The whole book is a truthful contemporary human document, a document coming straight from the heart of the women and children who toil and are burdened. It is especially a picture of factory life, in both the North and the South.

The book is a study of labor and of social conditions, but it is not at all a mere academic study; it is a study of facts at first hand, done for a purpose. Two women of culture and social standing were moved to go forth and see for themselves. It was a journey into the world, from the realm of the rich and favored into the realm of those who have to toil under conditions that are more or less inhuman. Those two brave women, touched with pity and moved to see what help it might be possible to render, were convinced that one of the first things needed was for some one to act as a mouthpiece for these women laborers, and so put into words their cry for help. In order to do this, they first of all set out to put themselves actually in their place, ... among them, in one factory after another, working and living side by side with the rest of them in factory and mill towns in New England and New York, in Chicago and Pittsburg, and in the South. It was a brave thing to do this, but it required a great deal more than mere bravery to do it as these two humanely heroic women did it. They found no little use for a fine sort of dramatic tact. And in the record of it all, as given in this book, there is evidence of admirable judgment and good taste as well as of marked literary skill. It is a book that will be widely read, as it ought to be. The spirit and motive of it cannot be too warmly commended. The story is instructive, startling, impressive. It is again the "voice of one crying in the wilderness." It will at any rate do something toward that growing sun of Christian righteousness that is surely preparing the way for better things. (New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.50.)

Studies in the Thought World, by Henry Wood, explores the realm of thought in search of definite proof of the supremacy of the mind over matter. The book deals essentially with what is called the "new thought," and that it has reached its seventh edition speaks of its interest in this line of investigation. "Man is mind" is the emphatic theme of the disquisition. The study of the evolutionary climb of man asserts that "man slumbers in the pebble, dreams in the plant, gathers energy in the animal, and awakens to self-conscious discovery in the soul of man." In attempting to interpret "what is known as to the fall of man," in the light of "metaphysical evolution" the author makes the statement that the fall, "tho from perfect material satisfaction to a constant divine restlessness, is upward—the 'Fall of Man' was a leap upward and onward." ?

Among other subjects discussed are "What is Man?" "Our Relations to Environment" and "Has Mental Healing a Valid Basis?" Under the latter head the author follows the thought of the Christian Scientist, but goes beyond the confines of the belief of the followers of Mrs. Eddy. Practical rules are given for concentrating and controlling thought energy. A devout spirit breathes thruout the book and leads to higher thinking along all lines. (Boston: Lee & Shepherd, $1.25.)

In Cliveden, Kenyon West has produced such a book as the tired mind enjoys, altho the recreation offered is far from lassitude. In fact, keeping pace with the entirely fascinating and adventurous heroine is no small feat in mental gymnastics. However, excepting an occasional incredulous breath or two, one finds himself pleasantly in harmony with the strenuous atmosphere, confident that things will somehow right themselves—else why the story? The plot centers round Cliveden, the historic summer home of Benjamin Crew, situated on the famous "Germantown road." The battle of Brandywine has been fought and the British, under Cornwallis, are in Philadelphia. The army of Sir William Howe holds Germantown, and General Washington is not many miles away waiting to fall upon Howe. Cliveden, occupied by Charles Murray and his daughter Margaret, loyal sympathizers with General Washington, by some irony of fate proves an impregnable fortress for the British, thus contributing toward the American general's loss of Germantown.

Margaret Murray's part in the tragic drama and her untimely love for the young British captain, Arthur Peyton, furnish the threads of romance that bind together this vividly portrayed episode of Revolutionary times. (Boston: Lothrop Publishing Company. $1.50.)

In Dr. Edward Everett Hale's book, How to Live, the author of that rare classic, "The Man Without a Country," answers in his own masterful way the questions that are uppermost in the heart of every thinking being, "How does man know what is right or wrong," and "Why does he think one thing right and another wrong?" The work consists of fifteen essays regarding choosing one's calling, how to sleep, to exercise, to think, to study, to dress, to remain young, to regulate expense, to deal with one's children; on appetite and of one's duty to the church, and to the state. These fascinating essays are alive with practical, homely suggestions and are pervaded throughout with that spirit of patriotism which regards the weal of one's brother as the common weal and the universal good. Every life must be richer and nobler that draws from this inspiring fountain of thought, addressed to humanity in general, but of especial value to every true, ambitious, American. Hugh Brotherton, Curate.

ashamed of having administered a kick to a man who was down.

"Well, it's a bad job; and the question now is, how are we to grapple with it? You said just now that the craving for alcohol was in your blood. What d'ye mean by that rot?"

"My grandparents on the father's side both drank."

"Father, too?"

"Oh, no! Strictly abstemious."

"Grandparents drinking still?"

"Oh, no; that was years ago—before my time."

"How came you to know anything about it?"

"My grandfather is living still—with us."

"Fairly good health?"

"A complete wreck."

"Know much of his history?"

"Nothing whatever until lately, when he took it into his head that he recognized his counterpart in me. It was then that I learned for the first time that, for the greater part of his life he had been given over absolutely to drink."

"Was that any reason why you must needs go and follow his example?" asked the doctor sharply, "Was your profession no safeguard?"

Hugh shook his head.

"No more safeguard in my case than in his; but for that we have only ourselves to blame."

"Do you mean to say that he, too, was a clergyman?"

"Yes."

Dr. Mann's interest deepened visibly

"Since when have you known all this?" he asked suddenly.

"Since the day of my ordination."

"And that was?"

"The day preceding my arrival here."

"H'm! I wonder whether I begin to understand," thought the doctor.

"That was pretty rough on you. Preyed upon your mind a bit, didn't it?" he asked aloud.

"Well, it wasn't exactly encouraging," said Hugh, gruffly, lest his voice should break.

The doctor spoke more kindly.

"Well, mark this, Brotherton. If your history had been known to me before, like the ass I was, I brayed aloud in praise of alcohol, I should have had a different song to sing. You've been a silly fool, and something worse than that; but after all, a man doesn't make a hopeless drunkard of himself in the course of a few months, you know."

"That is precisely the conclusion at which I have arrived," said Hugh, quietly. "I have neither tasted alcohol, nor wanted to taste it, since the affair in the mine, and I was beginning to hope that I had left my past behind me in the pit."

"Well, it's a bad business; and the question is, how are we to deal with it," said the doctor, for the second time.

"Boyd, of course, must know everything, and after that the matter rests with him. If he demands my resignation, I must go. If things hadn't gone quite so far I wouldn't have waited to be asked; but, black as the whole business is, I know that I am not such an out-and-out blackguard as I have given you all good reason to suppose; and I shall stand out, for all I am worth, for another chance."

That was far from being the spirit in which he had entered the room, but the doctor's sarcasms had gone home with bracing effect.

Dr. Mann carefully examined his finger nails.

"I'm rather afraid that Boyd may take a serious view of the facts as they stand," he remarked suggestively.

"Without a doubt he will; but you will bear out my contention that you prevented my making a full confession a month ago."

"That is true; for the sake of the woman who has planned your ruin, I urged that you had no right to speak. There I did you a wrong; but, my honor, Brotherton, I never dreamed that things had gone so far. I fancied that you had sometimes indulged a little on the sly, but with the exception of the one occasion we have mentioned, I never suspected anything worse. That was bad enough. I'm sorry, but there is no use in mincing matters. As the thing stands, I'm afraid—I'm very much afraid—that Boyd will think seriously of it."

"Of course he will," said Hugh again. "Still, unless he insists upon it, I don't budge. I've been the silly fool you called me just now, and the other things you did but hint at; but this last month has made a difference. Besides, I know very well that I can do much better than I have done yet, and I mean to stand out for a chance."

The doctor rose suddenly from his chair.

"And, by Jove, Brotherton, I'm more than half inclined to help you. Anyway, we had better see Boyd before anyone else gets at him."

He rang for Mrs. Langley's maid, and after a few words with her on the door-mat, changed his coat, and set out for the Vicarage with Hugh. At a short distance from the house they met Mr. Boyd.

"Here you are at last! I was getting into no end of a state. Come along, both of you. The wife and Rose have gone upstairs; but there are coffee and sandwiches to be had."

As he spoke, he slipped his arm thru Hugh's and something in his manner of doing it told the young man that the worst was known.

"Have you seen Mrs. Langley?" he asked, suddenly.

"No; but she has sent me a long letter. I still have to hear your version of the incidents she mentions."

"I have no doubt her version is substantially correct."

"It was a great shock to me, but after thinking it out, I—I feared so. Let's go home and have a talk about it."

Yet manifestly he still hoped that Hugh would be able to refute some of the more shameful details of Mrs. Langley's story, for when the written statement of her suspicions and discoveries was handed back with a simple, "It is all true," his face fell noticeably.

Dr. Mann hastened to put in a few words of explanation and theory.

"Yes, yes; I see the force of all you say, but when the mischief first began, if you had but felt that you could have made a confidant of one or the other of us," said Mr. Boyd nervously to Hugh.

"He was hardly likely to make a confidant of me," put in Dr. Mann.

"And I was always so sure that it would not happen again," groaned Hugh.

"Ah! and in that respect the situation is practically unchanged."

Hugh saw his blunder and hastened to retrieve it.

"I don't think so," he said eagerly; "then you were in ignorance of the facts; now I shall know you to be continually on the watch. You can impose upon me any restrictions you please, and I shall have no right to complain."

"Brotherton, you will, I know, believe me when I say that, for your sake as well as for our own, I am anxious to see this thing as you and Mann see it. But, in the first place, would it be fair to the parish?"

Hugh lifted a haggard but obstinate face.

"Why need the parish know anything about it?" He turned abruptly to the doctor. "Not so long ago you told me there was a time when a man had no longer any right to proclaim his sin. If that has ever been true, it is as true as ever to-day. For the sake of one, you made me refrain from speaking. For the sake of many why should I not refrain from speaking now?"

The doctor and the vicar exchanged glances of perplexity.

"But even if we could consent to keep your secret, there is still Mrs. Langley," said the vicar quietly.

"Mrs. Langley need not be taken into consideration," interposed Dr. Mann. "It will be impossible for us to remain here. When once she breaks out to this extent, she never stops until she has made herself and me notorious. By the way, I don't blame Brotherton for this outbreak. For years hers has been a practically hopeless case. It is only lately that I have been fool enough to cherish any ideas to the contrary. We habitually fix our residence in out-of-the-way places, and live in as much retirement as possible until each place in turn becomes too hot to hold us. Then we move on. We shall move on from Pitsmoor without loss of time. Meantime, I don't think that Brotherton has anything further to fear from her. It was thru my fault that she was left to find him out, and I shall make it my business to see that she does him no further harm."

Mr. Boyd looked harassed and distressed.

"But consider the risk. Even for Brotherton's own sake."

"I have kept from it for a month, with no one to watch me," interrupted Hugh.

"That may be so, but—"

"It is so," said Dr. Mann. "I have kept my eye upon him."

"Oh! I didn't for a moment mean to imply a doubt," and Mr. Boyd colored distressfully. "But what I do feel is that, on reflection, you will both acknowledge that, under all the circumstances, the risk both to the parish and to himself is very great. Brotherton," and his voice shook, "my own personal feeling is entirely with you, but I can't help seeing it."

"If you insist upon my going I must go," said Hugh desperately, "but if, in your opinion, Pitsmoor owes me any consideration in return for Billy Seller's life, I ask for one more chance."

His two hearers stared at each other. Not until that moment had either of them realized the impossibility of dismissing the idol of the parish from his post in the zenith of his fame. Without explanation, his dismissal was a manifest impossibility. Explanation seemed to be more impossible still.

Mr. Boyd's distracted eyes were arrested by the hands of the clock.

"Half-past two, and we breakfast at eight. Mann, you can stay all night if you like, but I'm going to bed."

The other two rose at once.

"If there were any good at all in saying that I was sorry," began Hugh, hoarsely.

The affectionate pat of Mr. Boyd's hand upon his shoulder threatened altogether to break him down.

"I've seen for some time that you were sorry; I feel now that I ought to have divined long ago what it was that you were sorry for. By the way," added the vicar, recollecting something "what advice did you give the other day to young Sam? Didn't I understand him to say that you told him not to lose heart, but to have another try? After all, why should we refuse the same chance to you?"

"It's different," said Hugh.

"Yes, it's different. I—I'm glad that you see that, Brotherton. Still I hope very much that we may be able to see our way to giving the chance you ask for, all the same."

—An exchange lays an unerring finger upon a trait of human nature witnessed in every newspaper office in the land when it says: "If this paper was printed on gold with ink of silver and the subscription price 50 cents per year, some poor deluded specimen of humanity would kick because there was not a diamond set in each corner of the page and want the subscription reduced to only a quarater."

"I have been greatly pleased with the high grade of excellence which THE UNION SIGNAL has maintained the past few months. The new plan of reporting the temperance news and department work; the use of the pictures of the workers and the general arrangement are in line with first class, modern journalism. THE UNION SIGNAL should be in the home of every white ribboner. That goes without saying. It should also go to every preacher, editor and teacher in the United States. Every union should make it a department of work to supply THE UNION SIGNAL to these classes of public educators until they are willling to assume the obligation themselves. All should unite to make our national organ a worthy representative of our work to the world and a constant incentive to greater achievements by the white ribbon army. THE UNION SIGNAL should be the banner of our organization."

Enjoins Local Option.

WACO, TEX.—Judge Marshall Surratt has granted the publication of the local option election result in Robertson county, which was recently held. The writ was granted on the allegation that voters against local option were intimidated and were forcibly restrained from expressing their choice. It was stated in the petition that more than 150 persons were kept away from the polls and this number would have changed the result. The names of 150 people who alleged that they could not vote were given in the petition.

In granting the injunction, Judge Surratt said that he did so from the appearance and allegations that the law had been flagrantly violated and that these allegations should be investigated.

Columbus Citizens Unite in a Temperance War.

COLUMBUS, Ind., July 15.—The latest step in the temperance war here was the organization tonight of the Civic League of Columbus, the specified object of which is to compel the absolute enforcement of all city and state laws, with special attention at present to saloons and houses of ill-fame.

The organization starts with fifty representative voters from all walks of life, with a number of leading manufacturers at the head. A strong defense fund was subscribed and active work will begin at once.

Prohibitionists Point to Law.

BAKERSFIELD, July 11.—Notices are being posted around the city by the temperance workers calling public attention to the law prohibiting the sale of liquor or tobacco to minors. This provides a fine not exceeding $100 for supplying tobacco to any person under 16 years of age and a fine of $300 or imprisonment for more than 150 days in the county jail, or both, for selling or supplying liquor to any person under 18 years of age.

Momorial on Saloons.

Authorities Asked to Prohibit Liquor at Union Station.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 18.—A committee representing the Anti-Saloon League and other societies called upon the commissioners in board session yesterday morning to present a memorial to the effect that the vicinity of the new union station should be free from saloons and places where liquor might be sold.

Those present were James L. Ewin, president of the District Anti-Saloon League; Mrs. Clinton Smith, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union; F. M. Bradley, representing the Sons of Temperance; H. C. Metcalf, secretary of the District Christian Endeavor Union; F. K. Israel, president of the Washington District Epworth League; A. N. Canfield, secretary of the Anti-Saloon League; Rev. C. H. Butler, president of the Lutheran Young People's Union, and S. W. Russell, representing the District Good Templars. Mr. Ewin presented the memorial. Rev. Butler made a few remarks, stating that the churches were interested in this movement. Mr. Israel pointed out that if the consummation desired should ensue, visitors to the city would have the impression that the District was a temperance city in some parts at least.

The commissioners promised their visitors to consider the matter. Later in the board session the commissioners decided that the matter would come under the authority of the excise board, and the memorial will accordingly be forwarded to that body with a request by the commissioners for their careful consideration.

Women to Take a Hand.

Wilkinsburg W. C. T. U. Joins in Crusade Against the Druggists for Sunday Selling.

Women are to join in the fight against the druggists of Wilkinsburg who persist in dispensing soda water and tobacco on Sunday. The members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, who have heretofore been inactive in the crusade, have called a meeting to be held in the First Presbyterian Church of Wilkinsburg to-morrow evening for the purpose of taking an active interest in the closing movement.

The druggists who were sued for selling luxuries on last Sunday will be given a hearing before Burgess John A. Keys to-night. A bitter fight is expected.

Giving an account of some of his interviewing experiences in the one thousandth number of Great Thoughts, Mr. Raymond Blathwayt says: "I was always fond of Miss Willard, a delicate dainty little woman, reminding one of a piece of Sevres china. A woman from the Far West and with all the enthusiasm of the West about her. Full, too, of humor, and a fanatical teetotaler. I sat down to luncheon with her once: "What will you take to drink?" said she. "Well, a glass of whisky-and-water or a glass of beer," I innocently and airily replied. "Ginger beer or tea," said she; "you will get nothing else at this table, I can tell you." I grinned feebly, and chose tea as the lesser of two great evils."—Temperance Record.

A Sunday school teacher recently told her class about the cruelty involved in docking horses. "Can any little girl tell me," she said, "of an appropriate verse of Scripture, referring to such treatment?" There was a pause, and then a small girl arose and said solemnly, "What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

For the first time in ninety-one years Pike county, Indiana, is without a saloon. The last wholesale liquor house has agreed to go out of business if the eleven indictments against it are nolled.

A new $100,000 hotel with 240 rooms especially for the moral, religious traveling public is one of the latest projects in Indianapolis. It will be without bar or billiard room and card playing will not be allowed.

Sixteen of the prominent clubs in Chicago were notified of the necessity of taking out a bar-room license for the sale of liquor. They were also reminded that the midnight closing ordinance must be obeyed.

The city council of Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, has violated a state statute by granting a license for a saloon to be located within 200 feet of the high school. The school board will carry the matter to the courts.

The county commissioners have refused to grant any saloon licenses in Roxboro, N. C. The action was somewhat unexpected, but was sure to follow the vigorous work being done by the churches and citizens.

Many members of the American colony of Chihuahua, Mexico, have signed a protest to John Hay, secretary of state, against the retention of W. W. Mills as United States consul. Mr. Mills is said to be unfit for the position.

The hottest fight against saloons since the Crusade is now being waged in Wabash county, Indiana. In the township where the fight centers there are 1,200 voters and already 657 of them have protested against saloon licenses. It is thought 1,000 names will be signed to the protest.

The Security Trust and Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia is offering a special form of policy to those who are physically sound and who abstain from alcoholic beverages. The mortality experience of the temperate is to be kept separate from the company's general experience, and full credit given the non-users of alcohol.

Chandler, of Chicago, his $60,000 estate is to be held in trust by his widow and at her death one-fifth will be given to each of the following societies: Western Society for the Suppression of Vice, Chicago Relief and Aid Society, Chicago Home for Incurables, Chicago Home for the Friendless and Chicago Old People's Home.

This so incensed the law-abiding people that a committee of fifty waited upon Mr. Morse and invited him to remain and speak again, promising there should be no further insulting treatment.

Publisher's Notes.

Nineteen Beautiful Years.

This sweet story of the life of Miss Willard's sister Mary loses none of its original interest with the passing years. The new edition, just issued, is one of the most attractive ever published; its delicate binding of blue and gold exceedingly appropriate.

Wonderfully true are the words of John G. Whittier, who said:

"The impression made upon me by the perusal of the first edition of this little book has not been weakened by the lapse of time. It seems to me now, as it did then, a very sweet and tender record of the exceptionally beautiful life of a young woman, whose rare natural gifts and graces were sanctified by a deep, but cheerful and healthful, religious experience, free from cant, affectation, or bigotry. It is an attractive picture of the 'sweet reasonableness' of Christian development—a lovely human character flowering into the beauty of holiness." Price postpaid 60 cents.

Organization and the Memorial Fund.

Organization is the keynote of the temperance reform, and most exhaustively has Mrs. S. M. D. Fry, our National corresponding secretary, written on the subject of "Organization and the Memorial Fund" in the July responsive reading, which is of interest to every white-ribboner. Valuable information and data about W. C. T. U. organization and the why and how of the Memorial Fund are given. It will greatly help our work if each union thoroly understands the facts so clearly presented. This reading should be given careful study by every member of the W. C. T. U. and the topic taken as a subject for a regular meeting of the local union. Price per hundred 50 cents.

A Fight Against Odds.

"A Fight Against Odds," by Kate Anderson, presents in a rarely forcible manner the insidious growth of the cigaret habit. Claude, the youngest son of the Kilgour family, is a boy of loving disposition and brilliant mind. Unknown to his family he becomes a slave to the cigaret. The unavailing efforts of mother, sister, and brothers, and even the poor boy himself to free him from the curse, the influences which worked against them and the sad termination are thrillingly told. The interest of the story is absorbing and well sustained. "A Fight Against Odds" appeared as a serial in The Union Signal. We are glad to offer it now in attractive book form, well illustrated and with a handsome cover. Cloth, 75 cents.

Chalk Talking Made Easy.

In "Blackboard Helps for Loyal Temperance Legions," by Mrs. Linnie Gee Finney, we have twelve striking lessons on alcohol and tobacco. The page outline given for each lesson can be easily transferred to the blackboard by one little skilled in drawing. Opposite each picture we find appropriate questions, suggesting the talk which should accompany the use of the illustrations. This is a book needed by every leader of a Legion. The suggestions will be valuable to those who prepare blackboard lessons for Sunday schools and other societies. Price 25 cents.

NATIONAL CONVENTION, CINCINNATI, OHIO, NOVEMBER 13-18, 1903

What Iowa Workers are Doing.

Clara P. White, Correspondent.

Volga, Ia., July 25—Owing to illness in her family our state president was obliged to cancel appointments for Chariton, Osceola, Woodbine and Murray, to her great regret. She hopes, however, to be able to complete the unfinished work at an early date.

Mrs. Ida B. Wise, our new corresponding secretary, is abundantly qualified for her new duties. She is also the president of the Sixth district W. C. T. U., and has done fine service in arranging for able field workers, as well as by personal work in different ways and places. She has about decided to devote her entire time to white-ribbon interests in the year to come.

MRS. IDA B. WISE.

MRS. MARION H. DUNHAM.

MRS. DOLLIE D. BURGESS.

Mrs. Dollie Dick Burgess, state secretary of Y department, is aiming to secure twenty new Y's before state convention. An encouraging number of these have already been gained. She has arranged routes for Miss Eunice Cusick, and also helped in planning for Miss Van Vleet. Altho not a public speaker she is a gifted reciter and holds matrons' medal contests.

Our Satella Penman, president of the Eighteenth district, enjoyed the merited privilege of serving as delegate to World's Convention in Switzerland. She hopes to visit several countries before returning to Iowa, which will be in time for her district convention at Marcus.

Miss Hattie Dickson, state superintendent of Purity work, has recently visited Dubuque Rescue Home for Unfortunate Girls, which is doing a beneficent work. They need baby clothes, bedding and white spreads. They are in need of money to purchase chamber furniture. Unions looking about for ways to do good are invited to help this institution.

District Conventions in Minnesota.

Interesting Papers and Discussions—New Unions.

Mary E. Hoover, Correspondent.

Minneapolis, Minn., July 27.—District Twenty-six embracing Dakota, Goodhue and Rice counties, held its annual convention at Red Wing. Many delegates were present and the reports of unions showed substantial advancement. "Domestic Science," "Duty," "Why Women Want to Vote," "The Public School a Moral Factor in the Nation," and "The Opium Monopoly in the Philippines" were the subjects of the papers and discussions. Miss Annie Robbins, National lecturer, lectured the first evening on "Some Mother's Boy," and the second evening gave her illustrated lecture on "Life in Manila." Mrs. Abbie Church and Mrs. Isabel Wing Lake gave inspiring Bible readings and talks. Literary and musical numbers given were delightful. All enjoyed a two-hours' carriage drive over the city of Red Wing and were privileged to peep into the sanctum of Mrs. Julia B. Nelson, editor of the "Minnesota White Ribbon," and district president. The full account given by the convention reporter pictures a most profitable meeting, the well laid plans of which will have a beneficent influence in many communities thru the years to come.

The convention of the Fourth district, held at St. Peter, was attended by about twenty delegates from five unions. An increase in temperance sentiment was shown wherever the work had been kept up, but three unions have died and this loss is keenly realized, tho one new union is doing good work. "Giving," "The Church and the W. C. T. U.," and "Purity and Mothers' Meetings" were subjects considered. The state secretary of the Y branch made a strong appeal for Y work. An evening meeting addressed by Mrs. B. L. Scovell, state president, closed the convention. The departure of the former vice-president, Mrs. I. F. Randall, for the state of Washington, is mourned by the district, but the work her heart has planned and set in motion will still go on.

The second convention of the First district was held at Stockton. Reports of unions indicated excellent work in most places organized. Papers on "Woman's Sphere as Defined by Scripture" and "Intemperance" and a talk on "Proportionate and Systematic Giving" were much enjoyed. The convention will meet next year in South Troy.

Twenty-two delegates attended the convention of the Fillmore-Houston district at Rushford. Reports were given by seven unions and from eight departments. Three new unions and thirty-eight new membrs have been added since May 1. Rushford has a thriving Y of twenty-two members. Miss Annie Robbins will spend September in the district and Mrs. B. L. Scovell October, which insures added zeal and the spread of the organization.

Twenty-two delegates from three unions attended the Eighth district convention, held at Litchfield. One union has been added to the district, and as a comfortable sum was in the treasury it was decided to employ a state organizer for a few weeks. "Systematic and Proportionate Giving," "Anti-Narcotics," "The One Thing Needful," "The W. C. T. U. and Aid to Mothers," "Women in the Church and the World," "Woman, the Guardian of the Nation," and "Personal Consecration" were discussed. The next convention will be held at Atwater.

The convention was profitable as well as enjoyable. The uplift gained by the interchange of thought brightens the picture for the workers who thru weariness and toilsome effort have gathered for the harvest rejoicing, and all departments are inspired with new strength for the many duties of a W. C. T. U. woman's life.

Stearns district convention was enlivened by papers, discussions and exhortations so excellent as to make it a luxury to report, says Mrs. A. C. Blaisdell. The feature of the convention most helpful of all was the address of the state prohibition secretary, W. G. Calderwood, who gave a clear portrayal of the illogical position of license advocates and the righteousness of the cause of prohibition. Twelve delegates were in attendance. The papers were on "Scientific Temperance," "Good Citizenship," "Health and Heredity," and kindred subjects. Special work was planned for the department of School Savings Banks, Mercy and Scientific Temperance Instruction.

W. C. T. U. Notes.

In the Fifth district a new union was organized by Mrs. Josephine Princell; also, one at Ostrander, in the Fillmore-Houston district.

Mrs. A. D. Partridge, of Fair Haven, Minn., has been appointed state superintendent of Art and Science of Cookery, and Miss Mary Forsberg, of Kasola, state superintendent of School Savings Banks.

Helen Salisbury, Y. W. C. T. U., Minneapolis, gave an ice cream social for the benefit of the ice water fountain at the World's Fair, and the Eighth Ward W. has sent a donation for the same. This union has thirty-seven subscribers to The Union Signal and the paper is taken in clubs, so that seventy-five or eighty members of the union and their families have the reading of it.

Interesting News from Alabama.

Criminology and the Race Problem—Good Reform School—Manual Training Needed.

Mrs. Maria R. Douglas, Correspondent.

Bridgeport, Ala., July 27.—It is midsummer and an unusual number of our workers are laid aside by sickness. Our state president, Mrs. Martha L. Spencer, has been quite ill, but is slowly recovering.

Our state secretary, Mrs. Jeffries, is busy and deeply interested in her work for newsboys in Birmingham. Much of the work of Mrs. Maude L. Greene, the incomparable chalk-talker, has been in new fields. In some places the W. C. T. U. or Frances Willard had never been heard of.

The report of our superintendent of Prison and Jail Work, Miss Julia S. Tutwiler, who is also secretary for Alabama of the National Charities Corrections Conference, is replete with facts and suggestions as to work. She says: "To those who are interested in the subject of penalogy Alabama is a study. She has in custody as criminals one in every 700 of her citizens, and this percentage increases yearly. The prisons and jails have a constant average of 25,000 inmates in a population of less than two millions; of these convicts less than one-eighth are white." (One of our good women has provided a home for the juvenile criminals of our own race.)

"The board of convict inspectors are going to do all in their power under the new plan to benefit those who come under their care, especially the young. They will separate them from the adults in such a manner as to have practically a reformatory for negro youths."

The reformatory for white boys has proved a great blessing to the state. The legislature has just appropriated $8,000 per year for its maintenance the next four years. Private benevolence is about to erect another dormitory.

Miss Tutwiler gives some practical suggestions for our work on this line of reform and recommends that we give more attention to prevention than cure, by establishing classes in manual training in connection with the negro public schools in each county, also the use of the Bible in public schools. "It is in the rural districts, in the fifteen black-belt counties especially, that there is crying need of this work. I have seen the need and have pondered much on methods of meeting it, and I believe our organization can do more to stem the rising tide of crime than even the state herself."

Words like this from one who has been for many years working in prison missions, added to the fact that Miss Tutwiler is president of the Alabama State Normal College, should stir us to action. We hope to help to banish from our state the county convict system, which is a blot on our civilization.

Temperance Sentiment Growing.

Saloons Objected to by Manufacturers—Pledge Signing Campaign—Coming Conventions.

Mary E. Hopper, Correspondent.

Chicago, Ill., July 28.—Sunday-school work, particularly pledge signing, is making rapid headway. Nearly fifteen thousand pledge cards have been circulated this year. Many new unions are being formed, sixty already reported, fourteen of them Y's. The state has been literally covered with literature, oragnizers have been afield and the results are very satisfactory. Many members have been added to the unions, and a very conservative estimate for the year is a gain of two thousand. Temperance news is at a premium, the great dailies of Chicago putting forth vigorous efforts to obtain the facts relating to the public sentiment. Powerful influences are at work against the saloon, all of which should and does encourage our workers.

The managers of the Joliet steel works are protesting against the policy of putting dramshops near their mills, and the city council is having trouble over an application to put a saloon at the wire mill gates. The people are protesting and the officers are earnest in their opposition from economic and business interests.

Our state president, Miss Brehm, will take a well-earned vacation at Nantucket, with Vice-President Mrs. Tyng, from August 1 to 19, when she will return for some Chautauqua work and county conventions. Plans for the state convention, to be held in Chicago October 13-16, are maturing. The many and unusual attractions in connection with it will be given in later letters.

Systematic Medal Contest.

Eager to Join Classes—Four Hundred Medals Won—A Thousand Children Trained.

Eva Munson Smith, Correspondent.

Springfield, Ill., July 27.—Over one thousand children and young people have received gratuitous instruction and have participated in the medal contests at Springfield during the past thirteen years. Nine hundred of this number have come into the contests since the W. C. T. U. system was inaugurated. Of course one incentive to enter the classes is that the lessons are free. But probably the main inducement lies in the fact that the successful ones are taken thru the entire course, which at last gives them a diploma along with the diamond medal—a certificate testifying that the holder has spoken acceptably from the public platform the selections from our temperance books and papers, in the four grades, silver, gold, grand gold, and diamond; not that he or she is a finished elocutionist by any means, but that our temperance truths, along various lines, have been presented publicly in a pleasing manner.

Springfield is the only place in the United States where anyone under twelve years of age has been awarded a grand gold or a diamond medal, unless it has very recently occurred. Among the six diamond medals won here, the last one was awarded a year ago to Pearl Taylor, ten years old. We are very soon to hold our second diamond contest with a class under twelve, and later on another with young ladies and gentlemen in their teens.

It has been noted frequently that there is trouble getting persons to enter in those places where only silver and small gold contests are held. Unless the children and young folks are given to understand that they are to be taken through the course as rapidly as they will prepare themselves, they are averse to entering Class 1. Springfield young people are now wearing about four hundred medals—six diamonds, thirty-five grand gold, sixty-nine gold and the rest silver. We never have to seek pupils. I attribute the eagerness to enter the contests principally to the reasons named.

The Frances E. Willard Hall Dedicated

Kansas W. C. T. U. at Ottawa Chautauqua—Memorable Day—Success of "Congress of Reform."

L. B. Smith, Correspondent.

REV. EUGENIA F. ST. JOHN.

MRS. ELIZABETH P. HUTCHINSON.

MRS. L. B. SMITH.

OTTAWA, Kan., July 27.—The Ottawa Chautauqua Assembly celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary July 15. Many noted personages were in attendance and made characteristic addresses. Among them were Dr. McArthur and Prof. Geo. H. Vincent of New York City, Dr. N. P. Butler and Prof. H. L. Willetts of Chicago University. Recognition day was conspicuous because of the presence of these great leaders of modern religious and educational thought.

Another great day in this assembly was July 11, when we dedicated the Frances E. Willard Memorial Hall, our new W. C. T. U. building at this Chautauqua. The dedication was made memorable by the presence of many national and state celebrities, the heads of every department in the assembly, and a large audience. The dedicatory services were conducted from the spacious upper balcony. The assembly orchestra and the assembly chorus occupied the lower floor. It was truly inspiring when the great throng sang "Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow."

Mrs. E. P. Hutchinson, state president, was in charge of the program. After the singing, prayer and scripture lesson Rev. C. S. Nusbaum, secretary of the assembly, spoke of Willard Hall as an educator, standing the year round as a character builder. Most tenderly did he speak of Miss Willard's life among us in the great world, and how the atmosphere of every home, of every society, of civilization itself, had been sweetened and purified by her living. Mrs. Ella W. Brown, of Holton, a former state president, presented the building to the state officers from the local unions of Kansas. Mrs. Hutchinson responded, accepting the gift and telling the great audience many of the ways in which the devoted women had raised the money for the building. The keys were turned over by the chairman of the building committee, Mrs. S. C. South, of Burlington. The dedicatory address was given by Rev. Eugenia F. St. John, National evangelist, a pioneer in the Kansas W. C. T. U. work.

The W. C. T. U. class work at this assembly is carried on under the head of "Congress of Reform." It was this year a series of magnificent lectures, and as Capt. Jack Crawford, the poet scout, said: "These lectures are better than some of them that have been delivered over in the 'big place'" (the Tabernacle). Among the gentlemen who aided us were Hon. Willis Gluee, of Topeka, whose subject was "The Truest Political Economy"; Rev. Homer Wark, "Prohibition in Kansas, Past, Present and Future," and Dr. C. H. St. John, "Dangers that Beset Our Race." Margaret Hill-McCarter, Ella W. Brown, Jennie L. Kinmore, Mrs. McVean Adams, Miss O. P. Bray and Mrs. S. C. South were speakers as well as workers during the ten-day session.

The Ottawa Chautauqua Assembly has closed one of the best year's work of its popular existence, and when we remember that this assembly is considered as second only to the mother Chautauqua, the prominent position here of the W. C. T. U. means much to our work. Mrs. E. P. Hutchinson conducts the "Congress of Reform" in Beloit and Lincoln Park Chautauquas. Excellent programs will be given at each place.

Willard Hall Notes.

Mrs. S. C. South was hostess at Willard Hall. She with her aids made the interior "a thing of beauty."

Miss Genevieve Colby, state superintendent of Flower Missions, presented for her department a beautiful picture of Miss Willard.

The W. C. T. U. gave a reception to Mme. Tsilka. Over one thousand persons attended. Light refreshments were served and beautiful floral souvenirs given.

The old-fashioned fireplace in the building is a tribute to Miss O. P. Bray from the First district, of which she is president.

One of the beautiful columns was placed there by A. O. Grubb, of Chanute, husband of our late Sophia Naylor Grubb. The column bears her name.

Mrs. E. P. Hutchinson, state president, was presented a book, "God's Out-of-Doors," as a birthday souvenir, by her devoted friends.

Large double windows with beautiful transoms were given by friends and admirers of Rev. E. F. St. John in the Fifth district; also, for Mary E. Haines, from Fourth, and Gladys Johnson, from Minnie Johnson-Grimstead. The Y's of Kansas furnished one window; another was presented by the Priscilla Club of Ottawa. The main entrance doors bear the name of L. B. Smith, from the Second district, of which she was for many years president, and the L. T. L.'s of Kansas put in the door leading out to the upper balcony.

New Unions in West Virginia.

State Convention Plan—County Conventions.

[Mrs. V. E. Mohler, Correspondent.]

ST. ALBANS, W. Va., July 27.—Miss Anna Quinby, of Edenton, Ohio, and Miss Ella Poe, of Buckhannon, West Virginia, have closed a most successful campaign of six weeks in as many counties in this state. They organized eight unions, one Y, six L. T. L.'s and reorganized four unions, gaining a large membership. Several hundred signatures of anti-narcotic and Sunday-school pledges were secured. Medal contests, with free training for contestants, and elocution recitals were used to open the doors for the W. C. T. U. This plan is quite a success, and all of Miss Poe's time is engaged until the state convention. A large number of the unions in the state have raised their dues to one dollar a year, so as to enable every member to become a subscriber to the state paper.

At the midsummer meeting of the state executive committee plans were made and considered for the state convention, which is to be held in Fairmont October 13 to 15. Twice before, at intervals of eight years, has the city entertained the state convention. The largest and most modern church has been secured for the meetings, and Miss Belle Kearney of Mississippi is to be the speaker for the convention.

Our state president, Mrs. N. R. C. Morrow, has been taking a much needed rest at Mountain Lake Park. County conventions are now in order, and our women are busy, as they have planned with greater care and more than usual earnestness for these meetings. Mrs. Morrow will attend a large number of them. She is to attend Elkins, Barbour county; Keyser, Mineral county; Grafton, Taylor county; Amos, Marion county, and several tri-county conventions for which dates have already been arranged. Miss Poe is to be the speaker at Shinnston, Harrison county, and visit a large number of places from that time until the close of this year.

Some Delaware Doings.

Lila Wilson Aron, Correspondent

WYOMING, Del., July 25.—Flower Mission day was quite generally observed thruout the state. The jails and almshouses were well remembered. The Dover, "Camden and Wyoming," and Little Creek unions joined in the services at Kent county almshouse. In Smyrna a special service was held, and while the program was being rendered others were making bouquets which were distributed early the next morning. At Little Creek a Sunday evening service was held in the church, where flowers were in abundance and children took a large part, the state president closing the program with an appropriate address.

Georgetown union held a very pleasant social some time ago, the chief feature being a little entertainment called the "Business Meeting." It was quite a success socially and financially. The Y's of the same place also had a basket ball social, which was fine.

Newark union was visited lately by Mrs. Jackson and Miss Hardcastle, from the Girls' Industrial School, which resulted in the union sending a box of groceries to the school valued at $20.38.

Mrs. Mary B. Donnell, New Castle county president, has organized three new unions in and around Wilmington, the "Thacher" union, May 19; "Frances E. Willard," June 2; and the "Anna A. Gordon," June 19.

"Camden and Wyoming" union have just closed a rummage sale, which was held in a tent for about one week, realizing over $18.

Thurman Convention Reports Progress.

S. M. Stevenson, Correspondent.

MRS. S. W. POPE.

MISS M. A. LYNCH.

MRS. ANNIE VANCE TUCKER.

SALISBURY, N. C., July 24.—The Thurman W. C. T. U. of North Carolina held a most successful convention a few weeks ago at Statesville. Saturday morning Miss Lynch, the president, gave the annual address, followed by the corresponding secretary's and treasurer's reports, which showed an increase in dues, members and activity. Sunday afternoon a large mass meeting was held in the Presbyterian church. A Paper, "Moderate Drinking a Destroyer of the Home, the Race, and the Nation," was read by Mrs. S. M. Stevenson. An earnest discussion followed. Sunday evening Prof. L. G. Drayton, of Biddle University, Charlotte, preached an inspiring sermon from Rev. 12:15-16.

The departments of Flower Mission, Purity, Medal Contest, Mercy Work, Sunday School Work and Anti-Narcotics showed the greatest amount of work done. One local union obtained nearly 1,000 anti-tobacco pledge signers.

Mrs. E. R. Crosby, superintendent of Mothers' Meetings, reported that one union had mothers' meetings for a month, in a community among the lowly mothers, and that much good had been accomplished.

Reports showed a most gratifying increase in both Y and L. T. L. Branches.

The report of Mrs. S. W. Pope, superintendent on Securing Homes for Homeless Children, was pathetic, as she told of her struggles for the past six years to get money to build a W. C. T. U. hospital for orphans at Oxford, N. C. There is still $225 to be raised before the building can be started.

The Y's and L. T. L.'s held interesting silver medal contests. The awarding of the prize banners in the evening closed one of the best Thurman conventions yet held from many standpoints. Prof. J. E. Aggrey, of Livingstone College, Rev. M. J. Marable, of Statesville, and Mr. Saunders, of Charlotte, N. C., became life members.

Mrs. Annie Vance Tucker, lady principal of Livingstone College, and treasurer of the College Y numbering exactly 100 girls, collected and forwarded dues to the state for 100 per cent of the membership, $25. Mrs. Tucker is also contest superintendent and has conducted, as far as can be ascertained, more contests than any other colored woman anywhere. Gold, silver, L. T. L., musical, regular series and Demorest medals have been won. Her classes are rapidly working toward grand gold, diamond and grand diamond medals.

Mrs. S. W. Pope of Shaw University, state superintendent of Homes for Homeless Children, is the founder of the proposed W. C. T. U. hospital for orphans soon to be erected at the Oxford Asylum.

YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH

Conducted by Mrs. Clara Parrish-Wright, General Secretary.

Y's at the World's Convention.

MY DEAR COMRADES OF THE WORLD'S Y: The great World's Convention of 1903—the first held in a foreign-speaking country—is over! And I doubt not that those of you who could not be present will all be glad to hear specially of the "Y" doings during that eventful week in Geneva.

First, tho, the journey thither, which had its own interesting and amusing points.

Imagine a whole long train of women of various nationalities—for most started from London—likewise a steamer full rolling about on a somewhat uncomfortable channel, which gave some bad moments to many; then again, the train to cross all the long length of France into Switzerland.

The night was spent in trying, more or less unsuccessfully, to sleep; but during the day we amused ourselves by picnic meals both on and off the train, boiling the kettle on our knees when no safer place could be found!—in visiting our comrades up and down in the various "classes," and, on nearing Switzerland, with the glorious panorama of mountain and valley which gradually opened out before us. At last we drew into the fine old historic city of Geneva, and then what a scene of bustle and confusion while two or three hundred women, more or less acquainted with the French language, tried to explain that they had "rien à déclarer," and to rescue their luggage from the douaniers.

The fine Hotel Bellevue, where stayed the World's officers and most of the white-ribbon delegates, W's and Y's, was beautifully situated, right overlooking the blue waters of Lake Leman, with the grand mountains of the Mont Blanc range towering in the background.

The day after our arrival was Sunday, and it was very literally a day of rest to us all, finished up by a musical hour in the salon of the hotel, when Miss Munroe Hall, of Maine—the one and only Y from the United States—gave a foretaste of all the inspiration and help she was to be to the convention by her beautiful singing, and favorite hymns were sung, all joining in.

I am sorry to say the Y delegation was only small, being considerably under a hundred, and with very few exceptions—three or four from South Africa, one or two from Canada, one representative from Australia, and so forth—they were all from Great Britain.

Monday was the Devotional Day, and many of our Y's attended. At a later stage the suggestion was brought to the Y conference that at future conventions there be one devotional hour arranged for the young women only. I, as your only official Y representative present, was honored with a seat on the World's Executive Committee.

Monday evening several delightful hours were spent at a reception given by Madame Budé at her country house outside Geneva. There my time was chiefly occupied interviewing all the Swiss young women I could reach, and getting them to promise to attend our Y conferences, etc.

Tuesday morning the Y's were early at work, and a goodly number turned up for the first conference at 9 o'clock. It was occupied chiefly with formal business—minutes, messages, appointment of committees, and the like. We had loving greetings from Miss Kara Smart and from our Y leaders, Mrs. Barnes and Mrs. Parrish-Wright, whose absence was so keenly felt—indeed, it seemed to some of us as tho a World's Convention could not go forward without the one whose winning personality has led the young women attached to our great union from the very beginning.

At 10 o'clock we adjourned into the Convention. What a magnificent hall it was held in! The picture of it will appear in our next year's Y Almanac; but without the coloring and light only a slight idea can be given. The dear, familiar flags and banners hung round—quite conspicuous among them being the beautiful Y banner so soon to travel across the Atlantic. It could not be that we should not feel the blank, which every World's Convention seems but to intensify, and yet it was a grand and comforting thought that Frances Willard's work still grows, and will go right on to victory.

Wednesday morning's Y conference was most successful. Many young women of Geneva were present who kindly gave glimpses of the work being done for and by young women in that progressive city. We also had an interesting discussion on the White Ribbon Band work among girls' clubs, which has been so successful in England, and it was almost with reluctance the Y's adjourned at Convention hour!

Wednesday seemed specially Y day. The last hour of the Convention was given up to the young women, Mrs. Stevens presiding for them in most kindly fashion. First came the resolution of deep regret at the resignation of our World's Y leader from active service, and expression of satisfaction that her health is sufficiently restored to allow her to remain with us as an honorary officer. The resolution was proposed in an appreciative speech, and seconded by a Canadian Y. Then there followed addresses from several young women of different countries; that by Miss Tinling being specially appreciated by the Swiss friends present, it being addressed to them in their own language.

Wednesday evening's meeting was entirely in French, and your assistant secretary had the great honor of presenting the young women's work to a large audience of the Genevan public. As an outcome of this, an informal meeting of young Swiss women was called for the following afternoon, when questions were answered, and seeds sown to the best of their ability by Miss Tinling and your correspondent. It is good to learn since that several then present have joined the newly-formed W. C. T. U. of Geneva.

Thursday morning the Y's were again assembled in conference, and greatly appreciated the kindness of Miss Elizabeth Gordon, who opened with prayer and spoke a few words about Miss Willard, and what she was to young women. And a little later, we were gladdened by a visit and talk from Miss Anna Gordon, who presented the work of the L. T. L. to the conference. Many questions were asked by the Swiss young women present who reported very active work for temperance being done among the children of their land, by means of the "Espoir." After reports from the committees, resolutions, etc., the Conference formally adjourned till 1905.

There were many delightful incidents and interludes during the convention week, but as they did not affect the Y's, and as you will read of them elsewhere in our SIGNAL, I will not describe further.

I fear my letter is already long enough, but I want, before closing, to tell you of the World's Y demonstration which was such a great success at our Annual Y Meeting of N. B. W. T. A.

Twelve members of the representative Y Committee took each a country, and by beautifully carried-out costume and interesting speech, demonstrated the White Ribbon work being done in that country. As each came on to the platform, she was introduced by the superintendent, and attached by a long White Ribbon, and at the end the picturesque group sang, "All Round the World." It is good to know that undoubtedly, interest in the World's Y work is deepening rapidly among our British Y's.

And now let me earnestly exhort you, one and all, dear Y comrades, to begin right away to plan for having a share in the inspiration of the next great World's Convention; and in the hope of meeting very many of you there, and that we may all have grand progress in our respective countries to report then, I am, Always sincerely,

AMY A. SWANKIE-CAMERON.

Report of Y Branch in Formation at Lausanne, Switzerland.

I HAD the joy of being present at the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in Geneva, June, 1903, and of hearing Mrs. Swankie-Cameron, Miss Gordon, and Miss Kingsbury speak about the Y's other work among the young. I saw the usefulness of white ribbon work, and came home to Lausanne, before the party in Geneva had dispersed, to invite some girls to a Y tea. Knowing some had accepted my invitation, Miss Kingsbury came from Geneva to speak to them and start a Y Branch.

At the Convention I had asked Miss Anna Gordon whether, if a Lausanne Branch were founded, the girls might sign the pledge on the understanding that they do not pledge themselves for life. After consideration she consented to the Lausanne Y's signing for one year to begin with, and if a member leaves the society and gives back her pledge card she is free from her promise. I asked for this concession because I think it so dreadful for anybody to break a pledge, and that, as St. Paul says, it is better not to make a vow than to break it.

At this meeting on the 14th of June Miss Kingsbury read a paper explaining the objects of the union, after which discussion followed, I acting as interpreter. Miss Kingsbury let us sign as it is done in the Swiss Band of Hope, for as long a time as we belong to the branch. Out of nine working girls, five signed the pledge. Several of them have been brought up in temperance views, for the Band of Hope ("L'Espoir") founded in our house by Mr. Gustave Regamey, ten years ago, as well as the Blue Cross and other societies, have been hard at work in our town for many years.

The girls were pleased to belong to the Y's, preferring to keep that name just as it is in other countries, rather than have it translated.

An invitation for the next evening given by Miss Kingsbury was responded to by twenty girls. Six new pledges were taken, and missionary badges presented. Having no white ribbon songs in French as yet, we use those of "L'Espoir." I told the girls the Lausanne branch will belong to the World's W. C. T. U., and is the first in Switzerland. My father, Pastor Charles Byse, who came in at the end of the meeting, closed with prayer. I have two officers: a secretary, Mlle. Vallon, and a treasurer, Mlle. Ravessoud, who is very enthusiastic, but who may unfortunately have to leave us in the autumn. I have to act as president until someone else can be found. The Italian and German clergymen of the Methodist Wesleyan church have been very kind to our little band, lending us the room and the crockery we needed.

Two young artists are ready to play the violin and sing at our social teas, and we hope to start a White Ribbon choir, and hold fortnightly meetings. The Lique Antialcoolique, to which Mlle. Ravessoud belongs, has a good library, which is most useful to me.

MARIE BYSE, President.

Y Gleanings.

South Dakota has six new Y's with a membership of 110.

The Y Almanac for 1904 went into the printers' hands July 20.

On her way north this month, Miss Rhena Mosher organized a Y at Ft. Smith, Ark.

Miss Bertha Able and Miss M. J. Adams, two South Carolina Y's, are afield this month.

Miss Alice H. Moore, of Maine, will be in the field continuously for the next two months.

The British Y's have just sent $25 to Miss Smart to pay for the translation of literature.

The Livingstone College (North Carolina) Y has an even one hundred active paid members.

Colorado Y's are to have a reception at "Rest Cottage" one day during the Chautauqua season at Boulder.

As a result of the World's Convention going to Switzerland, that country now has a Y. W. C. T. U. at Lausanne.

Indiana has two new Y's organized by the state secretary, Miss Clara M. Sears; one at Indianapolis and one at Phlox.

Miss Berthe Bowers, former Y secretary of Iowa, is now a resident of Missouri, and is much in demand as a speaker at Chautauquas, etc.

Miss Margaret Bilz, Michigan's new Y secretary, has organized two more Y's recently, one at Lake Odessa, and "Josephine Y," in Ottawa county.

Miss Christine Tinling, of England, Miss Marion Ferguson, of Scotland, and Miss Anna M. Cummings, of South Africa, were made Y associates at Geneva.

Mrs. Effie M. Lambert, of New York, set her "stint" for fifty new unions this year. As she now has thirty-eight we predict that she will reach the desired number.

President Scovell, of Minnesota, has just organized two Y branches—one at Cleveland and one at Warren, and Miss Annie Robbins has organized a Y union at Olivia, that state.

Miss Gertrude Rumsey, Y evangelist of New York, is in great demand by all sorts of societies and great spiritual awakenings, and large numbers of accessions to the church follow her labors.

Mrs. Minnie E. Kirtland, Texas' new Y secretary, says: "I shall be satisfied with nothing less than 500 new members for next year!" If only every state secretary would "set a stint"!

The World's Y Banner will probably remain in storage at Boston until the time of the Cincinnati convention. How would it do to let the state making the largest increase in membership (not per cent) hold it?

The new Marlboro (N. Y.) Y will entertain the county Y's at an all-day conference in September. This local union hopes to increase its membership to at least one hundred by that time, and they have certainly taken the right method to do it.

Missouri has three new Y's; at Maplewood, Donivan, and Hannibal. The last-named will help entertain the state convention which meets at Hannibal in October. Maplewood and Donivan were organized by state president, Mrs. Belle C. Kimball.

Mrs. S. M. Stevenson, Y secretary North Carolina (Thurman) union, was elected state corresponding secretary at the recent state convention. A larger number of young women were present at this meeting than at any previous convention.

The state officers of Minnesota have made it possible for Miss Helen Salisbury, Y secretary, to visit every Y union in the state before the convention in September. She will be given time to do personal work in each place. It is the ideal.

During her western trip Miss Hollister organized the first Y in Idaho. One at Emmett with fifteen members, and one at Idaho Falls with twelve. Most cordial indorsements of Miss Hollister's work has come from leaders in all states where she has labored.

THE CHICAGO FOUNDLINGS' HOME

BY PAULINE E. YOUNG

THE large red brick structure at 141 Wood street, which since 1871 has housed 7,353 of Chicago's unforunate babies, suggests at a glance its true nature—that of a comfortable and hospitable home. If one should happen to spy a stray infant in his garbage box, or in answering the unceremonious ring of his door bell to find on his threshold an atom of humanity wrapped in its father's overcoat (as has occurred), he would take a sudden and unusual interest in that same nicely kept building.

In the earlier days of Chicago it was not an easy matter to dispose of unowned babies, and infanticide was one of the most frequent of crimes. The question of caring for deserted little ones had long perplexed Dr. Shipman. He met them constantly in his practice, and it was also rumored that one, and frequently more, was brought daily before the coroner. At first it seemed impossible to interest anyone in his plans, many persons opposing them on the ground that they would only result in sheltering and increasing crime. Unaided, except by his wife and children, Dr. Shipman made the plunge alone, and on Jan. 30, 1871, he opened the home in a frame building on Green street, near Madison, with a capital of $177.38, which was wholly used in furnishing the institution.

This was the beginning of very hard days for the Shipman family. They had started alone to solve a problem that was full of difficulties. Helping hands were few, money was scarce, and nothing was plentiful but babies. Three hundred passed thru the home during the first year, many being left in a basket which was tied to the door for that purpose.

The question of nourishment was a serious one, made more difficult by the sick, diseased, and abused condition many of the little tots were in when brought to the institution. The more delicate ones were taken to Dr. Shipman's own private residence, and it was no uncommon thing for his children, upon coming home from school, to find a miserable, wailing little object on their beds, waiting to be cared for and amused.

In these days there was an average of from sixty to eighty babies on hand at one time. Anyone who has seen twins safely thru the first two years of their lives can fancy what the work of the home amounted to in caring for so many, not to mention the nerve-distracting chorus that accompanied it. The death rate among the foundlings was very high, being sixty-four per cent of all received.

In 1883 it was decided that the mothers should remain with their children and assist in their care. This was unquestionably a step in the right direction, as the mother, while taking charge of her own child, could also extend her care to some other little one. The death rate was thus decreased to 14.3 per cent., and the responsibility the mothers were forced to assume was of vast benefit to them.

With experience and a constant struggle to find out what is best for the babies, deaths among them have now been decreased to between five and six per cent. of the whole number. When one considers the condition that many of the little ones are in, and the exposures they have passed thru in taking up their new quarters, this result is most remarkable.

Perhaps the greatest work the home is at present accomplishing is the bringing of wayward girls to see the error of their ways and to prevail upon them to rear their own children. To this end both mother and child are given every possible assistance until the mother can find work that will support her child. Rarely is she allowed to leave her infant without remaining herself, and no mother can return to the home if guilty of a second offense.

Some of the foundlings belong to families who are unfortunate and are kept until better times come to their parents, while others who are given up and abandoned are almost without exception adopted. The person adopting a child must agree to rear it as his own and prove that he bears a good character and will give the child a Christian education. There is no charge for adoption, but the home reserves the right to recall any of its small inmates who are ill treated. In this manner 1,631 babies have found new parents. The only requirement an applicant must fulfill is to be a baby; no questions are asked as to color, race, or religion.

The problem of caring for these abandoned little ones is not the knotty one it was at first. Since its incorporation in May, 1871, the home has gradually made its own friends until now the present building, free from mortgage, testifies to the regard people have for the good work done within its walls. It depends entirely on donations for its support. The county buries the dead that the burial fund will not cover, and the home is under obligation to the city only for its supply of water (Chicago water), which is furnished free of charge. The financial affairs are managed by a board of directors or trustees, who also invest the funds belonging to it.

The institution always has been practically managed by the Shipman family, and its success is solely due to their untiring efforts. The original founders, Dr. and Mrs. Shipman, have both passed away; Dr. Shipman some twelve years ago, and Mrs. Shipman within the last few weeks. The work is to be continued by their daughters, Miss Frances and Miss Margaret, who have it equally at heart, who have served an apprenticeship since their childhood, and who have dedicated their lives to the service.

The most noted of the foundlings is little blind Priscilla, who made her first appearance at the home when only a few days old. She was brought by a man who, when left alone in the office for a few minutes, seized his opportunity to disappear and leave the baby behind. When the little thing was unwrapped her eyes were found to be in a dreadful condition thru neglect. For five years the oculists vainly endeavored to save her sight.

Among the miniature guests at this "baby headquarters" there is now a daily average of forty, whose happy faces contradict a great many erroneous ideas concerning them, one in particular being that any kind of food donated is prepared by the gallon for their benefit, instead of which their individual needs are carefully studied.

Religious instruction is given at the home, and every effort is made by teaching, persuasion, and help to lead the erring girls into better ways. Perhaps the greatest proof of the good accomplished in this respect was evident at the time of Mrs. Shipman's death, when scores of these women, now leading honest Christian lives, called at the

How many of Chicago's useful citizens, men and women, owe their lives and good fortune to the efforts of Dr. and Mrs. Shipman will never be known, but the home on Wood street, for which they so wisely planned and heroically labored, is an enduring monument of their consecrated endeavors.

Poisoners-General in Assaults.

By Josiah W. Leeds.

ONE day last month—I remember very clearly it was the day following the publication of the awful account of the outrage and murder of the girl, Helen Bishop by the negro White—I stopped off at a railway junction a few miles from Philadelphia, and, during the few minutes of my detention, noticed near me a group of four lads about fifteen years old, looking over a vile illustrated weekly paper. One of the boys was a negro. Immediately my mind made the obvious connection between the seed-sowing after this kind and the dark deed of lust and murder which even then was stirring to a revengeful retribution a whole community.

Upon reaching the city, temporarily turning aside from the business which called me there, I at once repaired to the City Hall in order to urge the Director of Public Safety to suppress the exposure and sale of the corrupting sheet referred to; and, later, forwarded a formal written complaint thereabout. The matter is now pending.

What has the fiendish lynching of White for his unutterably detestable crime accomplished? In the intervening several weeks what a holocaust of such deeds! And now, this day as I write, the sickening details, surpassing everything in the way of demoniac barbarity of which the human race might be supposed capable, which comes to us from Mingo county, in West Virginia!

Thousands of perfervid editorials in the daily press, and other thousands of warning discourses from the pulpit, have told our people all about the causes of these lynchings, but what enlightenment has been shed upon the genesis of the loathsome deeds of the guilty negroes? Not many years ago, when a similar epidemic of this sort of crime and its swift, revengeful punishment, was prevalent thruout the country, the writer of this, publicly referring in print to the matter, used language which may now be pertinently repeated. It was said by him in the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL: "From Florida we have had not a few cases of felonious assaults, with lynchings following. Yet from that land of the 'fountain of youth.' I remember to have had a letter two winters ago, in which the writer expressed his surprise and dismay at seeing so much sensational, crime-inciting reading-matter at the small towns and villages of the interior. The great crime of our fratricidal war grew out of a social institution in the support of which many northern shippers, manufacturers and traffickers were something more than 'silent partners.' When the story of the lynchings comes to be written in full, and inquiry be made into the genesis of the continued epidemics of vile assaults (whether South or North) the guilty hand of the unscrupulous publisher and purveyor of printed poison in New York, Chicago, etc., may be in a measure apparent."

And in a letter addressed to Governor Brown, of Maryland, touching a fierce demand for the immediate execution of six negroes accused of a capital crime, it was similarly said:

"There are those who straightway talk of summary lynching, when hanging is not swiftly accomplished, and yet probably not a man of such a mob would deem it worth his while to stir a foot in any endeavor to rid our news-stands and the mails of that vast corrupting and brutalizing mass of printed matter which is rapidly educating multitudes of our young people in the way of the robber, the outrager of female virtue, and the murderer."

Necessity of Child Training.

By Mrs. Marie Justice.

IN our modern civilization there are many aids to the church's idea of growth toward an ideal Christian character. In early times children were taught by the same methods which men used to instruct grown people, but our times are beginning to realize more fully from day to day the necessity of differentiating the education of the child from that of the adult.

The child must be fed morally on a diet suited to its tender years and mental conditions; hence we have in the temperance work the Loyal Temperance Legions, Junior and Senior, wherein the young are trained in a knowledge of the need of temperance in an interesting and entertaining manner suited to their age and capability. Another advantage in thus giving them an early knowledge of temperance facts and principles is that they are prepared to give a reason for their faith and practice to vicious companions, who are ever watching to lead them astray.

Again, as human beings are creatures of habit, if young children begin life with the custom of going to L. T. L. meetings instead of idling around aimlessly on Sunday afternoons, they early form the habit of placing their lives in line with good influences and are more easily brought to love all that is noble true and pure.

Chapter XXI.

EARLY the next morning Mr. Boyd went to Hugh's room and found it empty. He had intended to counsel him not to speak on personal matters at present, either to Mrs. Boyd or to Miss Glyn, but surmised at once that he was too late. Hugh had, in fact, risen early, after a sleepless night, and deliberately waylaid Rose in the kitchen garden. There at this moment he was stumbling thru his story in an agony of shame, that was increased tenfold by the half-conscious cruelty of the grief-stricken girl's pretended lack of comprehension. Dr. Mann's sarcastic comments had not cut so deeply as did Rose's utter inability to believe in such depths of duplicity. But Hugh's character had begun to develop under the stress of the last few weeks; and despite his misery and shame, his tone in his extremity was manly and sincere. It was by a distinct effort that Rose contrived to keep up that air of pained incredulity, but she persisted in it to the last.

"I am afraid that I must go in now, Mr. Brotherton, and indeed I think you ought to have remained quietly in your room, and allowed us to send for Dr. Mann. It is quite impossible to believe that the dreadful conduct of which you accuse yourself can be true."

She turned and walked to the house with all the dignity at her command, and how was Hugh to know that her heart was breaking? She not only made her appearance at the breakfast table, but compelled herself to eat enough to satisfy observant eyes, and to take her share, with some show of liveliness, in the conversation. Hugh did not put in an appearance, and in answer to Mrs. Boyd's suggestion that the maid should be sent to knock at his door, Miss Rose airily interposed:

"If Mr. Brotherton has returned to his room, he has done the wisest possible thing. He came to me in the garden just now, and, from his extraordinary conversation, I can only suppose him to be light-headed again. I think that Chris should send for Dr. Mann."

Mrs. Boyd gazed in bewilderment at the flushed young face, but her husband promptly trod on her toes, and she held her peace.

"Mann knows all about it. I dare say he will look in presently. I am very sorry for Brotherton," he said gravely; and at that Rose had as much as she could do to keep herself from bursting into tears.

As soon as they were alone Mr. Boyd explained the position at length to his wife; but thruout the day Rose resolutely refused to enter into any discussion of the subject which filled all their minds.

Soon after breakfast Dr. Mann looked in and saw Mr. Boyd alone. His confidence of last night had manifestly been shaken.

"Madam means mischief; I can see that she does," he said uneasily. "She's vexed at having prematurely given herself away, and if she can by any means contrive a scene tonight she will do it. I bet you anything you like she will manage it somehow. Luckily, her maid is to be trusted, and she has strict orders that her mistress is neither to leave the house nor to receive visitors. Still, I'm not easy. Madame does look so happy, and she possesses the devil's own gift of invention. We shall have to keep a sharp lookout. I suppose Brotherton is to have his chance?"

Mr. Boyd's shoulders expressed the sense of responsibility that was not apparent in his words.

"I suppose so. In fact, under the circumstances, I don't see what other course is possible."

"I'm glad of it. More or less, I am responsible for his first slip, and I am inclined to think he has had a lesson he will not easily forget. I know I have," and he made a wry face. "I'm booked thru for total abstinence at last, and be hanged to him! Funny thing, when you come to think of it, that Brotherton should have converted the lot of us to teetotalism while making a drunkard of himself. By the way, I wouldn't say anything to him about Madame. It may only lead to his giving himself away."

"He has already made a confession to Rose," remarked Mr. Boyd casually.

The doctor whistled.

"He has—has he? But that's a different matter. Well?"

"Miss Glyn declines to take him seriously and strongly recommends your services. She affects to treat his statements as the wanderings of a disordered mind. A tender-hearted girl can display the most extraordinary cruelty when she takes it into her head to do it, Mann."

The doctor smiled grimly. Brotherton would be none the worse, in the end, for a taste of such treatment; and there was not much fear, he thought, that Miss Glyn would be able to persevere in it to any great extent. He did not yet know Rose.

The day passed heavily enough for the occupants of the Vicarage, all the more heavily because of the perverse light-heartedness with which Rose ignored the existence of trouble. It was a relief to the rest when, early in the afternoon, she took herself off to the parish room, with the smiling remark that the coffee supper must be prepared, even altho Mr. Brotherton should assure them all by-and-by that the rescue of Billy Sellers was, after all, nothing but a disgraceful piece of sham. When she had gone Mrs. Boyd addressed herself to the task of nerving Hugh for the task that lay before him. To that end, while allowing him to unburden his mind of its remorse, she kept steadily before him the fact that the function of the evening was purely intended as a parochial recognition of an act that had no connection with his fall, and that, consequently, he must submit to have it dealt with by Pitsmoor folk on its own merits. She was flattering herself that her representations were having the bracing effect at which she aimed when the little housemaid appeared bearing a salver on which lay a card which she presented to Hugh.

"The gentleman is in your study, sir," she said smilingly.

"Thank you," said Hugh quietly. "My father!" he added despairingly as the door closed. "I wrote to him last night, and he must have come off by the first train."

He went at once, and the length of the ensuing interview prepared Mrs. Boyd for what he, at last, came back to say.

"It has been an awful blow, and he won't hear of any compromise. He insists upon my throwing up everything and going back with him to-day. It might be for the best. Who knows? But, of course, it means ruin. I don't know what to do!"

"There's Chris!" exclaimed Mrs. Boyd joyfully, as she heard the fall of the latch. "I must go and help Rose. She has been alone long enough, poor girl. But first your father must have some tea, and he will see, when I have explained it to him, that nothing can be done before to-morrow. You owe to-night, at any rate, to Pitsmoor."

She explained it with such entire conviction to the stern, sorrow-stricken solicitor that, perforce, he acquiesced, and further accepted, without audible demur, her assurance that Pitsmoor folk would feel honored by his presence at their homely gathering. Some protest he did attempt to make against her assumption that he would, of course, remain as her guest, but her calm decision triumphed over his reluctance, and she left the three men together under orders to come to the hall in good time.

Rose was directing two or three helpers with more than her usual brightness, and turned at once to rally her sister upon the sly policy of delaying her appearance until the work was nearly done.

"I should have come earlier, but I had to bring poor Mr. Brotherton to reason; and when at last I was thinking of coming, his father arrived."

"His father?"

Rose spoke sharply and her face paled.

"Yes. It seems that Mr. Brotherton wrote to him yesterday. No doubt it was a terrible shock, but I hope he will give himself time to thing before ruining his son's life. He wants to take him away at once."

"And what does Mr. Brotherton want?" asked Rose harshly.

"I don't think he cares very much, at this moment, what happens."

Rose went off for a fresh supply of flowers.

"What does Chris say?" she asked coldly, on her return.

"Chris, poor man, is in sore straits," said his wife, with a little laugh, "but I look to see him act with decision before all is done. I say that the rescue of William Sellers is a thing apart from the rest of Hugh Brotherton's life, as, for that matter, it is apart from the rest of Sam Widgery's. When tonight is done with we can consider what it is our duty to do next."

Rose said nothing, but the look of tension on her face had certainly relaxed.

When supper time arrived Mr. Boyd excited some disappointment, and a compensating degree of interest, by announcing to the overflowing company that, in consequence of the unexpected arrival of his father from the south, Mr. Brotherton was unable to join them at present, but that he hoped to do so before long. As a matter of fact, the trestle tables were being removed and the benches rearranged to face the platform, when a sudden burst of applause bore witness to the fact that Hugh had quietly entered the room. So great was the interest aroused by the tall, spare stranger by his side that the extraordinary pallor of the younger man passed almost unnoticed. Having first introduced Sam Widgery to his father, Hugh looked round for Dr. Mann, and for the next few minutes the reluctant solicitor was busily shaking hands with the warm-hearted admirers of his son.

When the reserved—not to say "stand-offish"—visitor was at last permitted to take a seat, Tummas Windle at once caused himself to be wheeled into such close proximity as would enable him to impart as much reliable information to the distinguished guest as the intervals in the proceedings would allow. For the solicitor's protection Rose was installed in the chair next to his on the other side. Mrs. Boyd's presence was required in several parts of the room at once; Mr. Boyd and Hugh had, of course, to ascend the platform, and Dr. Mann preferred to stand about in the vicinity of the door.

When the audience had at last settled itself into an attitude of attention, Enoch was the first to get upon his legs, and with rough but heartfelt pathos he at once began to thank the Lord "who sent his dear young servant to us in our need." For five minutes or so Hugh bore it, keeping his conscience-stricken face well behind the broadest back on the platform. Then he signalled to John Broadbent a command to pull Enoch's coat-tails. Full well did Enoch know that, at this inexorable sign, he was bound in honor to give place to the next speaker, but, overflowing as he was with his theme, he held his ground, alternately praising the Lord and Hugh, until his overcharged heart had been emptied of all that was in it. John Broadbent followed in the same strain, and after him, to the surprise and delight of those present, Sam Widgery rose in his place and voluntarily floundered thru a blushing tribute of admiration and affection for his new leader and friend. Hugh, still behind that back, but not out of Rose Glyn's sight, had recourse to his pocket handkerchief, and the girl's face flushed suddenly. The flush deepened when Dr. Mann, from his station near the door, added his tribute to the chorus of praise. He confined himself strictly to the brave rescue of Billy Sellers from the flooded mine, and emphatically coupled Sam's name with Hugh's; but to have compelled the cynical doctor to admit his "admiration" for "a brave and unselfish deed which, to the end of our lives, we shall be proud to remember," was felt to be a triumph indeed for a curate of teetotal principles. Hugh emerged from behind that friendly back to give the doctor a grateful look, and the elder Brotherton shot a keen glance in the same direction. Mr. Boyd followed briefly—all too briefly for Hugh, who, as the vigar resumed his seat, must needs rise and reply.

It was at this moment that a sturdy youngster, swelling with self-importance, stepped forward from a side bench near the platform and put a sealed envelope in Enoch's hand. Had the doctor been less intent upon watching the door he would have recognized a younger brother of his own errand boy. While Hugh, in tones that trembled, was gratefully thanking those who had expressed such kindly feeling toward him, and protesting to a smiling and dissenting audience his abiding sense of his own unworthiness, Enoch was staring horror-stricken at the open paper in his hand.

"Friends," he said, stumbling to his feet as the cheering ceased, "Providence—or some other power, I can't rightly say which—have laid most unwelcome dooty upon me.

"I'm fair capped, that's what I am," continued the poor old man, in what was evidently genuine distress. "This here dockyment which have this moment been put into my hand 'from a true friend of him who we are all so proud to call our friend' (meanin' Mr. Brotherton), *con*tains what I am bound to say looks to be the most insultingest questions one Christian man could put to another in a public meetin'."

The stern-faced stranger, who hitherto had kept his eyes fixed straight before him, turned them up to the speaker in grim anticipation of something in the nature of a sensation, and Hugh, coming suddenly into view, looked steadily into Enoch's face.

"One moment, Mr. Light," interposed Mr. Boyd from the chair. "If, in your judgment, the document contains matter of an insulting nature, is it desirable to give such insults publicity?"

"In my humble opinion, Mr. Chairman," pronounced Enoch slowly, "it is desirable, for, see here, this is how the dockyment begins: 'If Mr. Light, as a sincere friend and admirer of Mr. Brotherton, desires to hear him clear himself from a scandalous imputation, let him put the following questions to him before the close of the meeting. This is the advice of a true friend.'"

"Is that the only signature?" asked Dr. Mann, from his place at the door.

"That is the only signature," replied Enoch, after an elaborate examination of the paper on both sides.

"Then, Mr. Chairman, I, for one, protest against the publication of an anonymous slander," said the doctor decisively.

"That is emphatically my own position," agreed Mr. Boyd.

But Pitsmoor had never tolerated the rule of the chairman in its public meetings, and Enoch, undisturbed, glanced over his spectacles in the doctor's direction.

"That is a very proper observation for to make, and comin' from the quarter from which it do come, I'm sure we all appreciate it," said he approvingly. "But this here dockyment says: 'If you want to hear Mr. Brotherton clear himself from a scandalous imputation,' and that, I take it, friends, is what we all are bound to want—"

He was interrupted by a burst of frantic applause, to which succeeded the strained silence of attention.

"One moment, Mr. Light!" interposed Dr. Mann this time, as Enoch seemed about to resume reading. "I have reason to believe that this interruption

Children's Cozy Corner

THE PICNIC THAT WASN'T SPOILED.

"AUNT MEG, did your children ever get disappointed over a picnic?" asked Beth.

Aunt Meg looked about at three unhappy faces—yes, four, for the cat looked anything but happy, as Tom was showing his disappointment by teasing her. Jessie was curled up on the couch in a forlorn little heap, sobbing. Beth had stood at her post by the window since early morning. It did seem as tho, if she kept looking, a few sunbeams must reward her.

Drip! drip! drip! splashed the drops from the iron conductor on to the stone beneath. Patter! patter! patter! they sounded on the tin roof of the piazza.

FOUR LITTLE WHITE BEAUTIES.

"Sniff! Oh dear! Sniff!" came from the curled-up heap on the couch. "Mee-ow!" wailed the poor cat.

"My children had an indoor picnic one day when they couldn't go to a real one," said Aunt Meg. "I will show you how as soon as Jessie stops crying and Tom lets the cat alone and Beth gives up looking for the sun."

In a second the three children were gathered about their aunt, for they were all tired of what they had been doing. The cat settled down on the rug for a nap, with her tail tucked well beneath her. That tail hanging out might tempt Tom!

"In the first place, we will tell mamma not to unpack the lunch and to put in a few lemons besides," said Aunt Meg.

Tom did this, while Beth looked up a hammock and Jessie got the game of ring-toss. Aunt Meg locked the sitting-room doors and let no one come in. When she had gotten things ready they all put on their hats, took up the lunch baskets, hammock, games, shawls, cushions and umbrellas and started out. Aunt Meg led the way upstairs, thru mamma's room, back into the hall, down the back stairs to the kitchen, round thru the woodshed, up again to the attic, and all the while they talked and sang as if they were really on the way to a picnic.

At last, after taking them all over the house, up and down and around and back, till Tom's arms ached in real picnic fashion, and Jessie had forgotten that she had had anything to cry for, Aunt Meg stopped at the sitting-room door.

"We will now let down the bars into the picnic grounds," she said, unlocking the door and throwing it open. Most of the chairs were gone; all the plants of the house had been brought in, and, with the green carpet, gave quite a woodsy look to the room.

"Here, let's swing the hammock," said Aunt Meg, and she soon had it firmly fastened to two stout hooks which even mamma had forgotten were there.

The children got into the spirit, threw down their wraps, put their lunch-baskets carefully under the shade of a palm, and began to play ring-toss, while Aunt Meg arranged a cosy-corner with cushions and shawls, and read to mamma, who lay in the hammock. It was the hammock that made the room seem so very different from a common sitting-room and so much like a picnic ground.

Tom fixed the couch into a splendid boat, and with brooms for oars they went for a long row, even mamma consenting to go, too, which was more than she would have done in a real boat. After the boat ride was over, and Tom had landed all his passengers carefully on a footstool dock, Aunt Meg said it was high time to commence getting dinner, and that the children must hunt about for wood to build a fire. They came back from the woodshed with great armfuls, which they pretended had been gathered from under the trees, and Aunt Meg soon had a little fire, with a row of apples toasting before it. Mamma made the lemonade, and the children helped spread the tablecloth on the floor and unpack the food.

"It's nice not to have the spiders and bugs," said Jessie, biting into a sandwich.

"After dinner we'll play, sitting down on the grass," said Aunt Meg, "quiet games such as one feels like playing after eating."

Drip! drip! patter! patter! sounded the rain, but nobody cared a single bit.—Frances Weld Danielson, in Sunday School Times.

A Word About Advertisements.

SOW a taste, and you reap an appetite. Sow an appetite, and you reap self-indulgence. Sow self-indulgence, and you reap a passion. And sow a passion, and you reap a ruined life.

Taste is the beginning of it. The downward course of every drunkard who reels thru the streets can be traced back to the time when he acquired a taste for the poison. The liquor traffic counts much upon inherited tastes and appetites for its custom. At the same time, thru brandied concoctions and alcoholized patent medicines, it seeks to instil these perverted tastes. Ignorance has made this process of cultivation of abnormal appetites easy. People who could not be prevailed upon to touch an alcoholic stimulant, if so labeled, thru such agencies develop a craving for liquor.

To overcome this lamentable ignorance the Non-Alcoholic Medication Department of the W. C. T. U. has carried on a campaign of education. Its investigations have disclosed that a sufficiently large proportion of alcohol is to be found in the patent medicines sold thruout the land to stock many a dramshop. Such a revelation makes apparent the reason of the growth of the saloon. The exhilarating tonic is easily followed by the stimulating malt extract. This gives way to the beer which is guaranteed to build up the system, to be in turn succeeded by the brandy and the wine that produce a temporary false feeling of well-being; and the work is done.

The members of the union who live in the rural districts often imagine that their affiliation with the work is little more than nominal; that because of their distance from saloon centers they are limited in their opportunities for temperance work. There is one department of the union's work which no other class of women are so well able to control as they.

It is self-evident that the soul of the patent medicine business is advertising. In the farming districts this advertising is done largely thru the defacing of barns, fences, and outbuildings with unsightly lettering and pictures. Without considering the pathetic side of the question, which is interesting enough to warrant discussion, there is an ethical side which is deserving of the attention of every woman who controls a barn, a woodshed, a milk-house, or a high board fence.

In the course of an interesting article by Mr. Bok, editor of the Ladies' Home Journal, he incidentally suggests the relation of the farmer's wife to the question. He says advertising firms find it far more difficult to secure the permission of the women than of their husbands to post their advertisements, and it is not uncommon for a woman to refuse indignantly to permit such defacing of the premises. The representatives of the malt and beer enterprises find it especially difficult to secure her consent to the posting of their advertising material; but, strange to say, these same women will often consent to the exploitation of a patent medicine which contains thirty-eight per cent more alcohol than did the beer. He quotes the words of a painter of one of these patent medicine advertisements: "It always makes me smile when I am painting one of our advertisements on the side of a temperance woman's barn. If she only knew what was in the stuff!"

Sisters of the rural homes, will you let such an imputation of ignorance rest upon you longer? The union has no power by which it can control individual members, and the assertion of Mr. Bok that zealous members of the W. C. T. U. and earnest advocates of the temperance cause are thus becoming allies of the liquor traffic thru ignorance cannot be disputed, altho we are confident the number is small and is daily growing less. It becomes us as individuals to pass along the warning to every other woman—that she who lends her name or her barn to the advertising of a patent medicine of whose ingredients she has no knowledge brings reproach upon the organization.

The suggestion made by Mr. Bok that women of the rural districts exercise their club spirit and ambition in organizing "landscape clubs" for the protection of their buildings from the advertising fiend might be made effective along temperance lines. There is a fine opportunity to do real educative work in bringing their neighborhoods to a realization that in permitting these advertisements to appear upon their premises they are not only doing themselves and their property an injury, but they are becoming partners in the enterprise which they thus advertise. It therefore behooves them as honest men and women to thoroly investigate the merits of the goods recommended, lest unwarily they cause a brother to stumble and fall, and even perish, by their carelessness.

The cities are replenished from the country. The population of the metropolis is yearly augmented by the youth from the rural districts. If the tastes of the country people are perverted, what must we expect when these same individuals become a part of the temptation-thronged cities? Never was there a finer opportunity for strategic work than is offered to the members who control these distributing points.

A Campaign of Education.

THE proceedings of the eighth annual convention of the Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of America, as chronicled by the trade journals, furnish entertaining and, in some respects, useful reading to the outsider, the names and portraits of the leading lights of the organization supplying suggestive, if not flattering, commentary.

The chief work of the Association is centered in its Protective Bureau, established only last year, and the report of this bureau contains much that is of interest to temperance workers. Its activities have extended over twenty-two states, and more than seventy per cent of the contests in which it has participated have, so says the report, "been brought to successful issue." The rejection of prohibition by Vermont and New Hampshire is attributed to the work of the bureau. It has helped in 181 local option elections and in 144 of these, results of which are known, the liquor forces have met defeat in only forty-one. The report offers explanation of their overwhelming defeat in Texas, admitting that sixty-four per cent of the bureau's total expenditure for the year was made in and for that state. (Congratulations again to the temperance host in Texas!)

The Protective Bureau confines its efforts almost entirely to educational work thru the medium of the printed page This is, it wisely points out, "the most important work which can possibly be done because the final decision of all questions at issue depends upon public sentiment," and the committee is "glad to report that the trade thruout the country is rapidly awakening" to the value of tracts and leaflets as an educative force in saving communities from the "blight of prohibition." The bureau has, during the year, published 2,515,000 "pieces of literature," and of these 1,355,500 have been mailed directly to voters in separately addressed envelopes. It has also prepared and sent out 1,808 typewritten pages of special arguments for use in special cases, and has secured the publication of ninety-two columns of newspaper matter.

In view of the work done in the first twelve months of its organization, is it not wise for us to consider how best to meet and counteract the new and powerful influences of the liquor men's Protective Bureau?

A campaign of real education prohibitionists have no reason to fear, but they do have every reason to fear a one-sided presentation of the subject to the unthinking. It is well to be informed concerning the plans and tactics of the enemy, and in this systematic, extensive, and centralized distribution of literature may not the temperance societies see a valuable suggestion?

The Impure Vision.

AMONG the barbarous tribes children are sacrificed to deities of lust and passion, and it is called religion. In this country we do worse. On altars of indifference and carelessness we sacrifice our youth, and our cities tolerate and license it under the name of recreation.

The case in point, which needs no eloquence of language to drive it home, is found in the busiest thorofare of Chicago. It has its counterpart in every large city in the land. A keen-eyed woman reporter for a Chicago paper discovered it and sounded a note of warning. It is nothing more than a "moving picture" parlor. Its innocence of name and exterior makes it doubly dangerous. Music from a rich-toned organ and scores of really fine views of natural scenery provide an atmosphere of respectability. The newspaper woman was attracted by the remark of a young boy to his companions: "Come upstairs; there's a dandy there." She followed, and as the lads each deposited a penny in the picture slot machine she observed their faces—"a study in curious animalism—in each boy was the possibility of a first-class levee wonder." They were first shocked, then guiltily curious, finally shamelessly inquisitive for more of the unthinkable, unspeakable vision. These enterprises for the expenditure of a cent and a few minutes of time guarantee to fill the innocent mind with the concentrated impurity and immorality of a life-long roué. What does it all mean? The correspondent logically and courageously traced it out to its tragic conclusion. It means that the levee, the saloon, the gambling-houses and unmentionable resorts are being filled from such material faster than any city police force can clean them out.

There is one law of chemistry that no student in the laboratory dare overlook. To ignore it is to fail. It is the law of purity. In this branch of natural science purity is power. The elements will refuse to combine if an impure acid be used in the experiment, and the care and skill of the chemist are of no avail. Not otherwise is it in the laboratory of life. In homes, in schools, in institutions of reform, men and women are working night and day, spending thousands of dollars trying to secure such a combination of wisdom and righteousness as shall produce strong, true men and women. Yet thru the medium of these abominable places of so-called entertainment in an idle five minutes is precipitated into these characters in process of formation an element of impurity. In that little space of time the love and devoted efforts of fathers, mothers, and friends are defeated.

Impurity of thought seeks expression in impurity of speech, and impurity of speech hastens on to immorality of action, and power and virtue have gone forever.

To permit this crusade of vice among our children is to insure moral paralysis for the society of the future.

The outlay of an hour in faithful investigation and examination of places of this character in every city and town may do away with the necessity for years of reformatory work. In the name of innocent childhood and pure-minded, chaste youth, is not such an outlay worth while?

The Passing of Leo XIII.

THE matter of greatest interest to world-wide Christendom during the past few weeks has been the illness and death of Pope Leo. He was especially dear to the Catholic church, as he was easily one of the most illustrious pontiffs that has occupied the chair of St. Peter. Under his wise and beneficent reign the church has gained greatly in prestige. The Pope was deeply interested in the workingman and his welfare, and, in fact, he advocated and fostered all that made for the good of humanity. Indeed, in the immaculateness of his moral character, his deep spirituality, and his wise and conscientious rulership he was an ideal priest and leader.

As a politician he was to be reckoned with as a world power. An intellectual giant and wonderfully sagacious, he must be classed with Gladstone and Bismarck. He had the utmost horror of war, and his influence was always used on the side of peace and conciliation. He was without doubt one of the greatest men of his century.

The Protestant world has yielded a generous recognition to Pope Leo's transcendent qualities, and has frankly admired his brilliant intellect, his exemplary life, and his undoubted goodness. But it was his goodness that gained its greatest admiration, thereby proving that man, in the final test, loves goodness better than he does greatness.

His life is an unanswerable temperance argument. Of delicate health, yet by extreme frugality and simplicity of living he prolonged his life to the great age of ninety-three, having lived a career of ceaseless activity, and preserved his brilliant intellect undimmed to the last.

A Distasteful Appellation.

TO the sensitive ear of temperance women the word "punch" can but be exceedingly distasteful. It savors too strongly of alcohol. And to people who are non-temperance it carries instinctively the same suggestion. Perhaps it has struck us all unpleasantly, but our aversion has not crystallized into a formal protest against its use for non-alcoholic decoctions. To the temperance women of Nebraska belongs that honor. In a report on that subject the state correspondent pungently says:

"The Nebraska W. C. T. U. have become much in earnest over a desire to do away with the existing evils resulting from Christian women serving in their homes and entertainments a fruit drink which they and every one call 'punch.' According to Webster, punch is a 'drink containing intoxicating liquor.' Therefore, where Christian women serve punch, and it is so reported in the papers, it certainly has the 'appearance of evil,' tho it probably is the most harmless drink in the world. * * * Something should be done, and we hope to do it. The state union asks any one to send a short, catchy, yet suitable name for the fruit-juice drinks served without liquors, and by Christian women. A prize of $5.00 is offered for the most satisfactory name sent to our president, Mrs. D. V. Wheelock, Superior, Neb., by October 15. Any person, whether a member of the W. C. T. U. or not, is at liberty to respond. Send with your name its meaning or whatever about it recommends it to your thought. It must be short and catchy, and preferably have a meaning which makes it appropriate—that of a distinctively non-intoxicating fruit drink."

We cordially commend this Nebraska plan to the consideration of W. C. T. U. women everywhere. There is a great deal in a name!

A Texas Victory.

WE are rejoiced to be able to record the welcome news that a tidal wave of prohibition is sweeping over the great state of Texas. One hundred and thirty counties have voted total prohibition, and fifty-nine others have partial prohibition, that is, the country precincts have total prohibition, while in the larger towns only—like Dallas and Fort Worth—is the sale of liquor permitted. In only fifty-nine counties—chiefly sparsely settled border counties—is the sale of liquor unrestricted. Several other large counties are to hold elections within the next thirty days, and prospects are good for more sweeping prohibition victories.

The prohibitionists within the Democratic party are organizing a campaign to give a prohibition majority in the legislature to be elected next year, in order that a strictly prohibition amendment to the constitution may be submitted to a vote of the people in the state in a special election in 1905. Governor Lanahan is a strong prohibitionist and will certainly help the movement along.

Evangelistic Echoes.

WE were holding a series of gospel temperance meetings and one night I preached on the true value of a soul. In referring to influences that lead a young boy astray I said: "Give a boy a dog, a gun, and a fast horse and he will soon find the road to ruin."

In front sat a young man who owned a fast horse—one just fast enough to lose him money on the race track. He had been offered $800 or $900 for him, but thought he was worth more. That night the sermon seemed directed to him, altho I had no knowledge of him or his habits; but he was so impressed that he offered his horse for less price and sold him that week.

Two years after, as I was sitting in a chair car speeding westward, a tall young man slipped into the seat beside me and made no comment. I thought him rather abrupt when he turned and said:

"You do not remember me?"

"No, I do not recall your name."

"Well, I am the young man who had the fast horse, the dog and the gun. Do you remember? (naming time and place), and I did just as you said—sold my horse, paid my debts, and secured this position. I have begun to build me a library. I saved the money I would have used in tobacco and other foolish things, and now I own quite a collection of books. I wish to thank you for those W. C. T. U. gospel sermons. They saved me to a sober and useful life."

One other incident to show how we may sow seed by the wayside:

Five white ribboners were on our way to a district W. C. T. U. convention. One of the brakemen looked uncommonly neat and well dressed. He stopped by the seats we were sitting in and addressed a pleasant word to us occasionally as he called out the stations. Finally he said: "Are you going to a convention?" We answered "Yes."

"Well," he said, "I should like to tell you a little story. Two years ago I drank hard, and my boss (the conductor) was going to turn me off if I had not quit, and I should not have quit if it had not been for a lady who wore the white ribbon like you. I guess the boss must have spoken to her, for he introduced me, and she chatted away about young men who were successful in life. This made me think how I had done. I had such a good father and mother in an eastern state. They trained me all right, but I came west to make my fortune. But I got in with wrong companions and got to drinking. When she was talking I thought of all this and how I had $65 a month wages and owed for my clothing, which was then seedy and worn out, badly in debt, and growing worse. She said it was a sad sight to see a strong young man give his all for a paltry glass of beer—his good name, his business, his chances for the future. I swore off then and there. I said I'd never go inside a saloon again, and, ladies, I've kept my pledge. I am out of debt. I wear good clothes. I am going to be married this fall and settle down. I have $400 in the bank toward my little home. So you see I honor the white ribbon and wear it. The boss is just as glad as I am, and he is a teetotaler."

I had taken out my pad and pencil and jotted it all down, when he looked at me, saying, "You were the lady that gave me the talking to."

Thus we sow and someone gathers the harvest. If our thousands of workers over the land could know of the many saved thru their efforts, how it would gladden their weary hours. Keep on sowing. God will find the harvest, and in his own time we shall know the good work done.

The Need of the Spirit.

By L. D. Dyer, National Evangelist.

THE great need of the church as well as individuals to-day in the work of the Master is the gift of the Holy Ghost. God's appointed way always being the best, Jesus tells his disciples in Luke 24:49; "But tarry ye in Jerusalem until ye be endowed with power from on high, or until ye receive your Pentecost, your fitting for the work that will be given you to do. Do not go in haste, but wait until I send you." They were converted and saved, but had not the power to cope with the adversary nor that intense desire for lost souls that a more perfect knowledge would give them.

In the past few days it has been my privilege to see timid, shrinking souls who had little courage to speak for Jesus, after receiving this baptism of the Spirit, daring to stand before a large congregation and boldly declare, "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." And when God had given them a clean heart, their first work almost invariably was to go out and try to bring others into the blessed experience. If we have not been accustomed to the work we will be surprised to find how many real hungry and thirsty ones there are. In Isa. 44:3 we find he is ready to enrich the needy ones. Water is typical of the Holy Spirit. As drooping nature is revived by a shower of refreshing rain after a severe drouth, just so our souls, which have been thirsting after God, have been refreshed by copious showers of divine grace. The question comes to us, Are we fitted to receive? If we are filled with the world to the extent that we have no room for Jesus, and our prayers have settled into a dull formality, we have great cause for alarm and need for self-examination. Neglect of prayer, craving more for the things of the world than for the unseen and hidden things of God, hide the Spirit from our gaze. Let us heed this command of God, "Be filled with the Spirit," and we will know there are results, whether we see them or not.

School Savings Banks.

AT the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention in Geneva a resolution was passed approving of thrift-teaching thru the School Savings Banks as a basic temperance measure and recommending that our unions employ more active measures to introduce it into all the schools within their reach in the world. Arrangements have been made for issuing leaflets on the subject in different languages, and I will be glad to hear from officers or members of unions in any country, whom I have not seen personally at Geneva, relative to this great and important work.

The Penny Bank is being employed as a method of teaching economy and self dependence in many parts of Great Britain, with fine results. In Bradford and some other cities the collections are taken in Sunday-schools as well as in the public schools. A superintendent of a Bradford Sunday-school told me he considered this penny saving of intrinsic value to the boys and girls, and that he himself kept their individual accounts.

A teacher, in a Paris public school, said, when I asked of its effect on the scholars there: "We don't raise children to be paupers. We teach them to save their pennies and help themselves. We have no poor-houses. Poverty and drunkenness go hand in hand." There is no better path to virtue and clean lives than that of trained honesty in the employment of time and money.

On shipboard, where I write this, I have read Dr. Smiles' excellent book on "Thrift," which I found in the library of the "Mesaba." He gives many instances of the advantages of early saving, one is: "When a Penny Bank was established in Putney and the deposits were added at the end of the first year, a brewer, who was on the committee, remarked, 'Well, that represents thirty thousand pints of beer not drunk'." Again he said: "Children have no inveterate habits of expenditure to get rid of; they can be taught economy just as they can be taught arithmetic. The standard of enjoyment of the man who saves and is self-respecting, just and generous, is high, while that of him who wastes in drink that always tends to brutalize him, is very low. Upon industry and frugality our well-doing depends. It is not great talents, but steady application that is required to lay up provision for a rainy day. The virtue of temperance is the direct result of saving pennies." I hope this book has place in many of our libraries, and that it will be generally and carefully read. It is a work of 380 pages, published in London.

Though it is now vacation let us remember that the autumn cometh soon, and by the time the schools open for the fall term, especially in the United States, have the school directors and teachers so fully informed on the advance and success of the School Savings Bank movement, that they will be ready to adopt it in their several districts. All the unions are cordially invited to make some appropriation for literature and see that it is carefully distributed to educators at summer meetings and at the coming teacher's institutes. Address Mrs. S. L. Oberholtzer, 1905 Tioga St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Work Among Miners.

DEAR CO-WORKERS:—Your superintendent has just returned from a three-months' trip in the west. I had a most delightful journey, visited five different states, forty-five towns, organized nine unions, gained 203 members and enrolled 100 names of those who are willing to receive and distribute literature for our department. Our white-ribboners are ever ready to help and full of enthusiasm and earnestness; truly these women of the West are doing a heroic work against great odds.

Now, dear superintendents, attention! Remember, the time is fast approaching when you will be called upon to report. Blanks will be sent out by September 15, and it is urged upon you as an important duty to report on time. To have an infinite capacity for taking pains and a lofty purpose withal will bring great success to our department. Nothing which has been done in the name of the Master and in humanity's cause is too small to report. Try it this year. Gather up the fragments, focus the items of interest, add the widely separated units of value with a determined effort to place Work among Miners in the front rank at our National Convention.

The new banner is in preparation and will be presented to the one sending the most complete report, if it is on time.

Organizers.

DEAR FRIENDS:—After a visit at home longer than usual I spent two weeks of March at work in the Thirtieth district of Missouri, visiting and strengthening the unions and holding some excellent meetings.

The first of April I commenced a five-weeks' campaign in Tennessee, that being my fifth visit to the state in the interest of the W. C. T. U. It was encouraging to find the unions more active than ever before, and the whole state aroused on the temperance question, in consequence of which very few towns now remain that have not voted saloons out.

Three new unions were organized, many new members secured, and at my last appointment, Union City, a very successful W. C. T. U. institute was held, and a large and elaborate reception was given in honor of the speaker.

After this, one week at home passed all too quickly, and again I was off, this time for Indiana. The state secretary, Mrs. Brand, accompanied me on a two-weeks' tour thru the southern part of the state and relieved me of the care of all business matters. I found this state also aroused, and closing saloons in many towns by means of the blanket remonstrance low. The most successful of many good meetings were held in Princeton on Sunday, when forty-nine new members were secured.

From Indiana to Maine was a long journey, but I was due in the latter state June 1, and arrived in Portland that day after a delightful ocean voyage from Boston. Since then I have been speaking constantly, and have attended six county conventions. Have visited cities, towns, and villages, have traveled by steam and electric cars, by stage and by boat, and with the exception of the fact that June was cold and rainy, I have found Maine altogether lovely. It is a joy nowhere to see the bold saloon sign and the flaunting beer and whisky advertisement. If liquor is sold it must be done secretly, in a way that offers none of the allurements of the licensed saloon. Laws are better enforced in many localities than ever before, and the people generally are determined to withstand all the efforts of the enemy to overthrow the law that has for fifty years protected the homes of the state.

My meetings as a general thing have been well attended, and pleasant features of them have been good music, floral decorations, and the reception of new members. I shall be in Maine until September 1, when I return home for a brief rest before going to North Dakota.

With loving greetings to all the white-ribbon comrades,

Yours for victory,

CARRIE LEE CARTER.

DEAR COMRADES: It is rarely I trespass on the space of THE UNION SIGNAL or the good nature of its editor. As a National lecturer and organizer it it my duty to say something of the work achieved. Brevity will, no doubt, be commended.

I gave six full months to Kansas, tho many appointments were made by the Rev. J. E. Everett, secretary Kansas State Temperance Union, yet in each instance the W. C. T. U., its work, general and special, were ever at the front. The bulk of time and labor was in the interest of state, district, county and local W. C. T. U. Mrs. E. P. Hutchinson, state president, district and county and local officers and members, with the indefatigable Mrs. Carrie Hill to make appointments that never clashed or miscarried, much profitable and thoro work was done.

I began the Kansas work Nov. 17 in Ford county and closed in Sedgwick county after the middle of May. Local unions were addressed, meetings incidental to our all-round work were held. Communities largely rural were visited. Lectures were given to large, very large, audiences in cities and villages. In one county, Montgomery, I organized four strong, efficient unions. Institutes in several counties were addressed. By invitation of many pastors pulpits were occupied morning and evening. Public schools came in for a share of attention. The Y. M. C. A. was always helpful. The Sunday-schools were never missed. Whenever duty called the response was made. The people were kind, hospitable, and generous. Never, anywhere, have we witnessed a more spantaneous spirit of cheer, enthusiasm, and hearty welcome.

I organized thirteen unions, several L. T. L's. and 300 active members were added to the roll. Over 2,000 total abstinence pledges were signed. I never missed an opportunity to vigorously present the claims of THE UNION SIGNAL, also the Messenger, the state paper. As a result of direct personal appeal Hoven, Reno Co., where I organized a union, ordered ten SIGNALS besides subscribing liberally for the state paper.

Since leaving home I traveled over 5,000 miles and not one appointment was lost by reason of illness. Good health, vigor of body, were vouchsafed me. I owe a debt of gratitude to our heavenly Father for his wonderful goodness. For all the White Ribboners I have a profound regard, and shall cherish memories sweet and precious.

W. C. T. U. Notes.

The union at Butler, Pa., is asking the city council for a curfew law.

Mrs. A. C. Zehner assisted in the prohibition campaign at Reagan, Tex.

Mrs. A. S. Benjamin, state president, addressed the Detroit union on "Our Work."

One of the streets of the Sulphur (N. M.), Chautauqua is called White Ribbon avenue.

Mrs. Frances Beauchamp, state president of Kentucky, spoke at Evansville, Ind., recently.

Fond-du-Lac and Green Lake counties will hold an inter-county convention at Milwaukee, Wis., August 11 and 12.

The Versailles, N. Y., union held an all-day meeting recently. Many interesting papers were read and dinner was served.

The evangelistic work was discussed by the Peru, Ind., union at a recent meeting. An interesting program was presented.

The three unions at Des Moines united with the one at Colfax in a picnic July 15. It was a most delightful occasion.

At the request of the management of the Bloomington, Ill., Chautauqua the Central union has charge of the sleeping tents and check-room.

A parliamentary drill, conducted by Mrs. Sloan, and a question box were on the program at the last meeting of the Homer, Mich., union.

The Batavia, Mich., union had a delightful lawn social not long ago. Twenty-one of the Coldwater white-ribboners were in attendance.

Chicago W. C. T. U. women have filed a protest with Mayor Harrison against the application of the Saddle and Cycle Club for a saloon license.

The union at Britt, Ia., entertained the mothers of the United Presbyterian church recently. A short program and refreshments was the order of the day.

The Guthrie, Oklahoma, union celebrated the July 4 Red Letter Day with a patriotic program. The meeting was largely attended, and five new members added.

The Fort Worth, Texas, union gave an interesting program with scientific temperance facts as the principal feature. Greater earnestness in studying the effects of tobacco was urged.

Mrs. Josephine Princell, a Scandinavian worker, has closed a month's work in the Fillmore-Houston district in Minnesota. Mrs. Princell was the first W. C. T. U. speaker in many of the places she visited. Two unions were organized.

There was a large attendance at the institute held in The Weirs, N. H. Miss Clara Rowell, editor of the "Granite State Outlook," was in charge of the question box. Mrs. Ada Wallace Unruh, National organizer, gave the evening address.

Rushford, the only Y in the Fillmore-Houston, Minn., district, entertained the district convention recently. The helpfulness of these girls was a constant object lesson to each delegate of the great need of more Y's to assist in carrying on our work.

Montgomery county, Md., held its annual convention at Rockville. Each of the eleven unions was represented. Mrs. Mary R. Haslup, state president, and Mrs. Margaret D. Ellis, National Superintendent of Legislation, were present and delivered addresses.

The union at Dubuque, Ia., inaugurated a crusade against indiscriminate shopping Saturday night and for chairs in stores for the use of the young women employes. The chairs are in place, so all effort will now be bent to stop the Saturday night shopping.

White ribboners of Des Moines and Colfax, Ia., united in entertaining several visiting representatives from nine eastern states. The meeting took the form of a picnic near Colfax. Mrs. Wickersham, of Ohio, gave an interesting Crusade talk and several selections from THE UNION SIGNAL were read.

The list of speakers for the W. C. T. U. Day at the Monteagle (Tenn.), Summer Assembly includes the names of Frances E. Beauchamp, Lide Merriweather, Mary Telford, and Lillie O'Daniel. Mrs. Silena Moore Holman, the state president, has charge of the day, which promises to be well filled with good things.

A reception was given by the Bay City, Mich., union to welcome home Mrs. Cornelia Moots and Mrs. C. C. Faxon from their field of labor in the Philippine Islands. Many friends and members of the union were present. Beautiful bouquets of roses and carnations were presented each guest of honor.

One hundred members and friends of the Shenandoah, Ia., union enjoyed its annual picnic recently. Work at the rescue homes in Omaha and Dubuque was reported, the L. T. L. work presented, a committee appointed to secure a framed picture of Miss Willard for the City Mission rooms, the W. C. T. U. work reviewed and six new members secured. The picnic dinner was a greatly appreciated feature of the day.

The West End union of Washington, D. C., held an interesting meeting at Smitholm, the suburban residence of Mrs. Clinton Smith, president of the district union. A letter was read from Miss Belle Pettigrew, who is now abroad, describing the good accomplished by the W. C. T. U. in foreign countries. The World's Convention was reported by Mrs. Grandfield and a recitation given by Myra Davis of the Anna Gordon Cradle Roll. Members of North Capital and Le Droit unions were present.

Mrs. G. H. Smith of Vancouver, B. C., formerly of North Carolina, has been working among the Scandinavians in Washington during the last few weeks. She organized an L. T. L. at Seattle and unions at Fairhaven, Everett and Tacoma. Mrs. Smith held many meetings, and without doubt a larger harvest will be reaped from the seed sowing. The Scandinavians know little of the work of the W. C. T. U., and are slow to move. One of the good pastors had never heard of the W. C. T. U.

The state convention of the New York L. T. L. was held in Hornellsville, July 6-8. It was an enthusiastic meeting and made a good impression upon the community. The state officers of the W. C. T. U. were present, and assisted in every way possible to make the convention a success. From the first evening, when a reception was given by the local legion, to the closing hour the reports, papers, and addresses were an inspiration to all. A grand gold medal contest was held the last evening, six contestants participating. The medal was awarded to Mr. W. C. Saunders of Tioga county. Two instructive papers were read by physicians of the city, one upon "Non-Alcoholic Medication," by Dr. I. Truman, and another by Dr. Clair Parkhill, upon "Surgical Treatment of Shock without Alcoholic Stimulants." Prominent discussion was given to the claims of the "Crusader Monthly" and the Required Readings were adopted. There were 152 graduates and 252 seals won.

The supreme court of New York has just decided the Clintondale liquor case in favor of the W. C. T. U. The village of Clintondale is in the town of Plattekill, which is a no-license town. The end of the street which passes thru the center of the village is in the town of Lloyd, which is a license town. Upon learning that John P. Auchmoody intended to conduct a hotel in the Lloyd end of the street the women of Clintondale purchased a small parcel of ground within 200 feet of the proposed hotel, upon which they erected a small frame dwelling in order to prevent Auchmoody from getting the consent of all the owners of property within that distance as required. In his application for a certificate Auchmoody claimed that he had obtained the necessary consents, and when the proceeding was commenced to revoke his certificate upon the ground that he had made false statements in his application, he contended that the house erected by the W. C. T. U. was a "spite" house, erected solely for the purpose of preventing him from getting a certificate and therefore did not come under the head of house property as contemplated in the liquor tax law.

Where the White Ribbon Has Gone.

By Ida May Grant.

A bow of simple white ribbon
Adorning a woman's dress—
What a symbol of aid and uplifting,
And of love and of helpfulness!

A bow of simple white ribbon
That is honored all over the land
As the emblem of woman's great mission
And the badge of the temperance band.

Yes, a magical power it has proven,
And beneficent uplift to all,
In palace and hovel and prison,
And in great legislative hall.

In court-room and general assembly
It has prayed for humanity's laws;
It has heeded the poor man's grievance
And espoused the laborer's cause.

It has entered the almshouse and prison
As an emblem of love and of light;
It has aided the poor and the needy,
And the victims of sin's fatal blight.

It has stooped to the outcast and drunkard,
To the youth on his fast downward course;
It has rescued the poor, fallen woman,
And redeemed her by magical force.

It has given its food to the hungry
And flowers to the sick and the sad;
It has awakened bright hopes for the hopeless,
And bid them rejoice and be glad.

Yet, this army of White Ribbon bearers
Has invaded e'en far-distant lands,
And established its schools and its missions,
And its Christian Temperance bands.

Its power has passed o'er the water;
Its magic is felt o'er the sea;
It has belted the earth with its blessings
Of faith, hope, and charity.

The Bible in the Kitchen.

THE Home Department of the Sunday-school is trying to do for busy housekeepers what this one did for herself. Her family was large and her "help" small. Some one asked her how she became so familiar with the Bible. The Christian Endeavor World gives her answer:

"You see I have a great deal of time to myself. After the children are started for school I am alone all day. And I know that at six o'clock there will be eleven hungry people who will look to me for a good dinner, so of course I have to spend a good deal of my time in the kitchen. Years ago I foresaw that the largest portion of my waking hours would have to be spent there, and I felt lonely and wanted a companion.

"So I covered my Bible with slate-colored cambric, and took it to the kitchen with me. After a while my husband put up a shelf on purpose for it, and made a little wire arrangement to hold it open, and we have had real good times together, my Bible and I. I can peep at a verse here and there, and keep thinking it over as I go about my work, and think of all the other verses I know that throw light on it.

"Ironing days are especially nice; it is long, slow work, you see, that doesn't take much thought, because I know exactly how to do it, and I can give my mind to some Bible subject that needs studying."

Promoted.

Mrs. Clara A. Babcock, president of the Derby, N. H., union, passed away July 2 after a long illness. Tho frail in body and a great sufferer she was an earnest and faithful worker, who will be greatly missed. It can truly be said "She hath done what she could."

The frail but ever busy hands of Mrs. Mary Whipple Smith, aged seventy-five years, mother of Mrs. Nora L. Brown, treasurer of the Berkshire county, Mass., W. C. T. U., were folded for her last sleep Thursday, June 23, 1903. Mrs. Smith was indefatigable in her efforts to promote our work thru the North Adams union of which she was a dearly loved member, and "the world is poorer for her home going."

"A Merry Heart Doeth Good."

By Nettie Barker Fernald.

"HOW are you to-night, Mrs. Yates?" The questioner was a bright, beautiful girl of twenty-four, and the question was addressed to a dear old lady whose age no one knew. She was too young in her ways to be called past sixty, yet there were tall, handsome grandchildren, and surely that fact implied that the years were advancing. It was prayer-meeting evening, and these two, the grandmother and the bright girl, were drawn together by that ever powerful magnet of love.

As the older held the hand of the younger and made a place by her side, the question came naturally:

"How are you to-night?"

"Half dead, thank you, my dear."

The cheery tone, in spite of the tired look, the fact that this faithful saint had come, so weary, to the prayer meeting, there to find refreshment of body and soul, changed the current of thought in the mind of the younger. She, too, was tired. She had gone to the meeting from a sense of duty. The pastor had urged a fuller attendance on the previous Sunday, and she had gone to please him. She looked into the face of her companion, which she had come to love and trust, and saw the lines of weariness flit away. The smile of greeting was so very bright, the pressure of the hand so strong, the tone of voice so buoyant, that had it not been for the brave acknowledgment of weariness, she could not have imagined there was any. But it was that frank avowal of a tired body that helped her most.

The sudden outburst, natural and unrestrained, was like a powerful tonic to the one who was making a brave fight against a tired feeling that would creep over at her at times and which she did not quite recognize as fatigue, but was beginning to imagine was something distinctly wrong with herself. The little laugh which she gave in reply, the chatty talk, the opening hymn,

"Day is dying in the west, Heaven is touching earth with rest"—

all this rested every nerve of her body.

The pastor chose for his Bible reading, "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." He spoke briefly about the physical need of rest and then of Christ's offer of spiritual rest to weary ones tired of sinning, tired of failures, tired of mistakes.

Then followed half an hour of singing, prayer, and informal talks. With a look of infinite peace and joy the dear saint rose and told how God had led her thru deep waters to perfect rest in Him. A brother across the room told of how God had helped him in his city office in the midst of its din and bustle. A banker rose, and his voice broke as he told how the peace of God had come to him on his way home as he stood and watched the glory of the sunset from the steamboat's deck and watched the colors reflected in the deep waters of the bay. Another told of help he was able to give to an errand boy by a word in season. A timid home-maker told of the sustaining power of the Divine Hand in that day's monotonous round of busy home work.

All these testimonies came with a restful joy to her whose experience was only that of one to whom the big, wide world was an unfathomable mystery. For her and others like her this mingling of religion and practice, this application of the gospel of Jesus Christ to everyday life, gave a nearness to the Father that the Bible reading alone that day had not done. Before the meeting closed she had added her word; it was not much, but the hand at her side reached out and took hers as she sat down, and a sweet voice said "Dear heart." Then she went home with the melody of the closing hymn still in mind:

"Now the day is over; night is drawing nigh;
Shadows of the evening steal across the sky.
Jesus grant the weary calm and sweet repose,
With thy tenderest blessing, may our eyelids close."

There was a new refrain after every verse and at its close. It was not the usual "Amen," and it sounded like "Dear heart, Dear heart." She went to sleep repeating the words. A rested toiler looked from her window that night upon the starlit sky and paused as she said, "They that trust in the Lord shall renew their strength. They shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, they shall walk and not faint." She thought of her young friend, and asked God to make the words true to her also, and then she slept peacefully, not knowing that she had in a way answered her own prayer and that God had used her as his instrument to put new strength and hope into another toiler's life.

The Man at the Oars.

THE rower shows a will;
The drifter, in his aimless craft, but shows
How indecision mars what might have been.
The rower will fulfill
A splendid promise into which he rows,
And every stroke announces he will win.

The rower holds his boat
Submissive to his will, and cuts the wave
Where'er his purpose laid the crystal path.
The drifter is afloat,
And with no certain landing but the grave,
He drifts into some nameless aftermath.

The rower builds great things
On some fair coast where hope has built before,
Where faith has laid the stones in colors fair.
The drifter outward swings;
Erects no future, wields no winning oar,
And is content with castles in the air.

The rower wins a place,
And makes the world his debtor while he lives;
And flags drop half-mast when he lies in death.
The drifter turns his face
To starless night, no farewell blessing gives,
And yields to bleak oblivion his breath.

All men must drift or row.
We build, we shape, we help, we bless mankind.
We raise our hats, we give the world a cheer,
Or, aimless, drift below.
Impart no blessing and no blessing find,
And leave no reason for our sojourn here.

No son of man can drift
Into the stormless city of our King,
Or reach the haven on the other side
By Faith's strong arms we lift
Each flashing oar, and, stroke on stroke, we bring
Our homeward boat across the crystal tide.

How Shall We Solve the Problem of the Drink Evil?

By Mary A. Livermore, in The Chicago American.

THE day has gone by when it is necessary to apologize for the entrance of women into the temperance reform, or to argue in favor of it, for it is conceded that women as well as men have a vital interest in all that concerns mankind. The pleas of ignorance, helplessness and occupation in other pursuits no longer excuse them from lending a hand in some department of the multiform work of the age which aims at the world's regeneration.

I shall take time to prove the statement that human progress finds its greatest hindrance and human happiness its most relentless foe in the love of strong drink which curses the world. The reports that come from prisons, poorhouses, and insane asylums, the statistics of the bureaus of labor and health, the records of the courts and the columns of the daily newspapers all tell the same story with painful and wearisome reiteration. The English House of Commons a few years ago appointed a "Royal Commission of Inquiry," which made a "careful and cautious summing up of the effects of intemperance" in England. The results were as follows:

1. Nine-tenths of the paupers. 2. Three-fourths of the criminals. 3. One-half the disease. 4. One-third of the insanity. 5. Three-fourths of the depravity of children and youth. 6. One-third of the shipwrecks and fatal accidents.

A similar "Commission of Inquiry," appointed in our country, if it did its work faithfully and honestly, would reveal equally startling facts, for the use of intoxicants is at war with the best interests of society in all directions, and crime and pauperism, disease, imbecility and insanity, youthful depravity and casualty are always and everywhere the evil fruitage of intemperance.

There is needed to workers in the temperance reform an unshaken and ever-present faith in God, and that He works for righteousness; a conviction that whoever stands for the right and opposes the wrong is a co-worker with God, and takes on something of His omnipotence, and can never, therefore, be ultimately defeated.

With faith of this heroic kind it is possible to work in this most discouraging of all reforms steadily and without depression, sure of the ultimate victory.

What are the underlying causes of intemperance?

1. An inherited appetite for strong drink, which when uncontrolled develops into an insatiable mania for intoxicants. 2. The use of food that is too stimulating. 3. The social drinking customs of society, especially among the better classes. 4. The wretched condition of the lower classes and the barrenness of their homes and lives, which drive them to the saloon for pleasurable excitement. 5. The carelessness in physicians in prescribing alcoholic beverages to patients and the immense use of those "patent medicines" whose chief ingredient is some kind of intoxicant, and which are self-prescribed for every ailment. 6. The legalization of the liquor traffic, which throws around it the sanction of law, gives it power and prestige, and debauches the public conscience as well as private morals.

What can women do, and how shall they cope with these agencies of ruin?

They must first make themselves right by adopting total abstinence as the law of their lives. Alcoholic liquors must be banished from sideboard and kitchen and relegated to their proper place—the shelf of the druggist or the laboratory of the chemist.

They have begun this wise instruction in the public schools of the land most admirably. Under the indomitable leadership of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has procured the passage of laws in the Union compelling instruction in the physical ruin wrought by these agents. In some states the laws are equal to the emergencies of the situation, and children are taught scientifically that drunkenness is a disease as well as a sin; that the reformation of the inebriate may be thoro and permanent, but that no moral or religious agency can efface from his body and brain the physical results of alcoholic indulgence. In other states these laws lack force, because it has not been possible to induce legislators to attach a penalty for neglect or violation of them.

But the work is begun, the textbooks are in general circulation, and educators are awaking to the importance of this new instruction. The women behind the movement have undertaken it as a life work, and are certain to enlarge their operations with more knowledge and wisdom as they proceed. And ere long the community will be as well informed concerning the laws of heredity that relate to drunkenness and the physiological effects of alcohol as they now are concerning the laws that govern consanguineous marriages.

The temperance question is a large part of the labor question. The complaint of the laboring man that he fails to receive a fair share of the wealth he helps to create is undeniably true; and when his scanty earnings are diminished by the waste of intoxicants, destitution and wretchedness are certain to overwhelm both himself and family. His personal loss is a double one, for he not only drinks up his wages, but thereby diminishes his productive ability and reduces his value as a workman. He soon takes a low place in the working world and must be content with smaller wages. In the protracted conflict between labor and capital, which is not likely to terminate in the near future, there is a favorable outlook. The great chiefs of the labor reform are mainly temperate men, and strenuous in their advocacy of total abstinence. Clearness of brain and calmness of temper are essential to the success of the toiling masses in their unequal struggle with capital, and they begin to see it. Nothing would so add strength to their cause as a genuine temperance revival in their ranks which would commit them to a total abstinence from drink and lead them to the advocacy of prohibition. "An army with banners" would not re-enforce them more powerfully.

If in addition there could be established for them coffee houses, modeled after the English plan, where a good lunch could be purchased cheaply, where the tea, coffee, and cocoa should be of the best, where rooms were provided for social purposes as well as for public entertainment, with lavatories and other conveniences attached, where they could be accompanied by their families, under certain necessary restrictions, they would prove powerful rivals to the saloon, with its gross pleasures, and would eventually react on the poverty-stricken homes.

Alas, women are powerless to repeal the laws which sanction and protect the drink traffic. They are the greatest sufferers from its ravages, but no redress is afforded them. Illiterate foreign peasants, who cannot read, write, or understand the English language, and whose moral sense is deadened by alcoholic indulgence and by an appetite inherited from generations of brutish ancestors, are marshaled to the polls by tens of thousands to cast their votes in favor of the saloon, the brewery, and the distillery.

But the self-governed, Christian, cultivated women of the land, its wives and mothers, are denied the right to a voice or a vote in the settlement of the mighty question. Sooner or later in our country all political conviction crystallizes into ballots, and because women are refused their power of expression they work at a great disadvantage. What shall they do?

Let them be prompt to recognize not only those individuals but those political parties which take a stand for prohibition, tendering them, if they will, "their sympathies and prayers." But let them stand firmly aloof from alliance with any and all and seek the ballot for themselves.

For the ballot in the hands of woman will soon prove the most powerful enginery for temperance reform that the world has ever seen. Prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages can never be accomplished and enforced except by aid of women's votes, and the day that witnesses their enfranchisement will behold the beginning of the end. The temperance work of women is now educational, and covers the whole field. It is a preparation for the other work on which they are to enter in the not far remote future, and that will be constructive, legislative, and judicial.

Mrs. Frances G. Curtis, of Boston, said at the meeting of the National Association of Charities and Corrections recently held in Atlanta, Ga., that she believed it more important to prevent men from becoming tramps than to try to make them good citizens after they are tramps. Mrs. Curtis suggests a new phase of the study of civics when she says: "It is the women of the country who make the tramps by giving meals to them. If our women's clubs in all parts of the country would take up this question and discuss it, I believe that much good would result."

The Mayor of Oneida, N. Y., has appointed Miss Florence Kirkpatrick one of five library trustees, who are to erect and afterwards manage the new Carnegie library in that city. Following his example, the mayor of Toledo, Ohio, appointed Mrs. Bissell, a prominent club woman, to membership on the Board of Library Trustees. This appointment, however, met with some opposition, the Attorney General's office even declaring the appointment illegal under the charter of Toledo. Clubwomen and others are making an earnest effort to have the appointment sustained.

The Articulation of Our Public and Sunday Schools.

By Nannie E. Newman.

ALL those who have taught in our Sunday-schools know of the lamentable ignorance of high school graduates regarding Biblical history, geography and literature, although such knowledge is absolutely necessary to an understanding of poetry, sculpture and much of our best literature.

Mythology and Grecian and Roman history are a part of the curriculum of all four-year courses in our high schools, yet they are no more necessary to a proper appreciation of literature than are incidents of Biblical lore.

I was once assisting a fourth-year girl with her lesson on a noted poem in which a reference was made to Abraham's sacrifice. The child had never heard of it, while her classmates had heard the names of Abraham and Isaac, but could not tell whether Isaac was Abraham's father or his son.

I believe nearly all educators agree that a knowledge of the Bible is absolutely necessary to an appreciation of poetry and the ordinary English literature of the most casual reader. The only real reason given for its not being in our school course is the supposed liability to sectarianism and the overcrowded condition of the school course. But, Christian men and women, "The remedy is nigh thee, even in thy hand," a school for the purpose, under church control, even now attended by a large body of the school children—our Sunday-schools—and only awaiting articulation with our day schools to make them centers of real education and of permanent benefit to the mass of our people.

Why do not all Christian people make an earnest effort to require a certain amount of Bible knowledge from those who pass from one department of our public schools to another, with the understanding that the instruction for that branch is to be secured at the various Sunday-schools or at home, as may be desired? Such a course would be an inestimable benefit to the Sunday-schools themselves, developing a better system of teaching and a course of Bible study that would equip a young person with an intelligent Christian scholarship, enabling him to appreciate the beauties of nature, art, sculpture and literature. This method would take the place of desultory, inane skipping over the Holy Book as if it were a briar patch.

The institution of grades in the Sunday-school would be a spur in securing interest, attendance and endeavor, and attendance now is sadly lacking in our Sunday-school work.

As each pupil passes from the primary to the intermediate department, a certain amount of Biblical knowledge should be required, such as knowing the Lord's Prayer and a few leading events in the life of Christ; then the next step would require a study of Genesis, with as thorough a knowledge of it as of United States history, while during the high school years history and incident of the best Book should become familiar to all who seek to complete a course. Then will the God who has promised that "His word shall not return unto Him void" raise up a generation who truly "know" their God.

Hugh Brotherton, Curate.

to our meeting may be the device of an individual whose own unhappy weakness renders any evidence from such a quarter—"

Hugh rose suddenly, and strode to the front of the platform.

"For God's sake, don't let us bring another name into the scandal. I am ready to answer—"

"Brayvo! brayvo!" shouted a stentorian voice from the other end of the room. "After all, aren't he the one to say whether or no he'll gi'e an answer to them questions, whatever they may be. Speak oop, sir!"

The solicitor sat still in his chair, and Rose involuntarily drew a quick breath.

"I am ready," said Hugh slowly, "to answer any questions that Mr. Light may think fit to put to me."

"Nay, lad—sir, beggin' your pardon," said Enoch deprecatingly. "For that matter, there aren't no sort o' fitness in it; but, accordin' to the wishes of a true friend, I would like to give ye this opportunity o' clearin' yoursen from the wicked insinooations of some enemy unknown. I do not say as it's either necessary or desirable that ye should answer to each one o' these onseemly questions, as if ye was on your trial before us, which God forbid! I'll just read them off to ye as they stand; and it will be enough for us, as knows and loves ye well, to hear one big 'No' at the end— not to satisfy us as is satisfied already, but by way of an answer to them as has had the heart to plot agen your good name."

"Brayvo! brayvo! Right you are, Enoch! Go it, old 'un!" echoed from various parts of the room.

"Once more, I protest," interrupted Mr. Boyd firmly, "that this interruption of our meeting is not only unseemly—"

"It's too late to stop it now, anyway," said an impatient voice. "Let Enoch ask his questions, and ha' done wi' it. We'll let Mr. Brotherton know what we thinks about it later on."

"Let him go on," whispered Hugh desperately, under cover of the voice. "It's all up with me now, anyway." He turned his face resolutely to Enoch, and nerved himself to meet what was coming.

Enoch cleared his throat tremulously. "On your sacred word of honor, are you truly the abstainer you profess to be?" read Enoch, and looking over his spectacles to add: "Don't make no sort of answer till I get to the end."

Cries of "Shame!" and hisses, mingled with ironical laughter, had broken out in every part of the room; and in the excitement it was not generally noticed that Hugh's eyes, gleaming dark out of a deathly pale face, held Enoch's as if by some spell. Rose noted it, and, as it seemed to her, for the first time an icy fear crept round the old man's heart. Slowly he withdrew his eyes, and fixed them upon his "document" as if dazed. The paper rustled between his trembling fingers.

"'Is it not a fact that, for months at least, you have indulged in secret drinking?'"

Amidst an angry storm of groans and hisses, the poor old man lifted his eyes shrinkingly to Hugh's, and his face grew rigid.

"'Are you not, in fact, that confirmed drunkard and hypocrite whose disgraceful history you once related?"

The question was asked falteringly, with manifest effort; and amidst renewed disorder, the old man and the young looked each other in the eyes. Then, with a gesture that commanded silence, and with fingers that trembled, Enoch folded the paper and deliberately tore it, across and across again, in the sight of the whole room.

Hugh could bear it no longer. "Do you wish me to answer the question now?"

His voice sounded unnatural and strange, and the pallor of his face was noticed at last with indignant sympathy.

"Not yet—not yet; wait a bit, lad."

Enoch turned slowly to the excited audience, and his face looked strangely flushed.

"Friends," he said thickly, "there he stands! The lad who, in the providence of God, has done more for Pitsmoor than any other man in livin' memory. You know whether or not I'm tellin' God's truth when I say that he, and no other, has been the instrument used for the conversion of the ungodly, and for the edifyin' of the saints of the Almighty. I have read out them questions at the request of one who professes to be a true friend, and he's willin' to return his answer. Ye've heard him say so. I put it to ye once for all. Is it your will that them shameful questions should be answered by him to you and me?"

The question was evidently unexpected, but the answer came with one consent.

"No!" burst in one concentrated roar from the excited crowd.

"No! no! no!" shouted Sam Widgery, in a frenzy.

"No! ye old fool!" growled Tummas Windle from his post in front of the platform.

Enoch grasped the table by which he stood as if to steady himself.

"Have a bit o' patience, friends. We mun tak' thought to what we're doin'. Pitsmoor has got this here p'int to deal with, this night, once for all. If there's a grown-up body here present, be it man or woman, as hankers arter Mr. Brotherton's answer to them questions, let him or her stand oop and say so now before us all, or" Enoch's voice grew terrible in its intensity—"let him hereafter, forever, hold his peace."

In the absolute and impressive stillness that succeeded to the solemn cadences of the old man's tones, one swift interlude occurred. The tall stranger made as if to rise from his seat, and that instant Rose convulsively clutched his arm. When, however, he turned to look her in the face, her stony gaze was fixed upon the platform.

Enoch turned his eyes slowly on Dr. Mann.

"Tak' notice," he said solemnly; "that's Pitsmoor's answer, once for all, to the party as wanted them questions put. Will ye kindly undertake to have it delivered in the proper quarter?"

The request was unanimously seconded by a frantic burst of applause, and in the excitement of the moment, it was not noticed that Enock sank, as if stricken, into his chair.

Hugh seemed about to speak, but Mr. Boyd rose hastily to his feet.

"My friends, you have returned a dignified and well-deserved rebuke to an anonymous—"

An exclamation of dismay from those behind caused him to turn sharply round.

Domestic Assistants.

By Dora E. Millard.

Perhaps the most important problem yet unsolved in woman's world is how to obtain sufficient and capable domestic service. Housework is not so laborious, the pay is better, and, in the majority of cases, the surroundings are more congenial than work in a factory; yet where one woman is ready to do the former there are hundreds eager for the latter occupation.

There are, no doubt, several reasons why laboring women object to earning their livelihood by doing housework, but the appellation "servant girl," has much to do, we believe, with the distaste for this employment.

The fact is, American womanhood has been elevated; not alone the woman of wealth or of intellect, but woman in the broadest, fullest sense. She who keeps the house tidy for her wealthy or busy neighbor has the same rights to dignity as the man who serves his employer in the shop, who caters to his customer at the counter, or who serves his country in a political office. One is no more a servant than are the others; yet the statesman, the lawyer, or the butcher would be astonished were he habitually designated by that appellation.

The question is, why should one who does housework be stigmatized by the humiliating epithet? It certainly is not because of the unimportance of the vocation, for what could compensate for the loss of a well-regulated, cleanly home and properly cooked food? One may be served acceptably and graciously by one's political representatives, the wheels of justice and social ethics may be manipulated by the hand of skill; but if the home, the hotel, the boarding house is devoid of comfort, the effort to maintain other requisites of a desirable existence may be compared to the grim task of buying finery for the dead.

It is not that the calling is conceded as unimportant, or that skill in the employment is unappreciated, but that the work is regarded as menial, and, circumstances having combined to lift woman to a higher plane, no educated American woman will take a step downward from that place willingly.

And indeed, why should we ask it when it is just as easy to elevate our conception of the work? If this were done, and the ignominious title discarded, so that woman could maintain her self-respect as when engaged in other pursuits, the time would not be far hence when she would prefer making a study of domestic science to obtain employment in the home, rather than subsist on the pittance paid for factory labor.

Amusing Mixed Metaphors.

"The glorious work will never be accomplished until the good ship 'Temperance' shall sail from one end of the land to the other, and with a cry of 'Victory!' at each step she takes, shall plant her banner in every city, town, and village in the United States."

An Irishman in the midst of a tirade against landlords and capitalists, declared that "if these men were landed on an uninhabited island, they wouldn't be there half an hour before they would have their hands in the pockets of the naked savages."

A lecturer at a big meeting gave utterance to the following: "All along the untrodden paths of the future we can see the hidden footprints of an unseen Hand."

"We pursue the shadow, the bubble bursts, and leaves the ashes in our hands!"

An orator at one of the university unions bore off the palm of merit when he declared that "the British lion, whether it is roaming the deserts of India or climbing the forests of Canada, will not draw in its horns nor retire into its shell."

"One of our cars ran over another man last night," announced the superintendent of the street-railway line.

"Well," replied the president, "after a while the people will learn that the only safe place is aboard the car, and that five cents is a small price to pay for safety."—Chicago Post.

Protest Against Opium Traffic.

NEW YORK, July 21.—Interesting correspondence has been sent to President Roosevelt by one of his most intimate friends in New York, David Stuart Dodge. Mr. Dodge is president of the National Temperance Society, and it is said that his influence had much to do with the action of the president in opposing the wishes of Secretary of War Root, who desired the government to legalize the sale of opium in the Philippines.

It is said that Mr. Root declared that if his wishes were not carried out in the matter, as he believed that it was for the best interest of the soldiers as well as the natives of the Philippines, he would resign. His recent visit to President Roosevelt at Oyster Bay is said to have been in relation to the opium bills. On July 15 it was cabled from Manila that both opium bills had been tabled by the Manila commission pending an investigation which is to be made of the plan carried out by other countries in selling opium.

President Roosevelt, it is said, opposed the legalizing of the sale of opium in any way, but the army influences and Governor Taft of the Philippines, it is expected, will endeavor to secure action in congress over the President's veto, if necessary. The letter of David Stuart Dodge, which it is supposed influenced the President to take the stand he did in regard to the opium bills, is as follows:

"At the request of the board of managers of the National Temperance society I beg to lay before you their respectful remonstrances against the proposed method of regulating the opium traffic in the Philippine Islands.

"We fully appreciate the desire of the government to suppress in a large degree the use of this drug; but as it is a question of humanity and public morals as well as of revenue, and as it involves our national responsibility to an ignorant and dependent people, we venture to believe you will welcome an expression of popular opinion upon a subject in which all are now deeply interested. No one questions the wide and inevitable injury to any race or country where opium is more or less habitually consumed. This is manifestly the case in the Philippines.

"We submit that the regulation proposed by the commission is inadequate, impracticable, impolitic and immoral.

"To place the exclusive right to sell in the hands of the highest bidder at public auction, even under the restrictions enumerated, all tend to increase the trade and profits. That its use can be confined to a certain class, of a given age, and of one race is incredible; that it will demoralize, impoverish and destroy the industrial usefulness, if not the lives, of those who take it, cannot be denied; and that it is a recognition and encouragement by the government of an openly declared vice, is made plain by the nature of the contract; while an endeavor to palliate the wrong by offering to devote the income from such a source to foster certain educational objects is almost an insult to the public conscience.

"We hold that the traffic, necessary for medicinal and special purposes, should be conducted solely by responsible and salaried public officials who have no temptation to stimulate consumption or evade detection. For every class of the population the policy should be exclusion and suppression

"This policy has been successfully adopted by Japan. The opposite course in India has brought some revenue but also ruin to extensive sections of the land and the population, and lasting dishonor to the British name. Any revenue we might derive from the traffic would inevitably be small, and the evil engendered immeasurably great. It is unworthy of our nation and its Christian civilization to sanction a business which means acknowledged injury to so many; and a legal permission for some one to indulge in such a drug will only increase smuggling for the benefit of others.

"We have a treaty with China in which we agree not to connive at the importation of opium into that country, where it has proved so widely destructive. Why should we make public provision to sell it to Chinamen in our own possessions?

International arbitration envoys from the French Chamber of Deputies visit England, and the diminution of armament is discussed by leaders of the two nations.

Hundreds of college men, lured to Kansas by the hope of profitable employment in the harvest fields, fail to find work, and are stranded and looked upon as tramps.

Sam Davey, a thirteen year old Chicago lad, saved seven men from drowning July 19. Their sail boat had been upset in a squall in Silver Lake, and the boy-hero went out in a frail rowboat to their rescue.

Cassius M. Clay, the famous Kentuckian, passed away July 2 at the age of 93. He occupied a conspicuous place in public life, having been minister to Russia under Lincoln, a prominent abolitionist and author.

The Epworth League of the M. E. Church held its sixth International Convention in Detroit, Mich., July 17-19. The attendance was estimated at 23,000, the largest in the history of this great young people's society. The enthusiasm of the great assembly was commensurate with its size. The keynote of the convention was "Waiting, Witnessing, Working," and the program was a splendid exposition of these essential elements in Christian life. It was a splendid success in every way. The next convention will be held in Denver in 1905.

FOREIGN.

China refuses to open ports in Manchuria.

James McNeill Whistler, a celebrated American artist, died in London June 17.

King Edward and Queen Alexandria visit Dublin and are enthusiastically welcomed by the Irish people.

Forty thousand workman are on a strike at Baku, Russia. Everything is at a standstill but a few bakeries.

Saloonists are Beaten.

WABASH, July 20.—The fight against the three saloonkeepers for renewal of their licenses, which has kept 200 citizens of North Manchester here the past week, ended Saturday evening when the commissioners held the remonstrance which contained nearly 700 names, a majority of all the voters in Chester township, good, and denied the licenses. It was one of the hottest fights of the kind that ever took place here. Two applicants for license in the same place are already filed for next month, when the fight, which is made under the blanket remonstrance section of the Nicholson act, will be renewed.

A New Ally.

The disorderly saloon must face a new enemy in Indiana. If the purposes of the Brewers' Association do not miscarry not many months will pass before the state is freed from objectionable places.

The Indianapolis brewers met recently at the Claypool hotel, preparatory to the trip of the members to Chicago to attend the semi-annual meeting of the Indiana association. This meeting was changed to Chicago in order that the Chicago brewers who sell in Indiana could discuss the plans against the disorderly saloon with the Indiana brewers. The Indianapolis brewers went to Milwaukee, where they held a similar meeting, with the representatives of the Pabst, Schlitz, Miller and Blatz breweries.

"We are preparing to eliminate the discreditable saloon," said President Joseph C. Shaf. "One of the evils which we recognize in the beer business is the saloon that is not run on decent lines. The best way to deal with it, the just way, is to cut it out."

Prohibition in the South.

The facts printed recently concerning the progress of the prohibition movement in the South will undoubtedly surprise persons who have not kept in touch with the developments. Usually much more is heard of the troubles the Prohibitionists have had in Maine and Vermont than of their successes elsewhere.

Ten of the southern states are shown to have local option laws, under which, apparently, a majority of the counties or cities, as the case may be, have adopted total prohibition, and many others have put stringent restrictions on the sale of liquors.

The figures for the total number of saloons in the southern states as compared with New York, which are furnished by Secretary Alonzo E. Wilson of the Prohibition state committee, tell well the story of progress. Fourteen southern states, with a combined population of about 20,400,000, have 27,000 saloons, or about one for 750 inhabitants. New York, with a census population of 7,268,000, has 34,000 saloons, or one for 214 inhabitants.

The explanation of this progress in the South as given by the Prohibitionist leaders is that the planters cannot avoid recognizing that the negroes became much more peaceable and much more easily controlled when they are kept away from liquor. Prohibition is such an unmistakable aid to law and order that in several states hopes are good for the passage of state prohibition laws.—Record-Herald, Chicago.

Dr. G. L. Tufts, has been appointed superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League work in Oregon.

A determined effort is being made by the police of Indianapolis, Ind., to rid the city of all slot machines.

The annual Methodist conference in the Maritime Provinces took strong ground against political corruption and in favor of prohibition.

All the saloons in Pike county, Ind., having been closed, the State Temperance League is now taking up the fight against the saloons in Dubois county.

Two hundred and twenty-five delegates were present at the state temperance convention in Virginia. Encouraging reports were received from forty-five counties.

A crusade against the saloon keepers who sell to habitual drunkards has been started in Marinette, Wis. Notices have been posted in the saloons and Sheriff Setright says arrest will follow any violations of the law.

At the synod of the Reformed Church of America, held in Asbury Park, N. J., resolutions were passed denouncing the Mormon church and protesting against the continuance of Reed Smoot in office as United States senator.

The last session of the Wisconsin legislature passed a law giving the health department of each city control over the baby farms. The work is inaugurated in Milwaukee, and reform methods will be established.

Franklin, Tenn., has a committee of twenty-five which is watchful in suppressing the liquor traffic. Having learned that the court house was used as a storage place for liquor the sheriff was formally requested to abate the nuisance.

The temperance people of Columbus, Ind., are rejoicing over the action of the city council, which confines the saloons to a limited district. The action will close two large beer gardens, both owned by the Indianapolis Brewing Company.

Professor Wiley, of the Agricultural Department at Washington, D. C., is to conduct a careful test as to the effect of different brands of tobacco, cigars, or cigarets on the human system. Prof. Wiley has just concluded tests for adulteration of food.

The Finnish National Brothers Temperance Association has just held its meeting in Ishpeming, Mich. The organization is established in twenty-two states.: It was organized in 1888, and now has a membership of about 13,000. One feature of the convention was a concert, the proceeds of which were devoted to the Finnish college at Hancock.

John Schact, a lumberman of Minnesota, who has been under treatment for alcoholism, has been taken to Minneapolis, that his disease may be clinically considered. Mr. Schact is turning black in patches all over his body. On his face there is a black spot the size of a man's hand. Physicians claim the discoloration is the effect of whisky drinking, and the patient thinks it is caused by the inordinate consumption of a certain brand of tobacco.

T. W. Glover, of Auckland, New Zealand, has been lecturing in Minneapolis, Minn. He thinks prohibition works better and is growing more rapidly in his country than ours. He is touring the United States and Canada, South Africa, Ceylon and India in the interests of temperance. He has already been twice around the world. His especial object in the present trip is to study the latest temperance methods used in Canada. Mr. Glover is a fervent believer in the ultimate success of the advanced system of legislation adopted in his colony. There, he says, are none such as would be considered in America as wealthy men, and there are none of the very poor. The old-age pension of $2 a week for men and women over 65 years of age he thinks a splendid institution, tho he is not sure that the law might not be improved in its details. There has not been a strike there for at least six years. Mr. Glover attributes much of the excellent law-making of recent years in that colony to the enfranchisement of women, who may vote at all elections.

Publishers' Notes.

"How to do the Work," is a new edition (the 4th) of Dr. Purington's Manual in the department of Health and Heredity. Its 12 pages cover the general subject under the headings, "First Works," "Suggestive Outlines," "Topics for Study," "Books and Other Literature," the latter including a comprehensive list of helpful publications, leaflets, magazines and books, and the publishers thereof. No worker can afford to be without this epitome of work—the best in its line, said Frances Willard. Price 5 cents each.

An Inspiring Booklet.

No more tender tribute to Miss Willard was ever penned than is found in "Frances E. Willard's Message to the Womanhood of the Age," by Rev. Frank M. Bristol, D. D., of Washington, D. C. Having been a pupil of Miss Willard, at the Northwestern University, in Evanston, Dr. Bristol speaks with knowledge of her wonderful life and its value to the world. Place the booklet in the hands of your friends, reserving a copy for your own desk, that her "message" may often inspire you. Only a limited number of copies are left. Price 15 cents.

Nineteen Beautiful Years.

This sweet story of the life of Miss Willard's sister Mary loses none of its original interest with the passing years. The new edition, just issued, is one of the most attractive ever published; its delicate binding of blue and gold exceedingly appropriate.

Wonderfully true are the words of John G. Whittier, who said:

"The impression made upon me by the perusal of the first edition of this little book has not been weakened by the lapse of time. It seems to me now, as it did then, a very sweet and tender record of the exceptionally beautiful life of a young woman, whose rare natural gifts and graces were sanctified by a deep, but cheerful and healthful, religious experience, free from cant, affectation, or bigotry. It is an attractive picture of the 'sweet reasonableness' of Christian development—a lovely human character flowering into the beauty of holiness." Price postpaid 60 cents.

Organization and the Memorial Fund.

Organization is the keynote of the temperance reform, and most exhaustively has Mrs. S. M. D. Fry, our National corresponding secretary, written on the subject of "Organization and the Memorial Fund" in the July responsive reading, which is of interest to every white-ribboner. Valuable information and data about W. C. T. U. organization and the why and how of the Memorial Fund are given. It will greatly help our work if each union thoroly understands the facts so clearly presented. This reading should be given careful study by every member of the W. C. T. U. and the topic taken as a subject for a regular meeting of the local union. Price per hundred 50 cents.

Chalk Talking Made Easy.

In "Blackboard Helps for Loyal Temperance Legions," by Mrs. Linnie Gee Finney, we have twelve striking lessons on alcohol and tobacco. The page outline given for each lesson can be easily transferred to the blackboard by one little skilled in drawing. Opposite each picture we find appropriate questions, suggesting the talk which should accompany the use of the illustrations. This is a book needed by every leader of a Legion. The suggestions will be valuable to those who prepare blackboard lessons for Sunday schools and other societies. Price 25 cents.

A Well-Equipped and Brilliant Leader.

(Special Correspondence.)

San Francisco, Cal., July 28.—Mrs. Mae M. Whitman is the accomplished state superintendent of the department of Temperance and Labor for California, and the Associate upon whom the National superintendent, Mrs. Stuckenburg, left the care of her work, when she went abroad.

MRS. MAE WHITMAN.

Mrs. Whitman has been identified with this department in California for some years, dividing its honors only with the Evangelistic department, of which she is the consecrated superintendent in the large and important county of Santa Clara.

She has made a profound study of the vexed problems of labor and capital, and has that rare qualification for leadership, the combination of radical principles with conservative methods. Believing that reforms must move slowly and can only move surely thru the intelligence of their promoters, Mrs. Whitman has given much care and thought to the education of the people in their homes.

Every phase of the labor question is familiar to her, and she is equipped for its discussion, while her modest, winsome manner is so contradictory to the type expected of women who take up this cause, that it is realized at once that her victories will be moral and intellectual. Her many papers read before state and county conventions are always valuable. The work is indebted to her for the preparation of several platform exercises elucidating her department, one of which has been published by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association as a Responsive Reading. "A Lesson in Economics, or a Glimpse of New Zealand through a Postoffice Window," is a bright dialogue written by Mrs. Whitman for the use of our unions, serving the double purpose of instruction and entertainment.

The women of California who know her so well take great pleasure in assuring the readers of The Union Signal that her appointment as associate superintendent was eminently fitting. She is one in whom all hearts may safely trust.

Great Summer Gatherings in the Old Bay State.

Louise E. Purington, M. D., Correspondent.

Boston, Mass., July 31.—Thirty thousand teachers, representing 480,000 in the United States, have considered their calling in all its aspects at the great meeting of the National Educational Association in Boston and gone on their summer way. If the subject of scientific temperance instruction in the public schools was considered, your reporter was unable to find the time and place. An adjourned meeting from Arlington Street Church to Howard Medical College upon laboratory methods in the teaching of physiology threw little light upon this subject—indeed, was quite beyond the reach of the primary or grammar grades in appliances used. The "Conference on Home Economics," the position of "Hygiene" in elementary education, "Child Study," the "Indian Problem," and the "Negro" were subjects considered at length, and none could be more important. One of the speakers said: "The United States Government is now spending more for the study of fish and reindeer alone than upon children."

Three weeks of July have been consumed by the Emerson Memorial School and addresses given daily at Concord and at Huntington Hall, Boston.

W. C. T. U. matters as such are in the lull. Massachusetts' president, Katharine Lente Stevenson, is still abroad fulfilling engagements in England. The corresponding secretary, Mrs. H. T. Todd, is taking her vacation in the vicinity of New Bedford, looking out to sea and plunging into it to "drive dull care away."

Mrs. Helen G. Rice—if she takes a vacation nobody knows it.

The editor of "Our Message" is in the heart of the White Mountains.

Mrs. Mary G. Stuckenberg is still abroad, in Switzerland, gathering courage and poise to face the lonely home-coming.

Mrs. Mary H. Hunt has returned greatly cheered by her attendance upon the Bremen Congress, also by the reception her work received at Geneva.

Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden is at her summer home in the Holderness region of New Hampshire, from whence she heeds calls out into the field of work.

Elizabeth P. Gordon went from the World's Convention to Biarritz, and is for the present with her sister, Mrs. Alice Gordon Gulick.

The Frances E. Willard settlement has its summer rest in a cottage at Halifax—a free loan by its owner, Miss Mary J. Canforth.

The summer interests will culminate at the New England Inter-State Institute, to be held at Old Orchard, Me. (near Portland), August 11, 12, 13.

Women Inspectors Will Be Appointed.

Secretary Cortelyou Notifies Mrs. Ellis of the Government's Decision in the Matter.

Margaret Dye Ellis, Correspondent.

Newark, N. J., August 1.—The following letter from Secretary Cortelyou announcing the decision to appoint women inspectors at the port of New York, will be read with great interest and rejoicing by all white ribboners:

Mrs. Margaret Dye Ellis, No. 522 6th street Northwest, Washington, D. C.

Madam:—I beg to advise you that the matter of appointing women for duty in boarding vessels with other officials of the Immigration Service, for the purpose of looking after the welfare of arriving female passengers and to assist in the detection of any such who may be seeking to enter the United States for immoral purposes, had again had careful attention.

Full consideration has been given this matter in all its bearings, and it has finally been determined that the conditions will be more satisfactorily met by the appointment of matrons to act in the capacity indicated, and to assist the regular inspection officers in the performance of their duties involving the examination of female passengers under the immigration laws.

A trial on these altered lines will be made without delay, but for the best interests of the service and to attain the highest possible efficiency, persons to be appointed will be selected from eligible lists furnished by the Civil Service Commission, due attention being given to the selection of the persons appointed, that they may be in every way qualified to fulfill the requirements and meet the ends desired by yourself and others who have become interested in this matter. It is hoped to begin this new service within a very brief period of time.

Respectfully, Geo. B. Cortelyou, Secretary.

North Dakota Activities.

Successful Field Work—A Ten Days' Institute.

Elizabeth Preston Anderson, Correspondent.

Drayton, N. D., Aug. 3.—North Dakota has been enjoying the services of three of our most gifted workers. Miss Lillian Phelps came in April and remained until July, working principally in the western part of the state, on what might be called the frontier. Her work was very successful. She organized unions at Oakes, Napoleon, Ashley, Bismarck, Buford and Souris.

Mrs. Nelle Burger began work in the northeastern part of the state in June, and was everywhere most cordially received. She attended several county conventions, organized a union at Crystal, but before her engagements were completed was stricken with tonsilitis and obliged to return home.

Mrs. Callie Howe has just completed five weeks of very satisfactory work in the state. Her collections were phenomenal. The last two weeks Mrs. Howe spent at Devil's Lake Chautauqua, where we conduct every year a ten-days' W. C. T. U. institute. Mrs. Howe gave a strong address on W. C. T. U. Day on the subject of "Prohibition vs. License." The state president was present four days, Mrs. Mattie Meacham, president of Cass County, taking her place for the remainder of the time. Mrs. Meacham and Mrs. Howe kept open house at Baldwin Cottage, a gift to the state W. C. T. U. from the late Rev. J. H. Baldwin. The cottage is charmingly located, and has been nicely furnished this year by the unions. Hundreds of pages of literature were given out there and a delightful reception was held during the Institute. Great credit is due to the committee, Mrs. Marvin B. Cleveland and Mrs. Mary Haig, for their excellent taste and judgment in furnishing the cottage.

Excellent county and district conventions (with one day devoted to institute work) have been held during the last six weeks.

Three new presidents have been elected—Grand Forks county, Mrs. Una B. Drummond, Grand Forks; Second district, Mrs. Euphemia Skidmore, Tiffany; First district, Mrs. Necia Buck, Cando. Mrs. Buck takes the place of Mrs. L. C. McKinney, who has removed to Alberta, B. C. Mrs. McKinney was one of our strongest women and will be greatly missed in the state work.

A promising Y was recently organized at Cooperstown by the state president.

Seed-Sowing in Montana.

Mrs. Wm. E. Currah, Correspondent.

Butte, Mont., Aug. 1.—During the past three months Montana has been favored with several diligent and faithful W. C. T. U. workers, among them Col. C. J. Holt, whose visit to Stevensville has stimulated temperance effort at a critical time. Visible refreshment likewise followed in the wake of Mrs. Mary E. Kuhl, whose special work is among miners, reaching many of that class.

Miss Emma E. Page, lecturer for the department of Mercy, and Lydia A. Irons, vice-president of the Ethical Society of the Northwest, attained grand results during a period of twenty-five days. They visited sixteen places, held twenty-eight public meetings, seven women's meetings, reaching 1,500 people in the audiences. Ten unions visited have a total membership of 217; twenty-four active members and eight honoraries were gained. One new union at Corvallis was organized with seven members. They visited and talked on humane education at 173 public schools and two universities, one business college, one reform school and the state orphans' home, reaching 8,103 pupils, distributing humane leaflets to the larger part of these. Special packets of humane literature were given to 246 teachers of all grades, the literature and talks to the pupils being received by them with many words of appreciation. Seventy-one ministers received humane literature with the request to preach at least one sermon on the subject during the year. One hundred and fifty thousand pages of this valuable literature came by favor of Sarah J. Eddy, of Providence, R. I., and Mrs. L. A. Irons. The directors at both the Orphans' Home and Reform School were much drawn to the thought of establishing Bands of Mercy as an aid to discipline in these institutions. The principal of the State Orphans' Home subscribed for two copies of the "Crusader Monthly" and two sets of the L. T. L. Manual for the diploma study, also took a copy of "Heart Culture" to further the study of the Mercy Department

The Chain Letter Scheme.

Mrs. John Peacock, Correspondent.

Philadelphia, Pa., July 25.—In Philadelphia we are annoyed and made anxious by inquiries from different states in reference to a so-called "National Anti-Cigaret League" with headquarters in this city. Cards are sent in numbers requesting a copy to be made, with name and residence, that the chain be not broken. I have in my possession a letter from a lawyer in our city, stating that he understands "it was started as a joke." The matter has been investigated, and the whole thing is a fake. What use will be made of the names and addresses I do not know. Temperance women cannot be too careful in being lured into any apparently good work that does not receive the indorsement of the National, state, and other officers. I suppose I receive so many inquiries because I am a Philadelphian and the wife of a clergyman who is a strong temperance church worker. It takes time for busy women to "break the chain" by giving their reason to the sender.

A Connecticut Contribution.

A Fine Anti-Cigaret League at Danbury.

M. Josephine Lockrow, Correspondent.

Meriden, Conn., July 30.—The union at Stamford, Fairfield county, observed Flower Mission Day by a department meeting and a visit to the state Soldiers' Home." Flowers were distributed to the 180 veterans in the hospital and a service of song was held. The L. T. L. carried a potted plant to every inmate of the "Children's Home" and treated each to cake and ice cream. The Flower Mission department is also giving rides to shut-ins and invalids. The union has purchased a tin box in which to preserve its records and papers.

MRS. CLARK BARNUM,
President of Fairfield County.

Danbury, also in Fairfield county, has the Anti-Narcotic department in fine working order. The superintendent visited all the schools in the city, gave talks to the children, and formed an anti-cigaret league which has enrolled over 700 boys. They are formed into divisions, each having a president chosen from their number. Meetings are held once a week in the Y. M. C. A. rooms, when either a pastor or Christian worker addresses the boys. A mass meeting was held and after addresses and music the ladies of the W. C. T. U. gave the boys ice cream and cake. A pledge signing campaign is being carried on in the Sunday schools. Gospel temperance meetings are held every Sunday afternoon in Rescue Mission hall. Services are held every two weeks in jail, hospital and almshouse. Flower Mission Day was observed by sending flowers to the above named institutions, the "Children's Home" and to shut-ins.

The Cottages. THE DUXHURST COLONY. Frances Willard Hall.

The Farm Colony at Duxhurst, England.

We are pleased to be able to present in this issue of The Union Signal some excellent illustrations of the Duxhurst Colony—a work that lies very close to Lady Henry Somerset's heart, and to which she has devoted a great wealth of care and labor.

Lady Henry Somerset.

As is well known, England has the unenviable distinction of possessing a large number of women addicted to drink, and it was with the hope of finding some efficient way of reclaiming habitual women inebriates that this Duxhurst Farm Colony was experimentally started. The colony plan had proved successful in other cases, why not in this? So eight years ago the new scheme was inaugurated.

A farm of 180 acres in beautiful Surrey, one of the garden spots of England, was selected as the site of the Model Village, which consists of six cottages clustered around a larger house. It is a most charming and homelike spot. Here the victims of alcoholism who are candidates for reform are brought. They are separated into small groups, usually from seven to ten, and each group assigned to a cottage. Each cottage has its separate establishment, presided over by a nurse matron from the Church Army. The poor women take great delight in their comfortable "little homes," as they proudly call them, and vie with each other in a laudable rivalry as to which dwelling shall display the most spotless cleanliness and in every way be the best cared for.

The large building contains the refectory, kitchen, recitation hall, labor matron's room, and a private room belonging to Lady Henry Somerset. Immediately behind this building are the laundries, workshops, and work-rooms. Alcoholism is regarded as a disease, and a hospital has been provided for the treatment of the patients. There is no institutional character in the arrangement of the colony. Everything is pretty, homelike, and cheerful, and its attractiveness is enhanced by the lovely natural scenery.

Each patient is kept one year, that ample time may be afforded for permanency in the work of reform. Mothers with babies under fifteen months old are permitted to bring them to the colony. A very efficacious method in the plan of reform is that of constant occupation for the women, chiefly in gardening. The inmates take great delight in this employment, as the beautifully managed forcing houses and well-grown vegetables and flowers testify.

A small charge is made for the maintenance of the patients—the minimum being five shillings, or about $1.25 per week. Labor accounts are accurately kept, and where it is ascertained that anyone has earned her full keep, the extra money is placed to her credit and given her when she leaves the colony.

One bright feature of the colony, tho not an integral part of it, is the Children's Home at the Nest. The children brought here are from the slums of London, and are of the very poorest and most disconsolate. Girls and boys are entertained separately. The "Birds' Nest," as it is called, is cared for by Sister Kathleen, who has made children's work a special study.

It is now eight years since this unique scheme for reclaiming inebriate women was inaugurated, and its continued and growing success justifies its existence. Magistrates have in many instances consigned women to the colony who had been in prison scores of times, including one who had been sentenced over 200 times. However, the majority of the women who come to the colony are the wives of artisans who earn small wages—women who perhaps have not been before the magistrate, but who are wasting their husbands' earnings and making their homes desolate thru drink; servants who have lost both character and situation; and young women who have taken to drink thru excess of hard work and unhappy surroundings. All these seek the place voluntarily, and generally leave cured.

It speaks well for the success of the colony that sixty-five per cent. of the women received since the beginning seem to have been permanently reclaimed. So anxious have people been to seek its benefits that 3,000 applicants were refused in one year, and since the opening of the village over 10,000 women have been denied admittance for lack of room.

Lady Henry Somerset hoped, in founding the Duxhurst Colony, that it would be the pioneer in a new, practical, and successful work for reforming hosts of habitual drunkards. The encouraging results attending the experiment justify the hope that many similar ones will be founded. Fines and imprisonment have proved futile. No punishment hitherto tried has been in any sense reformatory. The poor, besotted creatures, after serving their sentence, are returned to the same old vicious and criminal environments, and the same degrading companionship, and are haled again and again to prison, sinking lower every time.

It was this disheartening aspect of the case that set Lady Henry thinking. The personal effort and the complete change of environment which were suggested to her have proved wonderfully effective, and have secured the attention of legislators interested in the punishment and reform of confirmed inebriates. The subject has appealed to Parliament to such an extent that a new Inebriate Act was passed which provided that "any habitual drunkard found guilty of crime may be detained in a state or certified Inebriate Reformatory for not exceeding three years."

The drunkard is now no longer free to ruin his own life and that of others. But the question is what to do with him. The Farm Colony at Duxhurst having so effectively shown what the influence of healthful work in the heart of nature can do for women thus affected, it is hoped that the government will be impressed to model their reformatories upon this plan.

The Birds' Nest.

L. T. L. HARVEST HOME.

By Mary D. Tomlinson.

IN the old simple days of England, the harvest home was such a scene as Theocritus might have described in his Idylls. The grain last cut was brought home in its wagon—surmounted by a figure formed of a sheaf with gay dressings—a presumable representation of the goddess Ceres—while a pipe and tabor went merrily sounding in front, and the reapers tripped around in a hand-in-hand ring, singing appropriate songs.

Harvest-home, harvest-home,
We have laughed, we have sowed,
We have reaped, we have mowed,
We have brought home every load.

Troops of village children who had contributed in various ways to the great labor, joined the throng, solaced with plum cake in requital of their little services.

The antiquity of the custom appears from Exodus 23: 16. "The feast of harvest, the first fruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in the field."

The harvest-home of Old England was obviously and beyond question a piece of natural religion, an ebullition of jovial gratitude for earthly blessings to the Divine Source of all gratitude. The harvest-home is still conducted by a general harvest festival, which usually begins with a special service in the church, followed by a feast in a tent or church. This festivity in the nature of things, teachers us that sowing is hope; reaping is fruition of the expected good. "We cannot reap a harvest where we have sown no seed nor gather where we have not strewn."

Our harvest-home is especially L. T. L. day, and there should be a grand rally in every town or county when practicable.

A procession of children, carrying their banners and our national flag; singing their marching songs from their meeting place to the church, hall or grove, will be likely to create an interest among the townspeople, many of whom will follow your way. Carry baskets of fruit, grains and grasses which can be used to decorate the platform. Miss Willard's picture should occupy a prominent position, and do not neglect to put a large bow of white ribbon, and some flowers upon the frame. It would be very appropriate to have the pictures of our National President, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, and the World's Secretary of the L. T. L., Miss Anna A. Gordon, placed on either side of our sainted leader, as they were closely identified with her in her good work, and have the best interests of the L. T. L. in mind and heart.

While you are thankful for the ingathering of the precious grains and fruit, you can also rejoice in the fact that you have been sowing precious seeds in your minds during the year, that will, if properly nourished, yield a bountiful harvest. Instead of the plum cake that the English children received, each child might be presented with a picture of Miss Willard, which would ever be a reminder of the one whose birthday they elebrate.

Marching Song: The Children are Coming. (Marching Songs, No. 2.) Miss Willard's Annual Address before the National W. C. T. U. Convention held in Denver, Colorado, 1892, contained these words: "I suggest that we incorporate as a part of the plan of work, the organization of bands of music in the Loyal Temperance Legions, so that the children can march for the cause as well as live for it."

Song: A Harvest Hymn. (Marching Songs, No. 2.)

Welcome, by a boy:

Welcome, dear friends, to our Harvest-Home Festival, for we know that you love little children, and wish us to be temperance boys and girls. We are learning temperance truths in our weekly lessons from the manuals and songs. We have good teachers, who are faithful in their work, and they are very patient with us. We love to repeat our pledge, our National and World's mottoes, and our rallying cry.

I wish that the children who lived thirty years ago or more, might have had the lessons on Alcohol and Narcotics in an L. T. L. and the public schools, that we are learning, so that there would not have been so many saloons in our land as there are to-day. We are going to fight King Alcohol, when we grow up, by voting against it.

"Vote it down, vote it down, down, down, Loyal Temperance Legion."

You may not know why we celebrate this day, so I will tell you. Miss Frances E. Willard,—who was one of the best women that ever lived, and who was the President of the National and World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union,—was born September, 28, 1839, in Churchville, Monroe county, N. Y. When she was two years old, her parents removed to Oberlin, Ohio, and later on to Wisconsin. She dearly loved her sister Mary and brother Oliver, and they spent many happy hours in their home, and in the fields and woods. Frances was a child who thought for herself, and she must have surprised her parents with her bright remarks and her questions.

One day she cut this pledge from a paper and pasted it in their family Bible, and insisted that it should be signed by every member of the family.

'A pledge we make, no wine to take,
Nor brandy red that turns the head,
Nor fiery rum that ruins home,
Nor whisky hot that makes the sot,
Nor brewers' beer, for that we fear,
And cider, too, will never do;
To quench our thirst we'll always bring
Cold water from the well or spring.
So here we pledge perpetual hate
To all that can intoxicate."

This was her first temperance work. A few months before she went away to live with God, she recited this pledge on children's evening, during the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention, in Massey Hall, Toronto, Canada, to the one thousand children seated upon the platform. She asked them to repeat it after her, giving them two lines at a time. I wish all of the children of the United States could have heard her speak; but as that was not possible, let us try to be good children at home, in school, and on the street, so that we shall grow to be good men and women, who will take a firm stand against the wine glass or the beer mug, and tobacco in any form, as that would have pleased her. Again we give you our welcome, and hope that you will encourage our teachers and us, by visiting our L. T. L. during the fall and winter.

Song, words by Miss Willard: Saloons Must Go. (Marching Songs, No. 2.)

Recitation, by a little girl:

When Miss Willard's mother was eighty-five years of age, she wrote these verses for us, the little people:

The world will be what you make it,
Little people;
It will be as you shape it,
Little people.
Then be studious and brave,
And your country help to save,
Little people.

When we walk into the gray,
And you into the day
Little people,
We will beckon you along
With a very tender song,
Little people.

If war is in the air,
When we make our final prayer,
Little people,
We will pass along to you
All the work we tried to do,
Little people.

Addresses by clergymen and W. C. T. U. women.

Recitation, by a Junior:

Strike for prohibition;
Ask for nothing less;
Labor for its triumph;
Pray for its success.

Put it in your school-books;
Teach it to your young;
Let it be the key-note
Of the nation's song.

Sound it from the pulpit;
Through the public press;
Speed it on its mission,
Every home to bless.

Waft it on the zephyrs
Over every state,
From Atlantic's borders
To the Golden Gate.

Onward let the echoes
Roll from shore to shore
Heralding the demon
Banished evermore!

—Selected.

Recitation, by a girl:

How to Do It.

The fields are all white,
And the reapers are few;
We children are willing,
But what can we do
To work for our Lord in His harvest?

Our hands are so small,
And our words are so weak,
We cannot teach others;
How then shall we seek
To work for our Lord in His harvest?

We'll work by our prayers,
By the pennies we bring,
By small self-denials—
The least little thing—
May work for our Lord in His harvest.

Until, by and by,
As the years pass at length,
We, too, may be reapers,
And go forth in strength
To work for our Lord in His harvest.

Song: Lo! The Harvest is White. (Senior L. T. L. Song-book.)

Welcome by a Senior.

I am glad that I have this privilege of saying to you to-day, Welcome to our Harvest Home. We cherish this Red Letter Day, for the reason, that on September 28, 1839, Frances E. Willard, one of the world's purest spirits, entered her earth life, to be a blessing to her home, to her country and to the world. She was gentle in her ways, strong in her convictions of duty, and fearless as a champion of the truth. She served her God and humanity with a love that never failed, and with a zeal well worthy of imitation. We are thankful that she lived, and that her life words and deeds will never die. She might have lived a more restful life, had she chosen another vocation; but she obeyed the call from her Heavenly Father—which came through the Woman's Christian Temperance Union—to go work in this great organization. Although she realized that this decision would occasion prolonged absences from home, where dwelt the dear mother who must have desired to keep her only child near her; long journeys by land and by sea; exposure to storm and heat; lecturing when the frail body was weary; a sacrifice of strength in every particular; yet she gave herself unreservedly, that the women might be aroused from their indifference; that the men would act well a brother's part in defending the weak, and that the children might have a good inheritance, and be taught the effects of any wrong-doing.

I should fail in my welcome to you if I did not give you some of Miss Willard's thoughts:

"A boy may be a wide-awake, go-ahead young fellow and have 'lots of fun,' while at the same time he is trustful, kind and gentle. He need not smoke poison cigarets, nor suck cider through a straw, in order to be happy, but the sweeter his breath, and the simpler his food and drink, the more good times he'll get."

"It makes more difference what sort of comrades young folks have than what sort of teachers."

"Understand this, first, last, and always, the world wants the best thing—it wants your best."

"Life has but one problem to solve: How Self may be driven from the throne and Love placed there instead."

"The drops of wine in the banquet, have their sequel in the salt tear-drops on somebody's cheek."

"Everything is not in the temperance reform, but the temperance reform should be in everything."

"Character is habit crystallized."

For the Sick Babies of the Poor.

By Emely L. Baker.

ON a bench at the Sixty-fourth street entrance to Jackson Park sat a broken-hearted Italian mother, weeping softly over her sick baby, a tiny black-eyed, dark-skinned morsel of humanity.

"She is so sick and so little. She's only five weeks old, and the doctor said that I should take her to the Park Sanitarium."

Just then the Sanitarium hack drove up, turned and halted in front of us. The Italian woman climbed in with difficulty, and we waited a few minutes for another woman who was hurrying toward us bearing a child in her arms.

"She's got a mighty sick baby," said the driver. "Out here yesterday with it. Doubtful if she saves it."

The child, a little girl about two years old, was as pretty as a wax doll, but the blue eyes were too bright, and the spot of color on each cheek too vivid. She lay with her head drooping back over her mother's arm and rolling incessantly from side to side.

"She has only been sick a week," said the mother, a thin, faded, young American woman in shabby finery. "The doctor says it's meningitis—worst stage," and the tone of her voice betrayed her knowledge of the desperateness of the case.

Corner in Babies' Ward.

Away to the south we drove, around and across the unfinished portion of the park, over construction tracks, between trains of tiny dump-cars mule-drawn, to the old convent of La Rabida on the shore of Lake Michigan. This relic of the World's Fair is now used as a sanitarium for sick babies during eight weeks of mid-summer when the heat and infant suffering are greatest. Here any sick baby whose parents are too poor to provide properly for the child is welcome to doctor's and nurse's care, medicine, baths, Pasteurized milk, and any food it requires.

The convent was built by people who knew how to defend themselves from the sun. Spanish houses are always built around an open court, so that the garden is inside the house, so to speak. Here grow flowers, watered by a fountain whose ever-falling spray is delightful to the eye and refreshing to the senses. Birds flit among the flowers, gathering provision for their small families up under the eaves.

All the rooms in La Rabida open on to the two corridors, upper and lower, surrounding this court. In the lower corridor walk the mothers who remain all day with their babies. On the south side is the doctor's office. The bathroom is over in the southwest corner, the diet-kitchen in the northeast corner. There are also a kitchen and dining-room for the Sanitarium people.

Sitting in the corridor was a Jewess with a sick baby and three well children.

"Oh, yes, they let the well children come for the fresh air. I come every morning from South Chicago. The doctor and the fresh air are curing my baby. I bring a lunch and stay all day. No they do not feed us, only the babies, but they give the mothers a cup of cocoa at noon."

The bedroom for nurse, housekeeper, and babies are on the second floor. Some of the babies' rooms are furnished and maintained by various girls' and women's clubs. There is no unnecessary furniture, but every room is clean, sweet, dainty fresh, and cool. A night in one of those white cribs in those airy rooms must be a blessed relief for the little sufferer, who has known only the stuffy bedroom of a crowded tenement.

"Some of the mothers say they would be afraid to leave their babies here over night, but I am not," said a frail little mother. "They saved a boy for me four years ago, and I know they can save this baby for me, if anybody can, and I think the nurse knows better what to do for him than I do."

In critical cases the child must be left here till the crisis is past for better or worse. The Jackson Park Sanitarium is the only institution of its kind in Chicago that has accommodations for its little patients at night.

The upper corridor has the same view of the court as the one below, and it is much more quiet. It is an ideal place in which to be wheeled in one's buggy till the fretful voice grows still and the drowsy lids close over the weary eyes in sleep.

"Let me look at my baby while he sleeps. Oh, he is so much better. His father misses him at night, and he is counting the days till Sunday when he can come out to see the baby."

"The Sanitarium is supported entirely by charity. There is no endowment fund or particular patron," said one of the Board of Directors. "The women do everything they can think of to make money—and beg the rest. These window screens are the gift of the ladies of one of the hotels. We pay our head-nurse a small sum, and she is usually a recent graduate who is willing to take her pay in experience. The housekeeper and janitor, also, have to be paid. Our greatest outlay is for the hack, and we can't do without that. The driver makes a round trip (over four miles) every half hour. Those poor mothers could not walk so far, and the babies must not be kept waiting in the park in the sun. Our doctors, aside from the head interne, a woman who stays all day, give their services free."

The Sanitarium Bus.

If the truth were all known, it would probably be found that they give more than their services. For instance, the wages of the woman in charge of the diet-kitchen, a trained nurse, are paid by one of the physicians interested in the Sanitarium.

About twenty-two babies are cared for every day and three or four at night—all that one nurse can manage. What a pity that lack of means prevents this noble charity from offering to a larger number of poor, sick babies, not only the best of care, but also the healing balm of pure, fresh air by day and night!

Help The Sick Children.

By E. A. Tanner.

LISTEN! We can hear the children crying!
In the dreary tenements they lie,
Calling, sobbing, for their precious birthright;
Food, and light, and air, or else they die!

Shrunken forms and withered, blue-veined faces,
Sweet eyes filmed with suffering and pain;
Waxen skins, or burning hot with fever.
Captives all, bound fast in sickness' chain.

As we watch, their glazing eyes beseech us;
Little hands so thin and hot they raise;
Nay, they fain would run to us, but cannot—
Weakened, starved, thru many dreadful days.

Help them! Ah, they die unless we help them;
Die by hundreds on our city stones.
Children die, whose lives are one long anguish.
Die! And dying, raise to heaven their moans.

Chapter XXII.

"A MILD attack of apoplexy induced by violent cerebral excitement," was Dr. Mann's diagnosis of Enoch's case, and once assured that the old man was "not going to slip thru our fingers this time," Pitsmoor came very near to regarding his seizure in the light of a special interposition of Providence on its behalf. One topic of conversation having been voluntarily tabooed, another, scarcely less dramatic, had been substituted in its place. For the pledge of silence tacitly given at the meeting was, for the most part, scrupulously observed. One argumentative and reckless young miner did indeed contend, in Sam's presence, that all he, personally, had undertaken was "not to mention no unpleasantness to Mr. Brotherton's face," for the rest, as he fallaciously argued, his tongue was his own. But when, ten minutes later, he turned a damaged countenance upon the company, and savagely demanded the suppression of Sam Widgery, he found, to his discomfiture, that public opinion was entirely on Sam's side. After that it was generally recognized that, for the prudent and peaceable, there was no course but to fall back upon Enoch and the author of the anonymous slander as subjects for legitimate discussion.

As for Mr. Brotherton himself, it was a privilege even to get a passing glimpse of his pale face in these days, for, from the moment when he helped to carry Enoch from the platform to his bed, he seldom left his side. One prolonged interview Hugh had with his father on the morning following the meeting, and, after it, the solicitor, shrugging his shoulders, washed his hands of all responsibility, and went home to console himself and his wife with the hope that, possibly, there was stuff in the fellow that might make something of him after all—stuff that had been altogether wanting in grandad.

Hugh marveled greatly at the forbearance he had shown, and, for years to come, no one but the elder Brotherton and Rose, to whom he had taken a marked fancy, knew by whose means he had been held back from open denunciation of his son.

The next shock to the parish was contained in the news that the doctor had decided to exchange practices with another medical man who resided in an equally retired spot, and that he and Mrs. Langley were leaving Pitsmoor forthwith. Mrs. Langley might go and welcome; so many a voice was heard to say, but over the impending loss of the lately despised doctor, Pitsmoor's lamentations were loud and deep. "It allus was the way," grumbled Tummas Windle, "whenever they happened to get a good 'un." But there was no help for it; the doctor went, and Tummas and his cronies got what consolation they could out of the gloomy pleasure of dinning circumstantial accounts of his worth, his assiduity, and his skill into the ears of his unfortunate successor.

Mrs. Langley accompanied her brother to his home, and, from that day to this, they have found it periodically necessary to "move on." The knowledge that it is so is, perhaps, one of the bitterest ingredients in Hugh Brotherton's cup. She resolutely declined to grant him an interview before leaving Pitsmoor, and he never saw her again. Nor, for some years, did he meet Rose Glyn. A day or two after the meeting, in the course of one of his frequent visits to Enoch's bedside, Mr. Boyd incidentally mentioned that his sister-in-law had been suddenly recalled to her father's house, and was already on her way home. Hugh made no comment and asked no questions, but he understood. To the very last Rose professed to be delighted to find that Pitsmoor shared her own views with regard to the most ridiculous story she had ever heard. Why, had it been true, she added scornfully, Mr. Brotherton would have proved himself to be a person too contemptible for words. As things were, he was, if possible, more than ever loved and respected. So sweetly sarcastic were poor Rose's looks and tones that neither Mr. nor Mrs. Boyd felt sorry that she had insisted upon being requested to return home.

Thru all these happenings Hugh kept his place by Enoch's bedside, waiting, between hope and fear, for the first signs of returning consciousness. After a while, by slow and painful degrees, the signs came. One after another each well-known face was pondered over and recognized; one by one, the broken threads of life were taken up. Then Hugh understood that with Enoch it was to be as it already was with Sam. With neither was he to be allowed to enter into explanations.

"No, sir, once for all Pitsmoor have spoken, and it munna be," said Sam firmly, when Hugh made one determined effort to open the subject. "That's reet, isn't it, gaffer?" he added, with a grave appeal to the broken old man in the bed.

Feebly Enoch signified his assent. Sam had spoken gently—even tenderly—and tenderly Enoch's hand was laid on Hugh's bowed head; but the unhappy curate noticed that neither of his two friends were willing to meet his eyes.

When he could bear their love and mistrust no longer, he spoke again. It was one night when the three happened to be alone together.

"Old friend," and he gently touched Enoch's hand, "I have news for you. True, honest news of that miserable wretch whose history I told you in the pit."

Sam turned scarlet, and Enoch trembled, but Hugh's tone was resolute, and they both longed unspeakably for some such news.

"He has dropped all pretense, and knows himself at least for what he is worth. Please God, by His help, he'll do better yet. At any rate, he hasn't tasted drink, nor wanted to taste it, since—since that day that Sam and I found something besides Billy Sellers in the pit. Enoch—Sam—do forgive and try to believe him!"

Enoch's hand sought his tremulously.

"Forgive him? Eh, lad! when I remember the deceitfulness o' my own ways, is it for me to be hard on another man? The Lord forgive and help both him and me!"

For Enoch was humbled to the ground, not only by the recollection of the device by which he had rescued a justly suspected man from a disgraceful but righteously deserved fate, but also by the knowledge that under similar circumstances he would not hesitate to do it again. Hence his abiding sense of sin.

"Mr. Brotherton, sir, it's took a load, has that news, off from me," and, once more, he looked squarely into Hugh's face with eyes that shone.

Thus, to all outward seeming, was closed the episode in Hugh Brotherton's early life when, rushing arrogantly to the verge of a fate similar to that of his grandfather, he was plucked back, not unharmed, by means of his own manhood, and (since life, after all, is not made up of outward things) was made to drink the cup of humiliation, day by day, and year by year, for his soul's good. He lost his youth in the process, and losing it, found that which was better worth having. Even Rose, last and most reluctant of those who had been his friends, was fain to admit it; but that was not until Hugh had been for three years and more in the fire. Thruout those years she visited Pitsmoor only when assured of his absence, and during such visits she resolutely hardened her heart against Sam's outspoken partizanship and Enoch's pleading eyes.

As for Hugh, as the years went on, and his manhood strengthened, Mrs. Boyd often wondered, would it never occur to him in the light of a possibility that he might win his estranged and indignant love afresh. The question was answered when, one day, Hugh handed to Mr. Boyd a letter he had just received from the patron of a neighboring living.

"I congratulate you. In my opinion, he has offered it to the right sort of man," said Mr. Boyd emphatically, as he handed the letter back.

"You will accept, of course?"

Hugh glanced at Mrs. Boyd before answering.

"I can't say. Most probably not, since it depends entirely upon what Miss Glyn's last word to me may be. I shall ask for it to-day. There's just time to run down and back before the club opens."

Mr. and Mrs. Boyd exchanged startled glances.

"Mightn't that strike her as being a little sudden?" asked the former dubiously.

"Sudden? Why so? She came to know me pretty thoroly three years ago, and has had all the time since then for thinking it over and watching the course of events. She left me in no manner of doubt as to what she thought of me then. If she still holds the same opinion, and assures me that she must continue to hold it, I don't care that for Courtney's living. I shall stay where I am."

"Oh, Mr. Brotherton, we don't want to lose you—you know that; but will you tell her from me that, if she can be spared, we shall be glad to have her for a week or two," said Mrs. Boyd eagerly. "And Mr. Brotherton, I do hope she will come."

"Thank you," said Hugh gravely. For his own part, he felt miserably doubtful.

Thruout that interminable day, Mrs. Boyd repeatedly invited her husband's opinion concerning Rose's decision, and as often scouted his cautious replies.

"I'm sure I am extremely sorry to feel so uncertain," he said, at last quite penitently, "but really it is a little difficult to decide what oneself would do in Rose's place. The question is a good deal involved. Naturally, for Brotherton's sake, and in some sense for her own, I hope—I very much hope that she may see her way to come. On the other hand—"

"On the other hand, if she does not come, all I can

The Breath of Life.

By Mary Wood-Allen.

"FRESH air for God's little ones." This is the appeal which is ringing thruout the land, an appeal which should touch the hearts of all who have a grassplot whereon some little city waif might tumble and become acquainted with the beauty of God's world.

But these words are not an appeal for the city child. I plead for the country housewife, the woman who rises in an illy ventilated sleeping room, hastens to a close kitchen, and thru the sunny hours of the day scarce sees the waving leaves or hears the singing birds—so busy, alas! in ministering to the bodily needs of others that she has no time to recognize the hunger of her own soul.

There are myriads of such women all over our land. Living in the midst of green fields, they never see the shadows of the clouds chasing each other over the verdant meadows, and dwelling in the shadow of trees vocal with bird songs, they never feel the coolness nor hear the melody. Perhaps after the birds have gone to sleep and the darkness has made all the earth one great shadow, they may sit for a few tired moments upon the doorstep before seeking the stifling bedroom for a night of heavy, unresting slumber before the toil of another burdened day. Or, it may be, they sleep only fitfully between intervals of caring for a sick or restless child.

We lay so much stress upon the food which goes to nourish the body that we fail to grasp the fact that there is food of far greater value and importance.

Not long ago a company of lads and lasses met in a singing class, and the teacher asked them if they could name the most important of all foods. The answers were as intelligent, probably, as would be given by the majority of adults. "Meat," said one, "bread," "milk," "eggs," "oatmeal," to all of which the teacher said "No." "Gluten," ventured one little fellow, remembering his physiology. "No," said the teacher; "you could live days without any of these foods, but you could not live many minutes without the food I mean." The children looked incredulous and curious, and then followed a talk on breathing, the value of oxygen, its universal presence, and the general indifference in regard to it. If the wives and mothers of our land could be induced to secure to their families and themselves as generous a supply of oxygen as they do of bread, meat, and potatoes, the average of health and happiness would rise at a bound.

A breakfast of fresh air is most vitalizing—just long, deep breaths, with lungs unfettered and blood circulating freely. If the prejudices of the family will not allow the breakfast to be dispensed with altogether, let it be simple and wholesome, and whenever the weather permits, let it be taken out of doors—a real picnic breakfast, with no elaborate preparation and serving, but eaten out of hand, with great breaths of fresh air between mouthfuls, the light of the new day shining on happy faces, and the bird chorus answered by cheerful human voices. A bowl of brown bread and milk and fresh berries will be far more nutritious under such circumstances than a hot meal of meat, potatoes, coffee and the et ceteras eaten within doors. Best of all, the housekeeper will not be too heated and tired to enjoy it. After this idyllic meal the needed housework could be speedily accomplished.

If one only dared to preach the heresy of not making the beds until night! There are certain duties that must be done, and everything that tends to vitiate the air must be removed, but the bedding can be laid smoothly over the footboard and left to grow sweeter and fresher through the sunny hours. The room will not look so spick and span, but the housekeeper will have more time for rest. Even during the forenoon she can spend an hour in the hammock under the trees "inviting her soul" and nourishing her body with the vitalizing outdoor air.

A simple dinner need not take more than an hour in its preparation, then there will be another hour in which to enjoy it, then time for rest, and still another hour left for the work. After that will be the long, lazy, sunny afternoon in which to breathe and become a living soul.

A pastoral supper, similar to the breakfast, completes the perfect day, marked by growth of body, soul and spirit, and then follows the peaceful night.

What a delight and strength would come to us toilers if we were all sojourners in tents during the summer and early autumn. If we cannot exactly sleep out of doors, however, we can let outdoors in. I saw not long ago the picture of a window that had not been closed in two years. Vines had grown into the room and made the window a bower of beauty, and here a woman was breathing herself out of that dread disease, consumption, and into health. Another consumptive traveled to California, Colorado, and Florida, and spent thousands of dollars only to learn at last that it did not matter whether she were in Maine or Mexico if she only slept out of doors, and learning this truth she grew well and stronger.

Here is a gospel of bodily salvation, a gospel that is yours without money and without price, free as air; good as gold. Let us use the Italian metaphor and say, good as bread. Yea, verily, it is bread, the great, all-needful bread of life, for we live only as much as we breathe. Let us breathe deeply that we may fully live.

SWEET ELLEN .... By Emma E. Page.

"MAMMA, how do you pronounce this man's name?" asked Ellen, holding her Bible close to her mother's eyes.

"On-e-siph-o-rus," pronounced Mrs. Sweet, cheerfully.

"That is too hard for me," said Ellen. (She was only ten.) "I shall have to call him 'Onie.' I must have a name for him, because I like him. He wasn't a bit ashamed to make friends with Paul, if Paul was in prison. Paul hopes Onie will find MERCY some great day. He talks as if finding MERCY would be better than finding gold or diamonds."

"He is right," said Mrs. Sweet. "Diamonds are not to be compared with MERCY."

"I wish I could find a MERCY," said Ellen, spinning round on one toe, like a top.

"You already have more than you can count," answered mamma. "When Ellen Sweet APPRECIATES all her mercies she will be SWEET Ellen indeed."

Just then Aunt Beth called from the hall, "Is there a girl here who would like a nice walk with me in the rain?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Sweet, in answer to Ellen's swift appeal. "You are both water ducks. Run on."

And soon the two were out in the warm, soft shower, as happy as the gulls and ducks. Ellen chatted of everything in sight as they crossed the long bridge over the slender head of Puget sound. There were the houses set up on piles with the eager tide running under them. There were the boats coming and going. There were the bay and the mountains and the woods, besides the rain and the joyous gulls.

As they entered the town they suddenly came upon a crowd of men and boys at noisy sport. Aunt Beth stopped in the middle of the crossing. There was a bird with a broken wing down in the muddy street. It was one of the merry blackbirds that filled the trees, and those men and boys were counting it sport to set a little dog upon the sensitive bit of flesh and blood. At times the dog seemed ashamed and hung back, but the men and boys "sicked" him on the harder, and laughed and shouted as he pulled the dirty bunch of feathers round in the mud. The hops and flutters of the brave little bird must have challenged the admiration of many souls whose windows were open enough to see.

"Run and get the bird," said Aunt Beth. But Ellen only clung closer to her aunt and cried: "I cant! I can't! They will laugh at me."

Again Ellen heard the rude "Sic! Sic!" She made a sudden dash and caught the muddy little creature. She took an instant to smooth the broken wing into place, then swept her tear-filled eyes over the surprised company. Like a frightened deer she darted back to the shelter of auntie's umbrella.

"Sweet Ellen! SWEET Ellen!" cried auntie.

Before they had the unresisting bird adjusted under Ellen's cape the mob had melted away. But hard faces had softened. Ellen's simple act of kindness was held up, in which they SAW themselves and were ashamed. One man said, "That look of hers stays with me and makes me step over a worm."

"I don't see why you name him 'Mercy,'" said Mrs. Sweet, when the new member of the household was safe in a big cage.

"Now, Mr. Man, we're all ready."

Ellen's cheeks grew a deeper pink as she answered: "You see, mamma, I envied 'Onie' this morning the chance to visit Paul in prison. But when I had a chance to save the bird I was afraid and didn't want to. I don't know as I COULD have done it, even with all auntie's urging, if the dog hadn't barked so fierce the last time. I thought he would eat my bird right up. It was dreadful. I could hardly get back to auntie with it, but I tell you I was glad I had it. It lay all still in my hands as if it were glad, too. How dreadful it would have been if I hadn't done it, mamma. I would have missed finding my MERCY." And her lip quivered. "It was my mercy that the Lord let me help. Don't you see? MERCY must be his name."

The next day and the next the bird chirped his thanks to Ellen, but the third day she found him curled up in the bottom of the cage quite dead.

"Do you think he knew that I always meant to set him free when he was well enough to fly?" asked Ellen, as her tears fell upon his clean, glossy coat.

"I think he did," answered mamma.

* * * * * * * * * *

So the blackbird left her sooner than she thought, but the MERCY her heart found that day stayed with her always. And many friends besides her mother and Aunt Beth called her "SWEET Ellen."

"Tassels on the Cows."

IN the town lived little Harry,
Blooming fields he'd never seen,
And his mother often told him
Of the country fair and green.

Of the country where the flowers
Grew in many a field and wood;
Where lived birds and lambs and chickens,
Cows that gave his milk so good.

Eager Harry longed to see it;
And his little heart was gay
When one day his mother took him
To the country, miles away.

There were cows in rocky pastures
Roaming round or near the rails,
Gazing gravely, switching slowly
Flies off with their fringy tails.

"Mamma," cries the wondering Harry,
Pointing where the cattle browse,
"Mamma! why you never told me
There were tassels on the cows!"

—Abbie M. Gannett.

IT was the greatest fun! That visit with papa and mamma to Uncle George's. He lived on a ranch in California, and they had the most delightful time you can think of roaming over the fields and gathering the beautiful golden poppies.

But they enjoyed most of all riding on Cousin Harry's pet burro, Jack. He was the cunningest little fellow, and just as full of fun as the children. He seemed to enjoy trotting round with them on his back all day long. But he would play pranks on them. Often they would be going along beautifully, when Jack would suddenly stop, lower his head, and throw the astonished riders on the soft grass.

One day there was great excitement on the ranch. A man came along with a camera and wanted to take all their pictures. Cousin Harry thought it would be great fun to put all the little cousins on Jack's back and have them all taken together. "Nothing like having a group!" he said. So he brought Jack round, and then came the fun of packing the six children on the burro's short back. Such a time as Harry had juggling to get them all on! But at last he succeeded.

First came Baby Nell, on Jack's strong neck, holding on to one of his long ears with her tiny hands. Then came Herbert, with Hazel squeezed in between him and Walter; Beth clung to Walter, and Margaret sat up tall and stately at the rear.

Jack seemed to know what was required of him and stood as still as a statue; but he had a very sly look in his eye.

"Now, Mr. Man, we're all ready," said Cousin Harry.

"One, two, three!" It was all over.

Perhaps that rogue of a Jack didn't know it, too! At any rate, when he heard the shutter click he thought his chance had come to play a great joke.

So his heels went up and his head went down; and, presto, change! there were all the little cousins in a heap on the soft grass, and Jack standing there laughing at them, if ever a donkey did laugh.

The Real Mother Goose.—Many have supposed Mother Goose to be an imaginary character, but such a female existed in the person of Elizabeth Foster, who married Isaac Goose in 1693. She lived in Boston, dying at the age of ninety-two. Her first songs were published by Thomas Fleet, in 1716. Her home was an exact copy of an English country cottage, with its low dormer-windows and red-tiled roof.

A Statement.

On August 5 the lessees of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association (The Wm. Johnston Printing Company of Chicago) made known to the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U. their desire that the W. T. P. A. should release them from the publication of the official organ of the National W. C. T. U., THE UNION SIGNAL.

The lessees proposed publishing THE UNION SIGNAL once in three or four weeks until the time of the National W. C. T. U. Convention in November next.

After carefully considering the situation of the W. T. P. A., and its lessees, as well as the best interests of the National W. C. T. U., and all concerned, and because of the brief time remaining before the National Convention will meet, the General Officers feel compelled to agree with the president of the W. T. P. A., Mrs. Bailey, that the official organ may be thus published until the National Convention meets in November, 1903.

Wanted—Specialists in Humanity.

A CHAIN is no stronger than its weakest link, nor is a social system stronger than its most inefficient department, if that department hold a vital relation to the whole system. There are positions in our large cities which can be held by mere political figureheads without serious injury to the body municipal. If, perchance, the man who controls the city's finances proves to be a thief and absconds with some portion of the treasury, no irreparable injury has been done. There are, however, other places in the civic system which if filled by inefficient, careless, or ignorant individuals, seriously menace the social health. To illustrate: The discovery is being constantly made that the average policeman cannot tell, or does not try to discover, the difference between a woman stricken with the heat and a common drunk. The case in point is a Chicago girl who, being overcome by the heat, was bundled into a patrol wagon, taken to a police station, and there cast into a cell, charged with intoxication and "disorderly conduct." The woman thus charged was at the time in a comatose state. A police matron, so the paper states, gifted with intelligence and humanity, discovered the mistake made by the policeman, and the unfortunate woman was removed to the county hospital, where she died. The paper makes the following accusation: "The average policeman cannot conceive that anyone can be ill or incoherent from any other cause than whisky. To him all cases of nervous collapse, fainting, heart disease, or apoplexy are so many 'plain drunks,' to be hustled behind the bars. How many people have died the result of police diagnosis cannot be told."

Such a deplorable void in our municipal system cannot be tolerated. The offense of a boodle alderman is insignificant in comparison. The one deals with dollars and cents, the other with lives and characters. One hesitates to think what might be the effect upon a delicate woman who, upon consciousness being restored, finds herself confined in a police cell like a common drunk.

In the instance quoted the remedy came thru a woman—a police matron. She made no profession to being a medical expert. It is quite possible that she lacked the training which enabled her to diagnose with her head the nature of the case. Unquestionably she possessed the quality of a true woman—an intuition of heart which enabled her to differentiate between a victim of vice and one overcome with physical weakness. The paper quoted recommends that a medical expert be employed at every police station, and the suggestion is most timely. But the equipment of a medical expert does not always provide for a sympathetic insight into human nature. There is needed in these places an expert in humanity, one who cannot only tell at a glance the difference between a common drunk and a case of heat prostration, but a woman who can detect the difference between a first offender—often more sinned against than sinning—and a hardened reprobate. She should be one who is able to discriminate between the broken-hearted, contrite repenter of a first crime and a hopeless incorrigible. She should be able to pierce through the air of bravado which is assumed only to conceal the despair of a defeated soul, friendless and alone. There certainly is often need for a healer for the body at these places, but there is tenfold more need for a woman who is capable and ready to administer sympathy and common friendliness, a bit of counsel which may turn a prodigal daughter homeward, a kindly warning which may check a downward course, a power to see beneath the tawdry gown, the frowzled head, the painted face, a woman's soul, and to reinforce its crushed aspirations for better things by womanly sympathy and helpfulness.

No Florence Nightingale or Clara Barton upon the battlefields, caring for the wounded and dying, ever had a nobler mission to perform than is presented to the police matron, for nowhere in life will you find a battlefield so strewn with wrecks of womanhood and manhood, scarred by gross indulgence, pierced thru and thru by bullets of temptation, and wounded even unto death by sin and wrong, than the police stations of our great cities.

Advertising Its Own Impurity.

THE elimination of the "disorderly" and "discreditable" saloon is a perennial topic of discussion among liquor men. But notwithstanding all the wordy animadversions of their orators and the denunciatory comments of their press, the disreputable saloon still flourishes—an inevitable product of the license system. As one step toward the desired respectability and morality some of the larger dealers are insisting that the nude picture must go from the walls of the drink shop. Perhaps they have not thought that this would mean the exclusion of the special advertising designs of some of the leading breweries and distilleries. While they are cleaning the walls of the saloon we trust they will apply the cleansing process to the advertising pages of their journals. The retail man would indeed have a just grievance if deprived of the liberty—or license—to attract attention to his wares and to boom his business in the same manner as that permitted to the wholesale man. By the way, will the advocates of the drink traffic please explain why the tastes of the trade run to impurity in art—why the liquor seller regards the obscene picture and the obscene advertisement as fitting accompaniments to his business?

⚜

A Step Forward. Valuable and timely testimony anent the canteen question comes from the military nation of Germany. We are glad to see the following cable dispatch from Berlin given conspicuous place in the daily newspapers: "Count von Haeseler, lately commander of the Sixteenth Army corps and one of Emperor William's military intimates, has issued a strong protest against the use of strong liquor by soldiers. He has been an abstainer nearly twenty-five years, drinking only a quarter of a glass of champagne on the emperor's birthday. Even that, he thinks, is too much. 'The soldier who abstains altogether is the best man,' he says. 'He can accomplish more, can march better, and is a better soldier than the man who drinkes even moderately. Mentally and physically he is better. Brandy is the worst poison of all. Next to it comes beer. Each limits the capacity and lowers mind, body, and soul. Strong drink tires and only increases thirst. For soldiers water, coffee, and, above all, tea.'"

The nation that is first to require total abstinence of its soldiers will lead the world in military efficiency.

A Toast. Often from most unexpected quarters comes impetus to the cause of total abstinence. In the British army and navy it has been the custom from time immemorial to require every officer to drink a glass of wine in honor of the ruling monarch upon his or her majesty's birthday. To abstain, therefore, "teetotally" has been virtually impossible in either service. But recently King Edward dealt a death blow to this insidious drinking custom by declaring that his health "can be drunk just as well in water as in wine." God bless and save the King; may he live long to promulgate such doctrine! is the sentiment with which in nature's own beverage do we toast King Edward.

Enlightened Public Opinion. "Behind any law there must be a power for enforcement, and that the power of enlightened public opinion." The liquor papers tell the truth sometimes and this statement is one of the truest Midas' Criterion ever uttered. Let us supplement it by adding that public opinion is becoming more enlightened every year upon the subject of the drink problem, and that this enlightenment is due largely to the temperance propagandists, notably to the do-everything efforts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

A New Invasion. A daily paper edited and managed by women, down to the "office boy," is an old institution in Paris, and also a very successful one. Now a similar invasion into the newspaper world is planned for New York. The new venture will be a one-cent daily "of, for, and by" women. It will aim to be representative of what a clean newspaper should be. Besides a compendium of general news, a great deal of space will be devoted to matters especially of interest to women. There will be no Sunday issue of the paper.

Personal.

Miss Alice Bishop and Mrs. Ella Wornstaff, of Ashley, Ohio, were pleasant callers at The Union Signal office. Miss Bishop, who is the president of the Ashley union, reports much temperance interest, not only in her own local union, but also in other parts of Ohio she has recently visited.

Our white ribbon comrades in Oklahoma are sorely bereft in the death of their territorial president, Mrs. Dorothy J. Cleveland, who passed away August 8 from the hospital at El Reno. Mrs. Cleveland's illness was very brief, resulting, apparently, from overwork. Her last words were given to commending the work so dear to her heart to the comrades who are left behind.

A dainty little card has reached the editor's desk, bearing this announcement: "Barnes Sudduth Wright. Born August 7, 1903." White-ribboners of this and other lands will rejoice in the new dignity that has come to the beloved secretary of our Y Branch, Clara Parrish-Wright, and join with us in heartfelt congratulations on the birth of a son whose name honors two of our number, Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, first secretary of the World's and National Y Branch, and Miss Margaret Sudduth, a former editor of The Union Signal.

Program for Membership Day.

"I have come to believe that it is well for our characters—those beautiful fabrics we are weaving every day—to do those things that do not make us happy, but only make us strong."

"Character is bounded on the north by sobriety, on the east by integrity, on the west by industry, and on the south by gentleness."

"I love a brave, strong character that walks the earth with a step of a king and an eye that does not quail before anything except its own dishonor."

"No open habit in word or deed that others might not safely imitate. No secret habit that one would be ashamed to have the best and purest know."

"The purity and protection of the home should claim our best and most earnest endeavor."

"To open the eyes of the blind we need temperance instruments in the form of temperance literature."

"God has given us a good world. If we will use its grain and fruits as we ought, and not make them over into drinks that spoil our stomachs and befog our brains, we shall keep our health, our wholesomeness, our happiness."

"Sow an act and you reap a habit: sow a habit and you reap a character: sow a character and you reap a destiny."

May the Legioners of every state adopt these precious words into their lives, that we may go forth in the fields that are ready to harvest, and bring in our sheaves, to help "Raise the anthem swell of victory some glad day."

Recitation.

Be Careful What You Sow, Boys.

Be careful what you sow, boys!
For seed will surely grow, boys!
The dew will fall, the rain will splash,
The clouds grow dark, the sunshine flash:
And he who sows good seed to-day
Shall reap the crop to-morrow.

Be careful what you sow, boys!
For every seed will grow, boys!
Where it may fall you cannot know:
In sun and shade 'twill surely grow:
And he who sows good seed to-day
Shall reap good seed to-morrow.

Be careful what you sow, boys!
The weed you plant will grow, boys!
The scattered seed from thoughtless hand
Must gathered be by God's command:
And he who sows wild oats to-day,
Must reap wild oats to-morrow.

Then let us sow good seed, boys!
And not the briers and weeds, boys!
The harvest time its joys shall bring,
And when we reap our hearts will sing:
For he who sows good seed to-day
Shall reap the crop to-morrow.

The Cider Web.

I know a dingy corner where a wicked spider clings;
Where he spins his web around bottles, glasses, jugs and other things;
And I listened in the shadow, as one day I passed along,
And I heard the wicked spider, as he sang his cruel song:

"Will you take a little cider? Will you call while passing by?"
Said the wicked, crafty spider to the buzzing little fly.
"Will you take a little lager? Surely you will not decline
Just to take a drink for friendship; say, just sip a little wine."

"He is coming for his cider!" said the wicked, cruel spider;
"He is coming for his wine, and my cord shall round him twine;
While he sits and sips his lager, I will whet my little dagger;
And when he has drunk his wine he will find that he is mine!

Ha! the little fool is coming; I can hear him buzzing, humming.
He who comes to visit me, vainly struggles to be free."

"You are welcome to my parlor; I am glad to see you come.
Do not stay outside the entrance; please to make yourself at home.
Will you take a little lager while I sharpen up my dagger?
Will you take a drop of wine? then you surely shall be mine.
I will bind you, I will grind you, though you struggle, weep and pray;
I will tie your hands behind you; you shall never get away;
I will fight you, I will smite you, I will stab you, I will bite you;
I will make you poor and needy; I will make you old and seedy;
I will make you bleared and bloated, with rags and tatters coated,
And your hat will look so shocking that the boys will all be mocking;
I will haunt you till you die, then I'll hang you up to dry."

* * *

Oh, my boy! beware of cider, and of lager, and of wine,
Then the wicked, cruel spider ne'er shall get a child of mine.
Let us storm his ugly castle, let us tear his web away;
Let us drive away this spider. Heaven in mercy speed the day. —Selected.

Turn it Down, Boys.

If urged to lift the glass that tempts,
In city grand or humble town,
Be he that tempts the King or Czar,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

If those that ask you vex and tease,
Perhaps condemn you with a frown,
Be firm, mind not the laugh and sneer,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

If health you crave and strength of arm,
Would keep your hardy hue of brown,
Nor have the scarlet flush of sin,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

If in your trouble others say:
"In sea of drink your sorrows drown,"
Look out lest drowned the drinker be!
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

Cold water, boys, hurrah, hurrah,
Will help to health, wealth and renown;
If urged to give these treasures up,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

Temperance Doxology.

Membership Week, September 21-28.

Every day in membership week should be devoted to securing members. We can render no higher tribute to the memory of dear Miss Willard, than to increase our membership. Each union is subject to losses during the year by death, by removals, and by indifference, so it is of the utmost importance that extra efforts be made to fill the vacancies. House to house visitation by those members who can explain the purposes of our organization, may reveal the fact, that in every locality there are women simply waiting for an invitation to belong.

Membership contests have been pronounced a success by many of our workers.

Plan to hold the membership social on September 28, inviting the new members to be present. Make it a harvest-home in every particular. Decorate your rooms with grains, grasses and fruit. Serve fruit for refreshments.

The National W. C. T. U. Convention.

EVERYBODY should know by this time that our National Convention meets in Cincinnati, Ohio, November thirteen and continues through the eighteenth. Since first announcement a change has been made in the Convention church. The one finally decided upon is the Ninth Street Baptist church, between Vine and Race streets. Cars pass the doors and it is convenient to places of interest, including lunch rooms.

The excursion to Hillsboro will take place Monday forenoon, for which special railroad rates have been secured.

The following are the chairmen of the local committees:

General Chairman: Mrs. Ella A. Roller, 4338 Beech Hill Ave., Cincinnati.

Finance: Miss Emma Black, The Lombardy, Cincinnati.

Entertainment: Mrs. M. J. Booth, 3646 Eastern Ave., Cincinnati.

Reception: Mrs. John Robertson, Brittany Building, Cincinnati.

Music: Rev. C. M. Fillmore, Carthage.

Flowers: Mrs. C. C. Smith, Locust St., Walnut Hills, Cincinnati.

Pulpit: Mrs McClellan Brown, 1024 Wesley Ave., Cincinnati.

Ushers and Pages: Mrs. D. R. White, Price Hill, Cincinnati.

Badges: Mrs. R. E. Stone, Hartwell.

Press: Miss Mary Rennick, 908 W. Ninth St., Cincinnati.

Assistants.

Mrs. McClellan Brown, 1024 Wesley Avenue, Cincinnati.

Mrs. Dr. Linkmeyer Brate, Sharonville, O.

Mrs. Booth, chairman entertainment committee, will have her headquarters during the Convention in the Y. M. C. A. building, three squares from the Convention church.

A Convention Speaker.

A very attractive feature of the coming National W. C. T. U. Convention at Cincinnati Nov. 13-18 will be the presence of Miss Olive Christian Malvery, of India. Miss Malvery plans to reach America in time for the National Convention and to spend several months here, returning to London early in January of 1904.

Miss Malvery is a charming young woman with rare gifts as a recitationist and lecturer and captivated her hearers at the recent convention of the World's W. C. T. U. in Geneva. She is an ardent total abstainer, and while visiting this country desires to speak under the auspices of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of which she is a member.

For those who desire a varied program Miss Malvery's stories, songs and sketches of Indian life written by herself will greatly add to the interest of an evening's recital. Will those desiring further information concerning Miss Malvery's plans and terms kindly correspond with Miss Gordon, addressing her at Evanston, Ill.

Railroad Rates.

A rate of a fare and one-third on the certificate plan has been announced for the Cincinnati Convention by the Central Passenger Association. The usual rules governing this plan will prevail. A fee of twenty-five cents will be charged each certificate holder, for the viséing of her certificate by the special agent. Secure a certificate when you purchase your ticket, which is to be presented to the chairman of transportation at the convention; this entitles to one-third reduction on the return ticket.

An excursion has been arranged for Monday, November 16, to Hillsboro. A special train will take the delegates and visitors, leaving Cincinnati about 7:30 a. m. and returning about 2:30 p. m. The cost will be $1.25 for the round trip. A visit to Mother Thompson, the new chapel dedicated to the Crusade and the historic town will be one of the attractions the delegates should not miss.

Attention Treasurers.

Only a few weeks and we make our report for the year. Treasurers' books close November 1, and cannot be kept open a day longer. Please see that all dues reach me before that date, so that all may have full credit.

Corresponding Secretary's Notes.

DEAR SISTERS: When you read these Notes, I shall be at Chautauqua, New York, where I go for one week. The demands of the general work will not permit a longer stay this year.

Mrs. Bullock asks me in a late letter, to make a statement in regard to our headquarters there, as she thinks the women do not understand our relation to that particular Chautauqua. In the first place, the call for the first National W. C. T. U. Convention was the result of a prayer meeting at Chautauqua, New York, which opened for the first time that same year. Later on Mr. Kellogg erected a memorial building for several different purposes, which he donated to the management. One of the express purposes stipulated was that the National W. C. T. U. should be allowed rooms for headquarters. It thereby came about that we have a nice large room in which we hold meetings every evening at 7:30 and a bedroom for whoever takes charge of these National Chautauqua Headquarters. Our room is really a very beautiful one, and we are planning to put in a new front window in memory of Miss Willard. The teachers and students in the various schools pass along this street many times during the day, and the window would be sufficiently prominent to attract much attention. The matter was presented to the National Executive at the convention last year in Portland and ruled upon favorably, and Mrs. Bullock and I were authorized to receive any sums which friends would like to give toward the window; and this opportunity is still open. We are hoping to be able to complete this work speedily, but it will depend, of course, upon those who wish to be counted in as donors to this fund. We are not sending out appeals either to unions or to individuals, believing that a sufficient number of the lovers of Miss Willard will respond as soon as this opportunity is thoroly understood.

The National W. C. T. U. is allowed from four to six temperance topics before the Woman's Club at Chautauqua every summer, and, as I have said, has this perpetual right in the Kellogg Hall building. Our National superintendents donate literature every year, and many callers make inquiries day by day and receive the literature they wish. It is really a great opportunity to bring our work to the notice of the people who throng the Chautauqua grounds, sometimes as many as 20,000 being there at one time.

A leaflet came to my desk the other day written by Mrs. Dorcas J. Spencer of California, for the Literature department, entitled "How to Make the Wheels Go Round." It is a bright, helpful paper, showing the results which may be accomplished by the free use of our literature and indicating some of the best methods of procedure. Miss Ellen D. Morris, our National superintendent of Literature, is fortunate in being able to furnish this leaflet, and we hope the unions may avail themselves of its suggestions. I thoroly agree with the writer that "Our literature is the lubricating oil necessary to keep in running order the machinery by which public opinion must be revolutionized and a great reform accomplished."

Several letters make inquiry concerning chain letters asking for names and addresses to be used in petitioning for a National Anti-Cigaret Law. I have spoken of this matter a number of times, but still the inquiries come. My recommendation is to put all chain letters into the waste basket. Inquiry has not been able to find headquarters or offices for any such anti-cigaret league, and the names asked for are probably wanted for advertising purposes. At any rate, chain letters are in disrepute, as all letters should be which ask people to give their confidence where there are no assurances of good standing. There are plenty of things we know to be good and thoroly well managed, without taking up with schemes having no backing.

A letter making inquiries in regard to the possibility and propriety of having associate members, and asking for a reply in this column, has been received. Some years ago associate members were recommended, with a view to securing as members those who were not ready to take an active part but were willing to pay for the support of the work. How much this recommendation has been acted upon I am not able to say, but certainly no union can have associate members who do not pay as much as the regular dues and take the total abstinence pledge. The original thought was that such members would pay something like five dollars per year for the support of the work—at least more than the regular dues. The dues of such members should be reported the same as those of the regular members, as associate members are not recognized in any of the constitutions.

One of the workers in the field begs me to say a word in regard to proper entertainment for speakers. We have heretofore in THE UNION SIGNAL columns, and in a little folder designed to instruct new unions as to the best methods of holding meetings, entertaining workers, etc., entered into this subject pretty thoroly. In that we recommend that the worker should not be expected to visit much with her entertainers as it will take that much of her vitality from her public work, but it never occured to us that any one would "board a worker around." One can readily understand how very uncomfortable it would be to have meals at different places and sleep at still another place. No worker can fail to be seriously affected by such entertainment. If it were only one week it might be endured, but remember, dear sisters, that these organizers and other workers are out in the field most of the year and that the only comfort and rest they have is what you provide for them. Please give them one place for their entire stay and have that as comfortable as possible. See that there are as few demands upon their time as is consistent with the needs of the work, and do not forget to let them have warm rooms in the winter time. A new worker, out for the first time this last year, says that she took her life in her hand many times last winter in sleeping in rooms unknown to fire and in unused beds. She is a delicate woman, and was doing very hard work both afternoons and evenings and cannot take such risks again. I am sure all who read these words will bear them in mind and lend their influence to good health, and thereby good work, on the part of those whom the National sends out to aid in temperance plans and purposes. Let us be sisters in deed and in truth.

A copy of the "Mexican Herald," received at this office, says Mrs. Addie Northam Fields is ill at her home, and that her friends all know that it is more or less the fruit of "too much work, a giant enthusiasm and a tireless ambition to be pushing the cause she holds so much at heart." The paper speaks of her movement as a marvelous one and of its having grown to large proportions and that it is too much for one woman to bear the brunt of this burden alone.

The "Herald" is starting a fund for her temperance work in Mexico, and we hope and pray it may be sufficiently large to give her the desired clerical help, and to meet all of the demands of her ever-growing work. We especially hope that Mrs. Fields may speedily be restored to her accustomed health.

Yours cordially,
SUSANNA M. D. FRY.

Superintendents.

Health and Heredity.

I DOUBT if I can make this communication more practical than by giving some points bearing on this department from the great meeting by the National Educational Association in Boston. This department is nothing if not educational. The W. C. T. U. is made up of a great company of educators. When the vote was taken at our last National Convention at Portland, Me., as to how many of the delegates present were, or had been at any time teachers, at least two-thirds of those present rose to their feet.

Personal hygiene, the hygiene of the home, the community, the state, are vital considerations and most pertinent to the temperance question. The subject of temperance—even the scientific teaching of the same—was not on the program, but matters pertaining to health were treated ably and at length. There were experts to consider just such objects as the department of Health and Heredity invariably stands for.

The following is from the address of Chas. R. Skinner L. L. D. State Supt. of Public Instruction, N. Y.:

"Health should not in the slightest degree be sacrificed to anything else in education. School life to-day is at the best a formal, artificial, and in many respects, an unhygienic process. With the advancement of civilization each generation knows less instinctively how to keep well. All of the influences at work emphasize the increasing importance of school hygiene.

"School hygiene should study, test, and judge the entire school environment from the standpoint of health. This involves not only supervision of buildings, grounds, lighting, heating, ventilation, furniture, books, etc., but also hygiene of instruction, arrangement of hours, recesses, alternation of activities, and all factors in the life and surroundings of the pupil.

"School hygiene should provide also for the instruction of the pupils in matters relating to health and hygiene. Hygiene should be taught in a natural way thruout school life. This instruction should be given in the elementary schools by the grade teachers. All of the instruction on this subject, however, should be under the supervision of the school hygienist; the course of study in hygiene, the progression from grade to grade, the correlation with other subjects.

"Several conditions are necessary if child life is to be protected and fostered on the health side:

"Educators and the influential public must believe thoroly and pratically in school hygiene and provide for it in the schools.

"Every teacher should have a keen appreciation of health value and co-operate with the efforts made for hygiene. Brief and comprehensive courses in school hygiene should be given in the normal and training schools for teachers."

And this from Pres. William DeWitt Hyde, of Bowdoin College:

"By introducing the school physician, by asking parents to report health and home habits of children, we are treating home and school as parts of a single, healthy, happy, useful life, and seeing that the avoidable breakdown of a child's health is murder in the first degree for which parents and school officers are jointly responsible."

The above, and similar statements, are suggestive of practical lines of work in this department, looking toward a report. Children are educated by the influences which surround them. If educated on health lines they are educated toward temperance and self-control. Habits become principles. We are engaged in a great educational campaign, and if right principles are established there will be no question of intemperance.

Special atention is called to a new issue (the fourth edition) of the Manual, "How to Do the Work" in the department of Health and Heredity. Price five cents per copy. Send to the National superintendent of Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, 184 La Salle St., Chicago.

Hoping for reports of progress from every state and territory in the union.

Yours faithfully,
LOUISE C. PURINGTON, M. D.

Temperance and Labor.

FOR the best article of not over 800 words, written in the interest of the department of Temperance and Labor, and which may be used as a recitation in medal contests, I will give $10.

Articles upon the following (or kindred) themes will be quite acceptable:

"Is industrial training in our public schools a success?"

"The most important factor in the formation of a happy, useful, well-balanced character."

"Avarice, not appetite, perpetuates the drink traffic."

"Skilled manual labor as an aid in the attainment and preservation of a high morality."

"Universal industrial training would tend toward the reduction of crime, and thereby greatly reduce the burden of taxation."

"Why should domestic science be raised to the level of other sciences?"

"Why do we have the department of Temperance and Labor in the W. C. T. U.?"

"Can unorganized labor better strengthen its position than by becoming a unit?"

"Advancement in the world's progress is more due to the power of love than force."

These subjects are merely suggestive. The articles may be written in the form of dialogue, story or essay, as preferred.

All articles must be sent to the state president of California, Mrs. Sturtevant-Peet, Stockton, Cal., by Oct. 1, 1903.

WAITED 30 YEARS

For the Proper Food.

A man who was a semi-invalid for 30 years got well in about a month when he found the right food. He says: "When I was 19 years of age I had a severe attack of Typhoid fever and after almost starving to death I was left in a pitiable condition.

"My nervous system was so shattered that I had to walk with a cane for 6 months after I got on my feet and my stomach was terribly distended. This was thirty years ago and since that time I have never known health although I had tried doctor after doctor, until 6 months ago I saw an article about Grape-Nuts that impressed me so I thought I would try it.

"So I gave Grape-Nuts a trial, more as something to eat than with any idea it would help me. My improvement commenced immediately and has kept right up until now I have used 7 packages and I feel like another person. I am in better health than I have been since boyhood and am strong and contented. Grape-Nuts food helped me after everything else failed and I look on this as an evidence of the great power of proper food." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Despite a pouring rain a large audience listened to Miss Belle Kearney, National lecturer, at the Mt. Gretna Pa., Chautauqua. Miss Kearney also spoke at White Post, Pa., Ocean Grove, N. J., and at a camp-meeting at Chester Heights, Pa. Her next dates are in Ohio.

An interesting program was carried out at the New Jersey School of Methods, held at Ocean Grove, July 22-23. Miss Belle Kearney, National lecturer, John G. Wooley, editor "The New Voice" and Mrs. E. U. Burgess, National organizer were among the speakers.

A beautiful silver bread tray was presented by the Watertown, S. D., union to Mrs. Daniel, who had been the president of the union for two years. Rev. and Mrs. Daniel have removed to Sioux Falls, where Mr. Daniel will be professor of Greek and Mrs. Daniel matron of the Baptist college.

During the four weeks which Mrs. Ada Wallace Unruh, National organizer, spent in South Carolina she spoke twenty-three times, organized two new unions and infused new life into many old ones. The work of our National organizers is opening to the W. C. T. U. many doors in South Carolina.

Mrs. S. L. Oberholtzer, World's and National superintendent of School Savings Banks, while in London en route home from Geneva was the guest of Mrs. Pearsall Smith and also of Lady Carlisle, whom she greatly enjoyed meeting. Mrs. Oberholtzer was also favored with an interview with Mr. ..ar Hall, the leader of the Reckabites.

The Sangamon county, Ill., convention which met at Loami was attended by Miss Marie Brehm, state president. A gold medal contest was held, Miss Mabel Hert being the successful contestant. Miss Margaret E. Crissey, retiring district president, was presented with a beautiful book, "Women in Song," as a token of love and esteem from her white ribbon sisters.

Paragould, Ark., is to have a street fair and carnival for two weeks in September. By request of the fair association the W. C. T. U. elected one member of the executive board, Mrs. G. B. Gordon, corresponding secretary of the Willard Gordon union, being chosen. The union will use its influence for clean attractions and will provide ice water barrels for the comfort of the public.

The first White Ribbon Cradle Roll contest in Michigan was held in Hopkins' Station, July 24, with seven contestants, all little boys. The program included the recitation of a poetic rendering of the triple pledge; the salute with the National motto of the Junior L. T. L., the march and motion songs in which little girls assisted. Master Theo. Banks, who received the medal, was five years of age.

The Paragould, Ark., union has held many interesting meetings this summer. Flower Mission Day was observed with an interesting program. Dr. Olie Wilson conducted a Purity meeting July 19. The union met July 21 to assist the Loyal Temperance Legion celebrate Anna Gordon's birthday. A nice luncheon was served to the children and several members were added to the L. T. L.

Mrs. Zara A. Wilson, superintendent of Legislation for Nebraska, whose photograph appeared in The Union Signal last month, met with a serious accident four weeks ago by walking into an open stairway at her home in Lincoln. She is still confined to her bed and, altho her recovery seems progressing rapidly, it is feared it will be months before she will be able to be out again. Remember her these sultry months as one of the "shut-ins."

Mrs. L. E. Bailey has just closed a three weeks' trip in Highland county, Ohio, where she gave nineteen lectures, held eight ladies' meetings, and addressed three children's rallies. During this time she organized two unions, secured seventy-one members and several subscriptions to The Union Signal and "Ohio Messenger." Mrs. Bailey will be in Ross county for the next three weeks, and can be addressed at Chillicothe, O., care of Mrs. E. J. Purdum.

The "Congress of Reform" at the Beloit, Kan., Chautauqua, under the management of Mrs. E. P. Hutchinson, state president, was very successful. The audiences were large and every assistance was rendered by the Assembly management. Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, National recording secretary, Mrs. Dora V. Wheelock, president of Nebraska; Rev. Eugenia F. St. John, National evangelist; Mrs. Alice G. Young, editor of "Our Messenger"; Miss M. M. Southard, Y secretary, and others, were among the speakers.

A very successful prohibition rally was held at Samantha, Ohio, not long ago. This is a Friend's neighborhood, and the rally included delegations from different parts of the country, fifty people and a band coming from the historic crusade town of Hillsboro. Mrs. L. E. Bailey, National organizer, and Rev. Faulkner, pastor of the Presbyterian church at Hillsboro, were the speakers. A hoop drill by twelve young ladies was a very attractive feature. The expenses of the meeting were met by the sale of ice cream and cake.

Mrs. Frances Beauchamp, state president of Kentucky, spoke at Evansville, Ore., recently. This little town, which nestles in the foothills of the Cascade Mountains, is ten miles from the railroad station where Mrs. Harford was met by a delegation of white ribboners from Eagle Point. Mrs. Harford spoke three times in the school house which had been especially decorated for the occasion. As a result of the meetings thirty-eight persons joined the W. C. T. U. Many accompanied Mrs. Harford to Medford, where the Jackson county convention was held.

Notice.

There are two slight mistakes in the official letter of Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, National superintendent of the Sunday School department, which appeared in The Union Signal of July 23. The scripture reference I Peter 4: 1-77 should be 1 Peter 4: 1-11. The price of the Quarterly leaflet is 30 cents instead of 90 cents per hundred.

Promoted.

Mrs. Lilly B. Hunter, of S. McAlester, Ind. Ter., has been called from labor to reward. Mrs. Hunter was a devoted member of the A. M. E. church. She was one of the most prominent members and L. T. L. Secretary of the Richey Union, of the Indian Territory, also superintendent of the S. McAlester L. T. L. The children were devoted to her and her place will be hard to fill.

A Novel Proposition.

When the writer was a small boy he used to be attracted by a novel advertisement used again and again by a local business man. There was the picture of a globe, marked off with parallels of longitude, and stuck in this globe, with his head showing at the North pole, and his feet showing at the South pole, was the figure of a man. In curved lines and below the picture was the inscription, "Help Me Thru the World."

The plea of this man was entirely legitimate. It was the business of other people to help him thru the world. That is what we are here for, to help each other thru the world.

But there is a far nobler plea that we can make. It is this. Let us help people into a better world. Not by helping them out of this, but by helping to make this a better one. It is our business to do this. All lesser matters in which we engage are simply done "to pay expenses."

Now if that is what we are here to do, it should be done with promptness and energy. We can not acquit ourselves in any worthy way by being dilatory or careless. In this at least we must not "put off till to-morrow what we can do to-day."—Selected.

Parliamentary Difficulties.

Conducted by Mrs. A. S. Benjamin.

QUES.—In our convention one of our most prominent ladies asked for the floor right in the middle of the vote (a rising vote) and the Chair ruled her out of order. The members appealed from the ruling of the Chair and the floor almost unanimously sustained the Chair. Now the few who dissented are aggrieved. The lady who appealed has been in several of your classes and says she knows she is correct. Will you be so kind as to settle this in next "Difficulties" sure?

ANS.—The member was quite right. If she had not already spoken to the question she was entitled to the floor. When "voted down" she should have asked permission to read the law. If she was so unfortunate as not to have had a copy of Roberts' Rules of Order she could have borrowed one of president or secretary, both of whom should always have a copy at hand. That would have settled the matter at once. There need never be any feeling over a decision on a point of law. The Manual will always decide.

Following is a question on the same line:

QUES.—When a member obtains the floor right in the middle of the vote what does the Chair do next?

ANS.—Unless other members claim the floor, she at once takes the vote. When the member relinquished the floor the question was just where it was before the former vote was taken, so of course the president re-takes the affirmative and then the negative as usual.

Still one other question rolled up by this same "wave" is most opportune just here:

QUES.—When a member has been present right thru a debate and has not asked for the floor, and then calls for a standing vote, and when the yea voters are on their feet calls out "Madam President," and demands the floor should she be given it? If she wished to speak should she not have taken her chance with the others, instead of making herself conspicuous and delaying everything by such a queer procedure? A good many of us think the Chair was wrong when she gave her the floor. This must be made very clear in THE UNION SIGNAL.

ANS.—The procedure was not at all "queer." The member was entitled to the floor even tho she had been sitting right there. Any member has the right to call for a rising vote on any question (when voting by the ayes and noes), and probably in claiming the floor the lady never once thought of 'making herself conspicuous." The chances are that she did not speak when the others were talking because she did not wish to speak at all unless necessary. When she called for a rising vote she did it to test the strength and see if she needed to talk. When from her standpoint the vote was going the wrong way, she probably considered it her duty to make a speech that would reverse the vote. (Wonder if she did.) Getting the floor in the middle of the vote is the best sort of parliamentary tactics, in a spirited discussion in which several take part, and debate at best is too much prolonged. Find whether it is necessary to talk before adding to the volume of speeches.

QUES.—(a) Please say in THE UNION SIGNAL how many paid members must be back of every delegate on the floor of the National convention. (b) How are these delegates provided—I mean how do the several states appoint or elect them? (c) Are all state officers members of the National convention and ex-officio voters?

ANS.—(a) Five hundred "paid" members. (b) Different states have different methods. The National union does not at all care how each state provides its delegates. The only requirements are five hundred members and $50. (c) Unless the state has a vice-president-at-large all the officers are ex-officio voters. There is no provision for seating a vice-president-at-large, tho there should be, and doubtless the necessary steps will be taken in the next annual meeting.

QUES.—(a) Is there any necessity for a vice-president-at-large? (b) What is the difference between that officer and the first vice-president? (c) Should state, district, and county elect both?

ANS.—Not at all. So far as I know in every state the several county presidents are vice-presidents of the district. (if they work by both counties and districts) and the district presidents are vice-presidents of the state. As you see in each case this gives several vice-presidents who are equal in rank. There might be a question as to who would act in place of the president. There could be none where there is a vice-president-at-large duly elected by the constituency over which she would preside in case of the absence of the president.

CHANGE.

Quit Coffee and Get Well.

A woman's coffee experience is interesting. "For two weeks at a time I have taken no food but skim milk, for solid food would ferment and cause such a pressure of gas and such distress that I could hardly breathe at times, also excruciating pain and heart palpitation and all the time I was so nervous and restless.

"From childhood up I had been a coffee and tea drinker and for the past 20 years I have been trying different physicians but could get only temporary relief. Then I read an article telling how some one had been cured by leaving off coffee and drinking Postum and it seemed so pleasant just to read about good health, I decided to try Postum in place of coffee.

"I made the change from coffee to Postum and such a change there is in me that I don't feel like the same person. We all found Postum delicious and like it better than coffee. My health now is wonderfully good.

"As soon as I made the shift from coffee to Postum I got better and now all of my troubles are gone. I am fleshy, my food assimilates, the pressure in the chest and palpitation are all gone, my bowels are regular, have no more stomach trouble and my headaches are gone. Remember I did not use medicines at all—just left off coffee and drank Postum steadily." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Hugh Brotherton, Curate.

say is that I shall be very much disappointed in Rose," interrupted his wife indignantly. "Chris! if I did not know to the contrary, I should suspect that you had never been in love!"

Mr. Boyd raised his head in surprise, and saw her to be ruffled beyond all his experience of her sweet nature.

"My word! I hope she'll come," he said quaintly.

His wife's faith in her sister, if weak, was justified, for toward evening Rose came. She looked pale, agitated, and happy; and at once it was evident she had fallen in love over again with the grave lover who had supplanted her fallen hero of old.

Before many days had passed, the voice of joy mingled with the voice of mourning on every hand. The only consolation which Pitsmoor could take to itself in the prospect of bereavement lay in the fact that Mr. Brotherton was not going far away.

"The worst fault I ever see in him," asserted John Broadbent dogmatically, "was the disappointing line he took wi' respect to our weekly temperance meetin'. Shilly-shallyin' we might expect from Mr. Boyd, but we had a right to expect somethin' better from Mr. Brotherton. Here's a parish o' pledged—"

"Oh, shut up, gaffer!" interrupted Sam precipitately, for argumentative souls were pressing round. "He's made a teetotaller of every man Jack of us, and what more do you want?"

Sam was still a little apt to speak and act truculently, therefore, Enoch being unaccountably silent, it was not for John Broadbent to enter into combat single-handed with one who argued so deplorably beside the mark.

THE END.

Sunburn.

Many women suffer martyrdom in summer owing to sunburnt faces. Some burn red, others brown. Timely precautions may be taken which will ward off to a great extent the pain of sunburn and uncomfortable dryness that the skin experiences when it begins to peel. Buttermilk is a good thing to use, and the juice of cucumbers is a time-honored remedy. It is a good plan to rub the face with slices of cucumber, or to bathe the face in milk into which some cucumber juice has been squeezed. An Italian remedy for sunburn is the white of an egg, beaten up to a froth, applied to the face and allowed to dry on for ten minutes, after which the face is bathed with distilled water. Lemon juice is a popular remedy, and may be used with equal parts of glycerine or rose-water.

The Smithdeal Business College, Richmond, Va., is a high-grade commercial school. The president and faculty are radical enemies of the liquor traffic, the former refusing to join the Chamber of Commerce of his city, because liquor dealers were admited.

The Practical Age, Moline, Ill., says of him: "Professor Smithdeal is a deadly enemy of all educational shams and superficial methods of teaching." The school has been built up from the smallest beginning to one of the largest of its kind in the country, having an annual roll of nearly four hundred students, who come from different parts of this country and other countries.

The college is open all the year round. Ladies and gentlemen are admitted to all departments, and are given largely individual instruction, so that each student may make as rapid progress as possible, without reference to time or classes.

Its teachers, several of whom are authors of valuable books, are scholarly and experienced. Kind but firm discipline, practical and individual instruction adapted to each student, are some of the reasons why the Smithdeal College has succeeded, while several similar schools have failed in Richmond.

Single, Double Entry and Joint-Stock Bookkeeping, Commercial Arithmetic, Business Writing, Business Practice, Shorthand, Typewriting, Telegraphy and English, are taught.

Young men who must economize and who do not use tobacco, liquor, profanity, nor have any other bad habits, are boarded in the College at cost, $10,00 per month, including furnished room, light and heat.

Practical Talks with Housekeepers.

Summer Desserts and Summer Drinks.

By Mrs. L. W. Mitchell.

IN the heated season the old question of "What shall we have for dinner?" so far as it relates to the dessert, at any rate, would often times better be answered by the word "Fruit," than by any other. Nature craves the cooling juices, and the mounting mercury makes the concoction of baked or steamed pies and puddings an intolerable task. Besides, all outdoors is calling: the skies are soft and blue, the parks are in the full tide of beauty, or, a little further away from the city, the real country lanes and wood-paths bid us forth, one and all, matron, maid, and child, to loaf and invite our souls.

That housekeeper is, indeed, wise in her day and generation who perceives how much more the life is than meat, the body than raiment. She will have little or none of the made dessert, but fill her fruit dish to overflowing, and sits down to partake thereof in a tranquil frame of mind, having seen to it that her fine napkins are out of harm's way, and small, fringed fruit-napkins distributed among her family. Fruit stains are a thorn in the flesh to a housewife whose pride is her table napery.

There is a difference of opinion regarding the home-made frozen dessert. If there are time and strength for its preparation and ice is cheap, it is a welcome dish on the table at meal time or almost any time between meals. But there are caterers whose products in this line are fine, and whose charges are so reasonable, that when the table can be supplied by a simple order over the telephone, in many cases it seems best to provide in this way. Individual tastes and circumstances must, of course, regulate this choice. There is no denying the feeling of proud satisfaction which swells the breast over a culinary frozen triumph served to the family on some sweltering day, a miracle of texture, flavor, and richness, won by your own brain and hand-work. I say brain and hand-work advisedly, for much judgment and care are required in producing a perfect frozen dessert. If you ever, on a very warm day, had a refractory freezer to handle, you will recall how it convinced you of the total depravty of inanimate things, and that it seemed as if one brain and one pair of hands were all too light an equipment for its subjugation.

The following desserts are suitable for hot weather, and are simple and easily prepared:

Strawberry Mousse: Wash and hull one quart of berries, mash thru a fine strainer, add one cup of sugar and one-fourth of a cup of gelatine dissolved in one-fourth cup of water, stand in a dish of ice water, and stir until it begins to get hard. Fold in one quart of whipped cream, fill into a mould, cover securely, pack in equal parts of ice and salt, and let it stand three or four hours.

Frozen Peaches: Take twelve large peaches, and mash with two coffee cups of sugar, stir in one pint of water, and the beaten whites of three eggs. Mix well and freeze.

Peach Ice Cream: Mash one pint of ripe peaches thru a sieve and sweeten to taste. Put in the freezer one pint each of milk and cream. As soon as this sets, add the peach pulp and freeze five minutes. Add the whisked egg-whites, and finish freezing.

Currant and Raspberry Ice: To make one pint of juice, squeeze and strain equal parts of currants and raspberries. Add a pint each of sugar and water. Mix and bring to the boiling point, when it should be poured on the stiff whites of three eggs. Whip well together, cool, and freeze. Substitute any fruit juices preferred.

Orange Jelly in Baskets: (These are given because, altho they take a little time and patience to prepare, they are so attractive, especially for a little folks' summer birthday party.): Beat the yolks of three eggs with three tablespoons of powdered sugar, add one cup of rich milk, and cook until it thickens. Take from the fire and add one-fourth of a box of dissolved gelatine. Stir and strain, flavoring with orange. Have ready some baskets cut from orange peel, and before the jelly gets too stiff, fill the baskets and set on ice. Heap with orange-flavored whipped cream, and tie the handles with ribbon.

Pineapple Tapioca Cream: Soak over night two tablespoons of tapioca in water to cover. In the morning cook in a quart of milk in a double boiler, add one-quarter of a cup of sugar and a pinch of salt. After the milk has boiled ten minutes, stir in the well-beaten yolks of three eggs, remove at once from the fire, and stir rapidly to prevent curdling. Add a cup of preserved pineapple, drained, pour into a baking dish, make a meringue for the top, and brown.

Fruit Toast: Make some slices of toast from either brown or white bread, butter lightly, and over each slice pour hot sweetened stewed fruit. Plums make good fruit-toast, and plums are delicious stuffed with marshmallows, either roasted or plain, with or without the accompaniment of chopped nuts.

Fruit Meringue: Stew the fruit in a sugar syrup, skim out and boil down the syrup. Pour it over the fruit. Cover with a meringue made of three egg-whites, and serve very cold with a soft custard for sauce.

Stuffed Bananas are prepared by pressing the pulp thru a sieve, mixing with sugar, flavoring and whipped cream to suit the individual taste. Chill and serve with sponge drops.

Fruit Cottage Puddings are made by stirring the prepared fruit into the batter of a plain cake. Bake in a loaf and serve with hard sauce. Fruit puddings are made by alternating sweetened fresh fruit layers with fine bread crumbs, the top layer of crumbs buttered. Cherry pudding is especially good. Serve with plain cream.

Stale macaroons are very readily converted into a dessert by covering with flavored whipped cream.

Drinks.

Fruit Lemonade: Take the strained juice of a dozen lemons and sweeten with one pint of sugar. Add one-half pint of rasberry juice, one sliced orange, one sliced banana, and stir all into two quarts of iced water.

Strawberry and Raspberry Shrub: Mix five ounces of tartaric acid in two quarts of water. Pour over twelve pounds of the cleaned fruit and let stand forty-eight hours. Strain thru a flannel bag. To each pint of juice add one and one-half pints of white sugar. Stir until the sugar is dissolved, bottle, cork tight, and keep in cool place.

Cream Soda (from The Cooking Club.) Boil together three pints of water, two lemons, and two ounces of tartaric acid until a clear syrup is obtained, then remove from the fire. Beat the whites of three eggs until stiff, slowly sift in a half cup of flour and stir until smooth, then flavor with essence of wintergreen. When the syrup is nearly cold, add the egg mixture to it, let stand over night, pour into a clean, sweet stone jug and cork tightly. Use two tablespoons to a glass of iced water. Just before drinking add to this a little soda and stir well.

Unfermented Grape Juice: Wash and pulp ten pounds of grapes, bring to a boil, and when cold strain thru a cheese cloth. Add two pounds of sugar, put over the fire again, fill boiling hot into bottles and seal at once. Resin with a little linseed oil melted together is recommended for sealing mixture.

Let the Whisky Men Have Their Way.

WE have a letter from a railroad man in Kansas which throws yet more light on the favorite cry of the whisky crowd, that prohibition does not prohibit.

Our correspondent is J. M. Beecher, Jr., one of the trustees of the Methodist Church at Belleville. He says:

While standing in my car door at the terminal, I noticed a gentleman passing back and forth. He paused at the door, and inquired if there were any open joints along our line. I made a non-committal reply, and talked with him until I found he was a whisky drummer, traveling for a Kansas City house.

I gave him some information, and he, in turn, told me of his trips in Kansas and Nebraska.

After complaining bitterly of the difficulties he had to meet in Kansas, in the way of small orders and the uncertainty of finding his customer on the second trip, he stated that in his territory in Kansas there were just three good towns—Leavenworth, Atchison, and Pittsburg. He wound up by declaring, disgustedly, that he sold as much liquor in Nebraska in one week as he did in Kansas in his whole three weeks' trip.

How the whisky men do love Kansas, and how prohibition does not prohibit!

His name is —— ——, and he travels for —— & —— of Kansas City, Mo.

This is not an unusual case, as anyone knows who has traveled in a prohibition state.

The simple truth is that a prohibitory law is usually better enforced than any other sort of law aimed at the whisky business.

Local option territory is being continually invaded by the traffic. Low license states are neither happy nor successful in their attempt to restrict liquor selling. High license states are no better. Witness the present shameful condition of things in New York City, where a district attorney asks for partial Sunday opening of saloons in order to induce the saloonkeepers to be good for the rest of the day!

It may as well be understood by all concerned that the saloon is a chronic and incurable law-breaker. It is as little content to obey "liberal" restrictive laws as it is to obey "Puritanical" ones. No attitude of the law-making power satisfies it. It respects no law, because the nature of its business makes it an outlaw. The saloonkeeper is a most practical and a most dangerous anarchist.

Two alternatives offer themselves for a final settlement of the business of dealing in intoxicants. It may be "let alone." Let it be considered as a legitimate business, like the grocery business, or the clothing trade.

Such a solution would surely satisfy the whisky men. That it would satisfy the sober judgment of the American people not even the whisky men believe.

The other solution is to take the whisky men at their own valuation, and make them perpetual outlaws. They are already willing to be criminals part of the time. They do not seem to be hurt by the disrepute of their business. They accept the role of the law-breaker without hesitation.

The facts, the logic, and the morals of the drink business all point one way. "You can't enforce" any sort of restrictive liquor law. But the more territory the law covers, and the more stringent it is, the more generally effective its enforcement is likely to be.

The dealers in intoxicants know that "free whisky" is impossible. They have taught us that they respect no restriction, however slight. Let us accept the plan of campaign they have forced upon us, and move directly upon their works. —Epworth Herald.

Magazines of the Month.

EVERYBODY'S for August has an ideal vacation cover, and the contents are in keeping. The fiction is unusually attractive, and the illustrations excellent. Timely articles are "Pope Leo's Successor," and a vacation symposium—"The Best August." "Little Stories of Real Life" are a fascinating monthly feature.

The August METROPOLITAN presents a varied and interesting table of contents, chiefly bright, up-to-date fiction, the most important being a serial story by William Dean Howells. "New York's Public Playgrounds" and "When the Town (New York) Was Young" are of other interest. The magazine is handsomely illustrated.

PEARSON'S for August comes out in an appropriate harvest cover which is a good vanguard for the battalion of bright and catchy stories that follow. There is besides a fully illustrated and comprehensive paper on "The Building of the Panama Canal," that cannot fail to be read with interest. "How to Improve the Game of Lawn Tennis" will be appreciated by those who love outdoor sport.

The complete novel in LIPPINCOTT'S for August has a catchy title—"The Green Dragon," and a very readable summer story it is. There are several shorter stories, and anybody that reads LIPPINCOTT'S knows that its fiction is always of the most entertaining. "Father Kneipp and his Cure" is a gossippy little article about the Bavarian priest's barefoot cure for consumption. Poetry and "Walnuts and Wine" are very enjoyable.

SUCCESS seems to have caught the vacation spirit to keep its sister magazines company, and a very large proportion of fiction has crept into the August issue of this usually strenuous magazine—but then several of the stories are strenuous enough. Some of the substantial articles are: "The Era of Young Men," "There Effort is Bound by Castle Fetters," and "American Cup-Winners and Their Builders." This issue is, as usual, splendid as to matter and illustration.

The August MCCLURE'S is a very handsome issue of that always excellent magazine. The initial article is a fetching child's story—"The Method of Charles Stuart York." The sympathetic illustrations are in color and truly an artistic success. "A Story of the Upper Mississippi" is a thrilling tale of the wild races between rival boats that were so common in the days of a past generation. The stories are all bright, breezy, and original—prime companions for a leisure hour. Lincoln Steffins contributes an intimate and wholly delightful sketch of that genuine reformer —Jacob A. Riis.

The ST. NICHOLAS for August is a delight to the eye and a joy to the soul of every young person who loves good stories and poems and charming illustrations. We couldn't begin to say which is best where everything is so good; but you will enjoy "The Bell Buoy's Story," "The Farman Tea-Room," "How We Boys Were Stormbound on Minot's Lighthouse," and the quaintly illustrated serial "Story of King Arthur and his Knights," by Howard Pyle. To us the most delightful features of the magazine are the departments "Nature and Science" and "The St. Nicholas League." They are a liberal education to the young folks.

The value of the latest issue (July) of the QUARTERLY JOURNAL OF INEBRIETY to temperance workers can best be determined from a knowledge of its contents. The principal articles are: "Inebriety a Disease," "Nature, Effects, Uses, and Abuses of Alcohol," "Infantile Alcoholism," "The Correlation of Alcoholism, Crime, and Insanity," "Tyroscine in the Treatment of Morphinism," "History of the International Anti-Alcohol Congresses," "Taxemias and Their Relations to Alcoholism," "Annual Meeting of the American Temperance Association," "Quarterly Meeting of Association for the Study of Inebriety," etc. (T. D. Crothers, M. D., editor, Hartford, Conn. $2.00 per year.)

The "thing worth while" in the August CHAUTAUQUAN is public improvement. Indeed, the entire number is devoted to "civics." This is a most worthy subject, and deserves all the exploitation it has received of recent years. Beautiful and healthful surroundings cannot fail to refine the people who live in them. The subjects treated indicate the scope of this exceptionally interesting and valuable number. Some of them are: "The Gospel of Pictures," "The Philosophy of the Betterment Movement," "The American Municipal Art Movement," "Most Important Event in Civic Improvement," "Springs and Fountains," "The Story of the Civic Club, of Carlisle," "For a More Beautiful St. Louis," "Progress of Rural Improvement," etc. The articles are appropriately illustrated.

The Midsummer CENTURY is indeed sumptuous, both in matter and illustration. The colored cover page is exceptionally effective. Perhaps the most important articles now running in this magazine, in view of the wide influence of the Methodist Church, are the series of illustrated papers on John Wesley, by Prof. C. T. Winchester. The second paper is entitled "Wesley's Days of Triumph." Other articles of value are: "An Artist in the Antarctic," illustrated with pictures in color, "New Light on Lhasa, the Forbidden City," "The Later Years of Sir Walter Scott," and "A Place of Marvels" (Yellowstone Park) and the first of a series of brilliant papers by Hon. Andrew D. White, entitled "Chapters From My Diplomatic Life." The subject of the present paper being "First Mission to Germany." The fiction is bright and fresh.

When we say that the August ATLANTIC is up to its usual standard of excellence we mean a great deal, because to many of us no illustrated magazine yet published can take the unique place that this old and favorite publication holds in our hearts and intellectual needs. Some of the more important articles are an appreciative study of "Zola," an essay, with a psychological interest in it, by Agnes Repplier on "Consecrated Criminology," and thoughtful "Letters from the Philippines," by Arthur Sayers Riggs. The fiction is bright and fascinating, and forms a large proportion of the contents, the initial article being a delightful novelette entitled "Daphne." The story is radiant with glory of a midsummer Italian coloring, but tempered with an elusive pagan joyousness. The plot does not matter. It is the description. Lafcadio Hearn contributes one of his vivid stories of Japanese life. The Contributor's Club is as usual the best of the feast.

The special features of the AMERICAN MONTHLY REVIEW OF REVIEWS are a character sketch of the late Pope Leo XIII., by W. T. Stead; a sketch of the artist Whistler, who died in London on July 17, by Ernest Knaufft, with reproductions of several of Whistler's characteristic works; articles on "The Present Status of the American Labor Movement," by John R. Commons, and "The Plight of the English Worker," by Frank Fayant; a study of the recent German elections and the triumph of the Socialist party, by Wolf von Schierbrand; a character sketch of M. Jaures, the present leader of the French Socialists, by Othon Guerlac; an illustrated account of this year's wheat harvest in Kansas, by Philip Eastman; and three articles treating of the latest phases of electric-power development,—on the upper Hudson River, in southern California, and in the State of Washington, respectively. In "The Progress of the World," the editor deals with the post-office scandals, the prevalent mob spirit, American diplomacy in the far East, the coming changes in the army, and the principal current questions in foreign politics.

The Domestic Problem.

By Irma T. Jones.

BETTER household service and more contented domestics can come only as employers and employed grow in knowledge of their respective duties and responsibilities. In its last analysis permanent economic improvement rests on an ethical foundation. A striking illustration is the acknowledged fact that experienced housekeepers have less difficulty in getting and keeping competent help than young housewives. In general, the former are less selfish, less exacting, do not expect impossibilities, and are better managers, so that their domestic machinery works with less friction, while their knowledge and experience inspire respect and confidence and obedience follows without irritation.

Conditions of family life in respect to income, numbers, and social obligations are so diverse that no remedy of universal application can be prescribed. The thoughts herein offered refer solely to average conditions in homes of the great middle class of American life.

Obstacles which hinder betterment are: Absence of business methods in hiring domestics, uncertain hours of labor, injustice in wages paid, ignorance often receiving the same as skill or more; difficulty in advancement or increase of wages; lack of social opportunity; too much expected of one servant, who must often be laundress, cook, charwoman, waitress, chambermaid, with care of children and furnace thrown in gratis; demand greater than supply; public sentiment regarding housework as less honorable than typewriting, selling goods or teaching. In addition to these, and even more difficult to overcome, are the ignorance, selfishness, dishonesty, and greed in servants, in employers, or in both, and what wonder that the domestic service problem shows "confusion worse confounded?" Evidently, any scheme of betterment must be of wide scope, and can only succeed slowly.

Housekeepers' unions promise much, and might in time develop business sense in women. They could regulate wages according to ability, hours, and term of service. They could prescribe rules for the advancement and reward of faithful service. They could strengthen women against the extortion of ignorance, and defend worthy workers from the greed of unprincipled employers. They might increase respect for housework as a vocation, and in time educate women to loyalty to rules, and to the value of efficient service. Such unions could prescribe duties and hours of labor so that a certain sense of freedom and independence might be possible for every domestic.

The removal of laundry work from the home would rob domestic service of half its terrors for the average working girl. In too many households the weekly wash day is the beginning of untold friction, interferes with the comfort and regularity of meals, and is for several months in the year a menace to health and even life.

Simplicity of living and house furnishing, more economical, desirable, more truly American, would also smooth many domestic pathways. Simpler meals and no laundry work would enable many a woman to manage easily with the help of her children and the occasional service of a char woman.

Make household arts fashionable. Insight into the real significance and beauty of well ordered home life, and the expert deftness which comes of mastery, would change household drudgery to something queenly. Even the menial tasks of housework would cease to be considered "common or unclean."

Recognize domestics as having such social needs as friends, comradeship, recreation, fresh air, light, happiness, and opportunity for improvement. The lonely lot of many faithful domestics is pitiable in the extreme. Wisely bestowed favors of this kind bring manifold returns in loyalty and diligence.

Like all evolutionary movements, betterment in household service must needs be of slow growth. It is noteworthy that wherever training in domestic arts has been spread by college or manual training school, improvement in domestic service has resulted. Undoubtedly, therefore, manual training and home science in public schools will, more than anything else, hasten the coming of better service and contented domestics.

Without respect for the vocation, without intelligence to direct it, willing to purchase freedom from effort at any price, indifferent to the welfare of their employes, multitudes of women, blind even to their own interests, are in reality obstructionists, hindering the cause of honest labor, hindering the health and sanity of American home life.

Educate them, develop conscience and character in them, if in no other way by the compulsory education of their children in domestic science in the public school; then will society rejoice in the dawn of better days for servants and served alike.

The Nickel Plate Road, with its eastern connections—the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western and West Shore and Boston & Maine Railroads—is considered by those who have patronized it as a most desirable line between Chicago and New York, Boston and other eastern points, and takes its place among the first-class lines leading eastbound from Chicago. It is operating three through first-class trains, all daily, and equipped with modern improvements, for the convenience and comforts of the traveling public, and has succeeded, to a remarkable degree, in pleasing its patrons, growing in popularity every day. One of its attractive features and thoroughly appreciated by the traveling public, is its dining-car service, meals being served on American Club plan, ranging in price from 35c. to $1.00; also service a la carte. Colored porters are in charge to look after the comfort of passengers in coaches, and especially to assist ladies traveling with children. No excess fare on any train on Nickel Plate Road. All passenger trains arrive at and depart from the La Salle Street Station, Chicago, the only passenger station in Chicago on the Elevated Loop. When going east try the Nickel Plate Road. A Sunday school teacher recently told her class about the cruelty involved in docking horses. "Can any little girl tell me," she said, "of an appropriate verse of Scripture referring to such treatment?" There was a pause, and then a small girl arose and said solemnly, "What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

Signal Notes

Only twelve out of the ninety-six counties in Tennessee legalize the sale of liquor.

Thirty-four children were sent to the country for a two-weeks' outing by the Chicago Bureau of Charities. Three other parties will soon enjoy an outing.

The floating hospital of the St. John's Guild, N. Y., carried nearly 1,000 invalids on its first trip this year. The boat is fitted with wards for dispensary service, a quarantine for contagious diseases, and a bath room accommodating fifty persons.

The subject of child life in institutions is being studied at the New York summer school of philanthropy. A plea for greater freedom and a natural individual child life was made by R. R. Reeder, superintendent of the New York Orphan Asylum.

Sam Davey, thirteen years old, the boy who rowed a small boat thru a storm to rescue seven men who were thrown into Silver Lake by the capsizing of a yacht, has been presented with a handsome gold medal by the men whose lives he saved.

A unique international exposition is to be held in the imperial palace at St. Petersburg next fall. The undertaking is called "The Child's World," and will contain everything from the various countries concerning the moral, physical and intellectual education of childhood and youth.

Colonel Wright, who is in charge of the first and second battalions of the Second Regiment now in camp at Lakeview, Minnesota, has banished the canteen from the camp. Colonel Wright says he desires to have his men in the very best condition for work. The camp is very quiet, and the boys hard at work.

At the last session of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars, Maine, Mr. George E. Brackett was again elected secretary. For twenty-eight years Mr. Brackett has filled this office, and for twenty years he has printed and ably edited the "Temperance Record," a paper that has done much for the cause in Maine.

Nineteen bills were introduced in the Nebraska legislature this last session by the liquor men that had for their object the modifying of the force of the Slocum law, but all failed to become law. Two bills passed which make the law more stringent than before. There are 400 cities and towns in Nebraska without licensed saloons.—"Mida's Criterion."

The St. Vincent de Paul Day Nursery of Manhattan, N. Y., has opened a summer home at Sea Cliff, L. I. The five hundred children who are taken care of at the Nursery rarely if ever have an opportunity to see the trees and the green grass, and play out in the fields. They will be brought to the home in parties of fifty until every child has had a two-weeks' outing.

The little booklet on "Near-By Resorts" issued by the Michigan Central R. R. will be of much interest to dwellers in Chicago and its numerous suburbs. Seventeen summer resorts are attractively described and time table of trains and special summer rates for tickets given. Copies of the booklet may be obtained by addressing the Michigan Central ticket office at 119 Adams street, Chicago.

Commander Booth-Tucker has purchased for the Salvation Army another farm to be used as a summer resort for the children and their mothers from the crowded districts of New York. The farm cost $13,000 and comprises over seventy acres of land. There is an apple orchard, ten acres of woodland, a lake and clover fields. The building contains about thirty rooms and in connection with a fresh-air camp will accommodate about 150 persons. It will be called "The Cherry Tree Home for Waifs and Strays," a name suggested by Mrs. Grover Cleveland.

Publisher's Notes.

Nineteen Beautiful Years.

This sweet story of the life of Miss Willard's sister Mary loses none of its original interest with the passing years. The new edition, just issued, is one of the most attractive ever published; its delicate binding of blue and gold exceedingly appropriate.

Wonderfully true are the words of John G. Whittier, who said:

"The impression made upon me by the perusal of the first edition of this little book has not been weakened by the lapse of time. It seems to me now, as it did then, a very sweet and tender record of the exceptionally beautiful life of a young woman, whose rare natural gifts and graces were sanctified by a deep, but cheerful and healthful, religious experience, free from cant, affectation, or bigotry. It is an attractive picture of the 'sweet reasonableness' of Christian development—a lovely human character flowering into the beauty of holiness." Price postpaid 60 cents.

An Inspiring Booklet.

No more tender tribute to Miss Willard was ever penned than is found in "Frances E. Willard's Message to the Womanhood of the Age," by Rev. Frank M. Bristol, D. D., of Washington, D. C. Having been a pupil of Miss Willard, at the Northwestern University, in Evanston, Dr. Bristol speaks with knowledge of her wonderful life and its value to the world. Place the booklet in the hands of your friends, reserving a copy for your own desk, that her "message" may often inspire you. Only a limited number of copies are left. Price 15 cents.

Chalk Talking Made Easy.

In "Blackboard Helps for Loyal Temperance Legions," by Mrs. Linnie Gee Finney, we have twelve striking lessons on alcohol and tobacco. The page outline given for each lesson can be easily transferred to the blackboard by one little skilled in drawing. Opposite each picture we find appropriate questions, suggesting the talk which should accompany the use of the illustrations. This is a book needed by every leader of a Legion. The suggestions will be valuable to those who prepare blackboard lessons for Sunday schools and other societies. Price 25 cents.

A Fight Against Odds.

"A Fight Against Odds," by Kate Anderson, presents in a rarely forcible manner the insidious growth of the cigaret habit. Claude, the youngest son of the Kilgour family, is a boy of loving disposition and brilliant mind. Unknown to his family he becomes a slave to the cigaret. The unavailing efforts of mother, sister, and brothers, and even the poor boy himself to free him from the curse, the influences which worked against them and the sad termination are thrillingly told. The interest of the story is absorbing and well sustained. "A Fight Against Odds" appeared as a serial in The Union Signal. We are glad to offer it now in attractive book form, well illustrated and with a handsome cover. Cloth, 75 cents.

National W. C. T. U.

TO THE UNION SIGNAL SUBSCRIBERS.

A Message of Greeting and Explanation from the General Officers of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Dear Friends:—

For more than two months you have not received The Union Signal, the official organ of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The National W. C. T. U. is, however, in no wise to blame for the suspension of The Union Signal, since it has never had financial control of the paper. The National W. C. T. U. has had the editorial control of the Union Signal, but the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, a stock company of Chicago, has owned the paper and has controlled its finances from the first.

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has just consummated the purchase of The Union Signal, thus coming into full financial as well as editorial control of its official organ. Not until today, when the subscription list of The Union Signal became the property of the National W. C. T. U. as purchased from the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, could the National W. C. T. U. address the individual subscribers to its official organ, although we have sent an explanatory letter to each of our ten thousand local unions, requesting them to inform subscribers as widely as possible of the exact situation.

Five years ago Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey, the heaviest creditor of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association and a careful business woman, succeeded Mrs. Matilda B. Carse as President of this Association. Mrs. Bailey has made heroic efforts to save the stockholders and all the creditors from loss, and has succeeded in somewhat decreasing the commercial indebtedness. In acting for the W. T. P. A. she has left nothing undone that could be done by a high-minded woman and a true-hearted Christian.

The Woman's Temperance Publishing Association leased its entire business in March, 1901, for a term of seven years to The William Johnston Printing Company of Chicago, who from that time until August 5th, 1903, printed The Union Signal, but since that date, (August 5th, 1903) have failed to send out an issue of the paper to their subscribers, and have stated to the W. T. P. A. and to the National W. C. T. U. that they cannot longer continue the lease. This action was doubtless a surprise to most of the subscribers. Please bear in mind that the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association is a business corporation, distinct from the National W. C. T. U., and that the National has never received one penny of the subscription money for the Union Signal, nor from the proceeds of any other publications of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association.

The Board of Directors of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association met in Chicago recently and decided to retire from business. They offered The Union Signal and The Crusader Monthly to the National W. C. T. U. at a price which we have accepted and which we will pay in cash.

Having purchased The Union Signal so near the time of the National convention of the W. C. T. U., which meets in Cincinnati, Ohio, Nov. 13th, and as there will be many details to arrange, it is deemed best not to issue the first number under the new management until immediately after the close of the National Convention, making this the "Convention Number" and one of especial interest.

We shall proceed carefully and economically, (not purchasing printing machinery, etc.) and we trust that the W. C. T. U. members and all students and friends of the temperance reform will rally to the support of the paper and largely increase its subscription list.

ALL SUBSCRIBERS WHOSE NAMES ARE ON THE LIST WILL RECEIVE THE NEW UNION SIGNAL DATING FROM ITS FIRST ISSUE UNTIL THE EXPIRATION OF THEIR TIME WITH THE EXPECTATION THAT THESE SUBSCRIBERS WILL PROMPTLY RENEW.

All subscriptions sent in during the past few weeks since the suspension of publication by The William Johnston Printing Co. will also be honored by the National W. C. T. U., although these subscriptions must be added to the already long list of unexpired subscriptions as above referred to, for which the National W. C. T. U. has received no remuneration.

May we not say that in view of the heavy expense of taking up a paper with a large list of unexpired subscriptions, we hope that all who can afford to do so will feel inclined to cheer and encourage the National W. C. T. U. by at once becoming a "new," rather than remaining an "old" subscriber. While the National W. C. T. U. in its Cincinnati Convention will settle price, etc., of the paper, we can emphatically announce that THE PRICE WILL NOT EXCEED $1 PER YEAR.

Pledges in new subscriptions and from all subscribers now on the list who will kindly help by immediately renewing, can be sent at once to The Union Signal, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill.

PLEASE SEND NAMES ONLY, RESERVING MONEY PAYMENT UNTIL YOU RECEIVE THE FIRST COPY OF THE PAPER CONTAINING THE EXACT SUBSCRIPTION PRICE AND ALL OTHER PARTICULARS.

All subscribers who have been receiving the paper and are owing the amount of their subscription will greatly aid the National W. C. T. U. by promptly sending to us the full amount due. Make all drafts and money orders payable to The Union Signal.

We shall aim to publish a paper having a high standard of literary merit, taking a world-wide survey of the temperance field, and invaluable to W. C. T. U. as well as to all temperance workers and specialists.

We again assure you that we have done everything in our power to bring about better conditions and that as speedily as possible, and that we could not possibly communicate with you until today when the subscription list became our property.

Although the National W. C. T. U. has been, as we have tried to show you, the greatest sufferer during this period of suspension of our official paper, we have no reason to be disheartened. The W. C. T. U. throughout all our country and other lands was never so large, so enthusiastic, so promiseful as at the present time. Let us impart a spirit of good cheer, for we have reason to be cheerful, and let us hope that all loyal White Ribboners will be brought closer together because of this temporary deprivation. With faith in God and in the righteousness of the cause we love, let us go faithfully forward.

Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill., Oct. 10, 1903.

LILLIAN M. N. STEVENS, President.
ANNA A. GORDON, Vice-President at Large.
SUSANNA M. D. FRY, Corresponding Secretary.
CLARA C. HOFFMAN, Recording Secretary.
FRANCES E. BEAUCHAMP, Assistant Recording Secretary.
HELEN M. BARKER, Treasurer.

THE CRUSADER MONTHLY.

The Crusader Monthly has been purchased by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be continued without interruption under the editorial management of Miss Margaret Wintringer and Miss Alice M. Krimbill. This sixteen page paper is being greatly improved and should find a place in every home where there are young people. Especially should it be in the hands of every member of the Loyal Temperance Legion. The price is but 25 cents per year. Now is a good time to redeem your subscription pledges. Send all subscriptions addressed to The Crusader Monthly, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Illinois. Make all drafts and money orders payable to The Crusader Monthly.

UNANSWERED LETTERS.

Upon coming into possession of The Union Signal, the National W. C. T U. saw for the first time several thousand unanswered letters of inquiry sent to the publishers by subscribers concerning the non receipt of the paper. We believe the writers will find in these pages an answer to their questions. If not, they will please address The Union Signal, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill.

W. C. T. U. LITERATURE.

Miss Ruby I. Gilbert manager, Miss A. A. Austin associate, have purchased from the Woman's Temperance Publishing association the entire stock of books, leaflets, pictures, badges and other W. C. T. U. supplies. Misses Gilbert and Austin are well known white ribboners who are familiar with the publishing business and they should have generous patronage. New leaflets will be added at once and the stock greatly improved. Orders for literature will receive prompt and careful attention. Until further notice, send your orders for any of the above mentioned supplies to Miss Ruby Gilbert, 184 La Salle Street, Chicago.

THE OFFICIAL CALL

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is hereby officially called to meet in its thirtieth annual convention in Cincinnati, Ohio, November 13th, to continue through the 18th, in the Ninth Street Baptist Church, between Vine and Race streets.

The basis of representation is as follows: The ex-officio membership and one delegate-at-large elected by each state and territory, and one delegate for each five hundred members of whom the National W. C. T. U. has received dues; also one L. T. L. delegate for every fifty dollars paid into the national treasury, and one delegate-at-large for every fractional part of fifty dollars received from the combined states, territories and District of Columbia, all such delegates to be active members of the W. C. T. U. and active workers in the L. T. L.

At the close of another decade of earnest work and glad fruition, another ten years of "glorious discipline and blessed sorrow," it is appropriate that we gather with grateful hearts in the old "Crusade State" for our annual meeting. The past year has been, on the whole, one of splendid progress for the temperance cause, and the National W. C. T. U. will bring to this "Harvest Home" an encouraging report of work accomplished, of increased membership, and of an ever-widening field of labor.

At Cincinnati we will remember particularly the inspiration of the crusade days and, to the end that we too, may be specially imbued with power from on high, let us reverently observe the day of prayer and consecration, Nov. 12, preceding the opening of the thirtieth convention of the National W. C. T. U.

LILLIAN M. N. STEVENS, President.
SUSANNA M. D. FRY, Cor. Secretary.

THE CALL TO PRAYER.

According to the official call, the National Convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held this year in Cincinnati, Ohio, November 13-18, 1903. This means a return to the "Crusade State"and the immediate vicinity of Hillsboro, Ohio, the crusade town, which will be the mecca of delegates and visitors.

This fact can but arouse a universal desire for a renewal of the crusade baptism and power. That we may realize the desire, we issue with new emphasis, the usual Call to Prayer.

On Thursday, Nov. 12, 1903, at Cincinnati, Ohio, an all-day meeting of consecration and prayer will be observed from 10 a. m. to 4 p. m. in the St. Paul M. E. Church.

Will our local unions set apart this day, and join with us in the following program:

MORNING SESSION—10 a. m. to 12 m.

Singing—"Give to the Winds Thy Fears."

Prayer. Reading Crusade Psalm.

Singing—"Rock of Ages."

Bible Exposition—"The Sources of Our Power,"—namely: The Holy Spirit (Acts 2:1-5), Prayer (Acts 1:14), The Word of God (Acts 6:4), Consecration (Malachi 3:10), Individual Responsibility for Service (Isaiah 6:6-9.)

A consecration service will follow.

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 to 4 O'CLOCK.

Devotional Exercises.

Ten-minute addresses by national evangelists, pastors and W. C. T. U. workers, interspersed with requests for prayer, seasons of prayer, hymns and sacred solos.

T. L. branches; for white ribboners everywhere; for the overthrow of the liquor traffic; for peace and arbitration and purity; for a baptism of Christ-like love and enthusiasm for humanity.

These must be presented to the chairman of transportation at the convention, and will entitle the holder to the reduction on the return ticket. The special railroad agent will charge each certificate holder 25 cents for viseing her certificate. There will be no special official train.

Give your station agent timely notice that certificates will be needed, as they are not always kept on hand. Secure a certificate for each road you travel over. The trip must be continuous. Tickets will be on sale Nov. 7th and will be good until Nov. 23rd.

All delegates are requested not to deliver their checks for baggage to any one at the depot. Arrangements have been made with the Cincinnati R. R. Omnibus Company for the delivery of trunks and valises for 25 cents each within certain limits and for 50 cents and 25 cents respectively for delivery to the suburbs. An agent from this Company will be stationed at the Convention church door to receive the checks.

BANNERS.

All banners not taken to the Convention personally should be carefully boxed and sent by express plainly addressed to the Chairman on Banners, Miss Ida K. Widrig, 1915 Hewitt avenue, East Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, and she be notified by letter of the manner of transportation. If the sender attends the Convention, she should see the banner safely consigned to the winner with instructions in regard to boxing. If she does not attend, she should write careful instructions to some one who is to be there from her own state. The names of Department banners should be plainly marked on the banners. Transportation should be prepaid in every case. The receiver of a banner should always bear the expense of taking it home and of returning it to the National Convention.

Strong wooden boxes with locks have been provided for the four white star spangled membership banners and for Mrs. Stevens' flag membership banner, and it is expected that these banners will have good care, that they may grow old gracefully. If a banner is worth winning, it is worth the effort necessary to see it well packed for the trips to and from the Convention and to give it good care throughout the year.

HEADQUARTERS.

The Headquarters of the National W. C. T. U. will be at the Burnett Hotel, corner of Third and Vine streets. It is a house much patronized by ladies, and is said to have the prettiest dining-room west of the Alleghanies. The proprietor has closed the bar in honor of his White Ribbon guests. By special arrangement, meals and room can be had for $3 per day, two in a room, and at $1.50 per day without meals, two in a room; single rooms with or without meals at higher rates. Application should be made to Mr. T. J. Cullen, Manager. Parlor A. will be assigned for Headquarters work and another large room for the Executive committee if desired.

Delegates to the Convention will be entertained in private families. Lodging and breakfast will be provided and possibly one other meal.

THE CONVENTION CHURCH.

The Ninth Street Baptist church is centrally located and is one of the most commodious church edifices in the city. The officers of this church grant the use of its very excellent auditorium for the Convention, and all the elaboration of rooms for committees and conferences and whatsoever use the Convention may require. The entire church organization is in full sympathy with the objects of the Convention.

The present pastor is Rev. G. O. King. His two assistants are Rev. D. B. Richard and James R. Kirtley. It is the parent church of an active German Baptist church, and of nine Mission Stations with buildings in various sections of the city. These operate free Kindergarten, Kitchengarten, sewing classes, physical culture and industrial classes, an Employment Bureau, a Boys' Brigade and a Men's Club, in the interests of which there are eighty different meetings weekly. There are nearly two thousand members engaged in these various Christian efforts, with a Sunday school attendance of three thousand.

EXCURSION TO HILLSBORO.

The excursion to Hillsboro, O., will be made Monday, November 16. A special train will take delegates and visitors, leaving Cincinnati about 7 a. m. and returning abut 2 p. m. The cost for round trip ticket will be $1.25.

The train will arrive in Hillsboro about 9 a. m. The party will go direct to the church. After the delegations are seated, the Chautauqua salute will be given to the old crusaders who will be seated in the memorial room. After the services, to be held in the new chapel dedicated to the crusade, the crusade room and the interesting memorials to be found there will be inspected Thompson. It is hoped that Mrs. McCabe, of Delaware, the first W. C. T. U. and luncheon will be served. A visit will then be paid to the home of Mother President of Ohio, and Mrs. Bashford, wife of the President of the Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, will be present and many other distinguished guests, including ministerial brethren who aided in the Crusade. The pastors and people of this historic town are greatly interested in our coming and we will be greatly interested in going. It will be a great event. Visitors are invited to join the excursion.

SPECIAL FEATURES OF THE CONVENTION PROGRAM.

One evening will be devoted to a grand diamond medal contest, with nine contestants and a special program. Another, to one minute speeches by the State Presidents, in which each is expected to name a victory by her state and tell how it was won. Welcome Night, Jubilee Night and Platform Night will occur as usual. There will be no department demonstration this year. The speakers for Platform Night, so far as selected, are Miss Olive Malvery, India; Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Massachusetts; Miss Belle Kearney, Mississippi.

The President's Annual Address will be the chief feature for Friday forenoon. It is too early to announce the speakers for Welcome Night, but we may expct brightness and the usual good time.

Mrs. Maria Weed, of Illinois, and Deaconess Sarah J. Elliott, of New York, will give short addresses on the general subject of polygamy in the United States. Mrs. C. C. Faxon, our W. C. T. U. Commissioner to the Philippines will tell about her work for temperance in Manila. Miss M. L. Orr will show the needs of the immigrant station at Ellis Island, N. Y. Miss Olive Christian Malvery, who captivated the world's W. C. T. U. Convention at Geneva, and who is a brilliant speaker and charming reciter, will give us peeps into her native country, India, and temperance truths with dramatic fervor and power. There promises to be an unusual number of good things at the Cincinnati Convention.

ATTENTION, SECRETARIES, ORGANIZERS AND LECTURERS!

The State Corresponding Secretaries have already been asked to send in their state reports on Oct. 15th at the latest. All organizers should have their reports in by that time and the National Lecturers will please bear in mind the three points called for in the National By-laws, viz., number of lectures, upon what general subjects and in how many different states.

SUSANNA M. D. FRY, Corresponding Secretary.

ATTENTION, TREASURERS!

The books of the National Treasurer will close Nov. 1st. The auditor will begin her work on the 2nd, and after that no dues or other funds can be entered. We are hoping that many states will show good gains, and that several will make a gain of five hundred and more.

HELEN M. BARKER, Treasurer.

OUR CONVENTION CITY.

An ably prepared article concerning the great dailies of Cincinnati, the churches, philanthropies, organizations and citizens of our Convention city, together with pictures for illustrations, was sent to The Union Signal for publication, but Alas and Alack! in the absence of an official organ, this labor can be expressed only by this short paragraph. The press of Cincinnati was represented as a unit in its welcome to the convention and as standing ready to publish every item of fact, news or comment concerning the white ribbon movement. As for the welcomes contained in the article, we will have to wait for them until Nov. 13th, all of which will doubtless be published in the great Cincinnati dailies referred to.

HUGH BROTHERTON, CURATE.

By Frances Home,

Author of "Against Odds," "The Experience of Dorothy Leigh."

American serial rights reserved by Woman's Temperance Publishing Association.

[So much interest has been expressed in the story, "Hugh Brotherton, Curate," that the last chapter is given here for the benefit of the subscribers to the Union Signal who have waited long and anxiously to know what became of the hero.]

"A mild attack of apoplexy induced by violent cerebral excitement," was Dr. Mann's diagnosis of Enoch's case, and once assured that the old man was "not going to slip thru our fingers this time," Pitsmoor came very near to regarding his seizure in the light of a special interposition of Providence on its behalf. One topic of conversation having been voluntarily tabooed, another, scarcely less dramatic, had been substituted in its place. For the pledge of silence, tacitly given at the meeting was, for the most part, scrupulously observed. One argumentative and reckless young miner did indeed contend, in Sam's presence, that all he, personally, had undertaken was "not to mention no unpleasantness to Mr. Brotherton's face," for the rest, as he fallaciously argued, his tongue was his own. But when, ten minutes later, he turned a damaged countenance upon the company, and savagely demanded the suppression of Sam Widgery, he found, to his discomfiture, that public opinion was entirely on Sam's side. After that it was generally recognized that, for the prudent and peaceable, there was no course but to fall back upon Enoch and the author of the anonymous slander as subjects for legitimate discussion.

As for Mr. Brotherton himself, it was a privilege to get even a passing glimpse of his pale face in these days, for, from the moment when he helped to carry Enoch from the platform to his bed, he seldom left his side. One prolonged interview Hugh had with his father on the morning following the meeting, and after it the solicitor, shrugging his shoulders, washed his hands of all responsibility, and went home to console himself and his wife with the hope that, possibly there was stuff in the fellow that might make something of him after all—stuff that had been altogether wanting in grandad.

Hugh marveled greatly at the forbearance he had shown, and for years to come, no one but the elder Brotherton and Rose, to whom he had taken a marked fancy, knew by whose means he had been held back from open denunciation of his son.

The next shock to the parish was contained in the news that the doctor had decided to exchange practices with another medical man who resided in an equally retired spot, and that he and Mrs. Langley were leaving Pitsmoor forthwith. Mrs. Langley might go and welcome; so many a voice was heard to say, but over the impending loss of the lately despised doctor, Pitsmoor's lamentations were loud and deep. "It allus was the way," grumbled Tummas Windle, "whenever they happened to get a good 'un." But there was no help for it; the doctor went, and Tummas and his cronies got what consolation they could out of the gloomy pleasure of dinning circumstantial accounts of his worth, his assiduity, and his skill into the ears of his unfortunate successor.

Mrs. Langley accompanied her brother to his home, and, from that day to this, they have found it periodically necessary to "move on." The knowledge that it is so is, perhaps, one of the bitterest ingredients in Hugh Brotherton's cup. She resolutely declined to grant him an interview before leaving Pitsmoor, and he never saw her again. Nor, for some years, did he meet Rose Glyn. A day or two after the meeting, in the course of one of his frequent visits to Enoch's bedside, Mr. Boyd incidentally mentioned that his sister-in-law had been suddenly recalled to her father's house, and was already on her way home. Hugh made no comment and asked no questions, but he understood. To the very last Rose professed to be delighted to find that Pitsmoor shared her own views with regard to the most ridiculous story she had ever heard. Why, had it been true, she added scornfully, Mr. Brotherton would have proved himself to be a person too contemptible for words. As things were, he was, if possible, more than ever loved and respected. So sweetly sarcastic were poor Rose's looks and tones that neither Mr. nor Mrs. Boyd felt sorry that she had insisted upon being requested to return home.

Through all these happenings Hugh kept his place by Enoch's bedside, waiting between hope and fear for the first signs of returning consciousness. After awhile, by slow and painful degrees, the signs came. One after another each well known face was pondered over and recognized; one by one the broken threads of life were taken up. Then Hugh understood that with Enoch it was to be as it already was with Sam. With neither was he to be allowed to enter into explanations.

"No, sir, once for all Pitsmoor have spoken, and it munna be," said Sam firmly, when Hugh made one determined effort to open the subject. "That's reet, isn't it, gaffer?" he added, with a grave appeal to the broken old man in the bed.

Feebly Enoch signified his assent. Sam had spoken gently—even tenderly—and tenderly Enoch's hand was laid on Hugh's bowed head; but the unhappy curate noticed that neither of his two friends were willing to meet his eyes.

When he could bear their love and mistrust no longer, he spoke again. It was one night when the three happened to be alone together.

"Old friend," and he gently touched Enoch's hand, "I have news for you. True, honest news of that miserable wretch whose history I told you in the pit."

Sam turned scarlet and Enoch trembled, but Hugh's tone was resolute, and they both longed unspeakably for some such news.

"He has dropped all pretense, and knows himself at least for what he is worth. Please God, by His help, he'll do better yet. At any rate, he hasn't tasted drink, nor wanted to taste it, since—since that day that Sam and I found somehing besides Billy Sellers in the pit. Enoch—Sam—do forgive and try to believe him!"

Enoch's hand sought his tremulously.

"Forgive him? Eh, lad? When I remember the deceitfulness o' my own ways, is it for me to be hard on another man? The Lord forgive and help both him and me!"

For Enoch was humbled to the ground, not only by the recollection of the device by which he had rescued a justly suspected man from a disgraceful but righteously deserved fate, but also by the knowledge that under similar circumstances he would not hesitate to do it again. Hence his abiding sense of sin.

"Mr. Brotherton, sir, it's took a load, has that news, off from me," and once more, he looked squarely into Hugh's face with eyes that shone.

Thus, to all outward seeming, was closed the episode in Hugh Brotherton's early life when, rushing arrogantly to the verge of a fate similar to that of his grandfather, he was plucked back, not unharmed, by means of his own manhood, and, (since life, after all, is not made up of outward things,) was made to drink the cup of humiliation day by day, and year by year, for his soul's good. He lost his youth in the process, and losing it, found that which was better worth having. Even Rose, last and most reluctant of those who had been his friends, was fain to admit it; but that was not until Rose had been for three years and more in the fire. Throughout those years she visited Pitsmoor only when assured of his absence, and during such visits she resolutely hardened her heart against Sam's outspoken partisanship and Enoch's pleading eyes.

As for Hugh, as the years went on, and his manhood strengthened, Mrs. Boyd often wondered would it never occur to him in the light of a possibility that he might win his estranged and indignant love afresh. The question was answered when one day, Hugh handed to Mr. Boyd a letter he had just received from the patron of a neighboring living.

"I congratulate you. In my opinion, he has offered it to the right sort of man," said Mr. Boyd, emphatically, as he handed the letter back.

"You will accept, of course?"

Hugh glanced at Mrs. Boyd before answering.

"I can't say. Most probably not, since it depends entirely upon what Miss Glyn's last word to me may be. I shall ask for it today. There's just time to run down and back before the club opens."

Mr. and Mrs. Boyd exchanged startled glances.

"Mightn't that strike her as being a little sudden?" asked the former dubiously.

"Sudden? Why so? She came to know me pretty thoroughly three years ago, and has had all the time since then for thinking it over and watching the course of events. She left me in no manner of doubt as to what she thought of me then. If she still holds the same opinion and assures me that she must continue to hold it, I don't care that for Courtney's living. I shall stay where I am."

"Oh, Mr. Brotherton, we don't want to lose you—you know that; but will you tell her from me that, if she can be spared, we shall be glad to have her for a week or two," said Mrs. Boyd, eagerly. "And Mr. Brotherton, I do hope she will come."

"Thank you," said Hugh, gravely. For his own part, he felt miserably doubtful.

Throughout that interminable day, Mrs. Boyd repeatedly invited her husband's opinion concerning Rose's decision, and as often scouted his cautious replies.

"I'm sure that I'm extremely sorry to feel so uncertain," he said, at last quite penitently, "but really it is a little difficult to decide what oneself would do in Rose's place. The question is a good deal involved. Naturally, for Brotherton's sake, and in some sense for her own, I hope—I very much hope that she may see her way to come. On the other hand—"

"On the other hand, if she does not come, all I can say is that I shall be very much disappointed in Rose," interrupted his wife, indignantly. "Chris, if I did not know to the contrary, I should suspect that you had never been in love!"

Mr. Boyd raised his head in surprise, and saw her to be ruffled beyond all his experience of her sweet nature.

"My word! I hope she'll come," he said quaintly.

His wife's faith in her sister, if weak, was justified, for toward evening Rose came. She looked pale, agitated and happy; and at once it was evident she had fallen in love over again with the grave lover who had supplanted her fallen hero of old.

Before many days had passed, the voice of joy mingled with the voice of mourning on every hand. The only consolation which Pitsmoor could take to itself in the prospect of bereavement lay in the fact that Mr. Brotherton was not going far away.

"The worst fault I ever see in him," asserted John Broadbent dogmatically, "was the disappointing line he took wi' respect to our weekly temperance meetin'. Shilly-shallyin' we might expect from Mr. Boyd, but we had a right to expect somethin' better from Mr. Brotherton. Here's a parish o' pledged—"

"Oh, shut up, gaffer!" interrupted Sam precipitately, for argumentative souls were pressing round. "He's made a teetotaller of every man Jack of us, and what more do you want?

Sam was still a little apt to speak and act truculently, therefore, Enoch, being unaccountably silent, it was not for John Broadbent to enter into combat single-handed with one who argued so deplorably beside the mark.
